Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Greg Pope and
Mr. David Clelland.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's commitment to raising standards and achieving excellence for all from the early years to life-long learning after 18 years of neglect; recognises that education spending will rise as a share of national income over the course of this Parliament, in contrast to a decline of 0.3 per cent. between 1991-92 and 1996-97; recognises the early success in lowering class sizes in the early years and the achievement of introducing the literacy and numeracy strategies which, with the hard work and commitment of teachers, have raised standards; supports the promotion of diversity which will deliver excellence for the many and not the few; recognises the role of specialist schools and the importance of excellence in cities; supports the drive to raise standards in secondary schools through the extension of the literacy and numeracy strategies and an expanded programme of summer schools; recognises the value of teachers and supports the new proposals for performance-related promotion; recognises the role of school leaders; notes the increase of £1.8 billion in funding for schools and Local Education Authorities in England for the coming year and the role of the fair funding framework in tackling excessive bureaucracy and ensuring that increased funding benefits classroom services; notes the increased resources made available to expand access and improve quality in further and higher education; and supports the Government's determination to build a socially inclusive knowledge economy in which learning and skills are the foundation of success and prosperity.

Points of Order

Mr. Hawkins: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know that you and Madam Speaker—indeed, all occupants of the Chair—have always been careful to ensure that the needs of Members and their constituents are dealt with properly in ministerial correspondence. I therefore thought it right to draw to your attention an example of a letter that I received today about a constituency case. So that you are aware that this is not a minor matter, Mr. Deputy Speaker, let me tell you that the letter came from something called the parliamentary correspondence ministerial section—it is not a question of a junior clerk's having got something wrong.

The letter starts off well enough in referring to me correctly, but then begins "Dear Mr. Pickthall". As I am sure you will understand, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my constituents would be slightly puzzled by my being confused with the hon. Member for West Lancashire. The letter then refers to my constituents. In my initial letter, I made it clear that I was writing on behalf of both of them. The wife, sadly, suffers from multiple sclerosis. The reply from the ministerial section of the Benefits Agency says, "We cannot tell you anything about the wife's case, because you need a Data Protection Act order authority to refer to the husband." The two are, of course, living together as husband and wife.

The reply finally states, "We cannot disclose any information the agency hold on Mr. Smith." Mr. Smith is not connected in any way with the case, so where he came from is as much a mystery as the reference to the hon. Member for West Lancashire.

From that catalogue of errors in a letter about a constituency case, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will understand the crucial importance of Ministers' supervising correspondence themselves. Would you be prepared to draw the matter to the attention of Ministers at the Department of Social Security, to ensure that, in future, letters containing three serious errors are not sent to Members when they concern constituents' urgent cases?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order, but I am sure that someone in the Department will read Hansard.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.44 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey): I beg to move,

That this House deplores the fact that Government interference in the Millennium Dome has rendered it a source of national embarrassment, a wasted opportunity to celebrate Britain and the Millennium and poor value for Lottery players' money.

It is nice to see the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport for the second time today, but I regret that, because of the time taken during our first encounter, there is so little time left to debate the dome. It is also a pity that the Minister responsible for it, Lord Falconer, is safely ensconced elsewhere. He, not the Secretary of State, answers for the Government on dome matters.

Let me begin by making what may be a slightly embarrassing confession. From the outset, I was a supporter of the dome and an enthusiast for the Greenwich site. I know that there are domophobes on both sides of the House—people who think that the whole project was destined to be a failure and a waste of money. I am not one of those people. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), whom I am delighted to see in the Chamber and who is often credited with having inspired the project and enabled it to happen at all. Back in 1997, in evidence to the Select Committee, he said:

"I feel that it is right in the conduct of the nation's affairs every so often for nations to make a great statement of confidence, of great commitment to their own pride in the past and optimism in the future. There could be no more obvious moment to do that than on the anniversary of the millennium."

I entirely endorse those sentiments. I wish that that aspiration had been fulfilled, but no one visiting the dome today could say with honesty that it has been.

The problems at the dome have resulted directly from the meddling and interference of Ministers. In fact, the problems began before the last general election, with the refusal of the Labour Opposition to make up their mind about whether, if elected, they would continue with the project. As a result of that prevarication, a valuable nine months—at least—were lost. Partly as a consequence of that, time, instead of being a theme for the dome, became an enemy.

Following the decision to proceed with the project, the Government made their next big mistake. They appointed the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), Labour's archspin doctor, to be the sole shareholder in the project. The warnings were there: the only other project that the right hon. Gentleman had masterminded was shallow, confused, all things to all people, long on height and bereft of vision. It was the monstrous blancmange of Labour's general election victory—a monstrous blancmange that is now going squishy at the edges, past its sell-by date and liable to give voters the runs.

Not surprisingly, the right hon. Gentleman's appointment was seen as harnessing the dome—and, indeed, all millennium projects, whether they originated from religious faith or from a sense of community spirit—to Labour's campaign to win the next general election. I am happy to say that most of the other projects, especially the smaller ones, have been reclaimed by the people up and down the country, but for the dome there was no escape. The arrival of the right hon. Gentleman began a process of obsessive secrecy, which has been one of the abiding characteristics of the way in which the project has been handled and of its public relations—obsessive secrecy illumined occasionally by flashes of the absurd or surreal.

I wonder, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether you recall the trip to Disneyworld, and the photo-call with the world's most famous mouse. In view of recent events, it was a somewhat ironic trip. Do you recall the birth of "Baby Dome"? Whatever became of "Baby Dome"? [Interruption.] No doubt it was the victim of a ruthless infanticide, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring)—to whose contributions to our debates on the dome I pay tribute—so admirably points out.

Do you remember "surfball", the exciting new game, Mr. Deputy Speaker? "Surfball" turned out to be a figment: it turned out to be "surfballs". Then there was the tantalising glimpse of the body zone, which involved first a giant man, and then a man, a woman and a baby—another baby that disappeared. Finally, there was an androgenous figure; at that stage, no one knew that, sadly, it was infected with pubic lice.

Not surprisingly, the dome became the butt of jokes. According to The Times:

"Attacking the Dome has become the nation's favourite sport."

[Interruption.] Hon. Members should go and have a look.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ainsworth: I will, but I shall not do so very often, because we are short of time.

Mr. Plaskitt: If the dome is a joke, as the hon. Gentleman says, can he explain why it is now the most popular tourist attraction in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman will have to do better than that. I was quoting The Times, which pointed out that the dome had become the butt of the nation's humour.

There is a lack of candour in financial matters. That was regretted by the Select Committee on more than one occasion, but not addressed by the Ministers concerned. At one point last year, several different figures for the amount of sponsorship that had been received were spun simultaneously. That is par for the course perhaps from a press office that has been heavily infiltrated by Millbank implants and described by one former insider as "really rather nasty". The handling of the press office and its bullying approach to journalists over time might have done more to undermine the dome's reputation than even the shenanigans on new year's eve, of which I should record that my family and I were beneficiaries. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] I use the term "beneficiaries" advisedly.

With the demise, albeit temporary, of the right hon. Member for Hartlepool, there was a golden opportunity for a fresh start on the project. We argued then for the appointment of a person with relevant business and tourism skills and knowledge to head the project.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has announced that he went on a free trip because, previously, he had announced to everyone in the Chamber that he had paid to go in the dome. Perhaps now we have had the clarification that we expected.

Mr. Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman is silly and is wasting time. I went to the dome on new year's eve. I went back to the dome after the opening and paid for my own ticket. I understand that that is one more time than the Secretary of State, who has been there only on new years's eve, according a recent parliamentary answer.

The impression of control by the political image doctors was only reinforced by the appointment of Lord Falconer—not just any old crony but the apogee of cronydom, the Prime Minister's trusted former flatmate. Although less prone to surfballing and more convivial than his saturnine predecessor, Lord Falconer did nothing to stem the tide of bad publicity. The project was characterised by exactly the same lack of candour and blithe reassurances to genuine questions from hon. Members on both sides of the House. As things got worse, the Government decided on a new tack: anyone criticising the dome, or the way in which it was managed was suddenly unpatriotic or a whinger.

Ms Hazel Blears (Salford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ainsworth: No, I will not.

Ms Blears rose—

Mr. Ainsworth: All right; I give way to the hon. Lady.

Ms Blears: Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that his constant denigration of the dome has a terrible effect on those children—hundreds of thousands of them—who are going to the dome to do the "our town story", as Salford children did last week? They are proud of their cities and their heritage. He should be ashamed of his constant denigration of those children's activities.

Mr. Ainsworth: If the hon. Lady had paid attention to any of the discussions that we have had on the dome in the past 18 months, she would have heard me being supportive of the project. It is not Conservative Members who have made the dome what it is today. It is not they who have enabled children to visit only two of the zones. It is not they who have given rise to children from Yorkshire being offered an 8 am slot for their visit to the dome, which would mean their getting up at 2 am. She should look at what is going on before criticising Conservative Members.

Last autumn's draw-down of the £50 million facility from the Millennium Commission is another prime example of appalling media relations. That £50 million had always been in the budget, but it had never been referred to, so, not surprisingly, commentators saw it as a new cash injection and that is how it was portrayed.

Similarly inept was the attempt to spin the emergency cash-flow boost in January as perfectly in line with expectations. Shortly after the opening night, I warned that the project might run into cash-flow difficulties in the near future and need an injection of funds, but not even I had expected that need to arise so soon. No one in their right mind plans to receive an emergency cash injection to avoid insolvent trading. To have pretended otherwise was absurd.

Incidentally, I have yet to meet anyone who favours giving more money to the project. Perhaps the Secretary of State has. If so, I will be delighted to hear who. I will also be delighted to hear what guarantee he can offer that the dome will not be back for more. He is silent on that, but I hope that when he answers he will offer some relevant remarks.

The media had just about had their fill of patronising and misleading claptrap when it was suddenly claimed that, instead of needing 12 million visitors to break even—the figure that had been in the public domain for about two years—the dome would need only 10 million visitors. I am certain that that miraculous change in the economics of the dome had nothing whatever to do with the fact that, at that time, the public were staying away in droves.

Dome watchers had worked out by mid-January that, as crisis followed crisis, there would be a need for a scapegoat. They had also worked out that under no circumstances would that scapegoat be a Minister.

Jennie Page, redoubtable and feisty as she is, is a public servant by instinct and training. She had possibly the worst job in Britain and she did it very well. It was made even worse by the constant interference from Ministers, which she found exasperating. To deliver the project on time and to budget by 31 December was no mean achievement. She deserved better than a public and acrimonious dismissal.

We are told that it was Lord Falconer himself who, on the day of Jennie Page's departure, personally telephoned a number of the sponsors to tell them about her replacement. The Secretary of State has written to me on the subject. He played no part in the shameful affair. He is exonerated, but I should be grateful if he confirmed that it is his understanding that Lord Falconer telephoned the sponsors on the day that Jennie Page left. If so, will he share with the House his understanding of what Lord Falconer said to the sponsors because there seems to have been some misunderstanding? They were left with the impression that the dome's new chief executive was to be the man who saved Disneyland Paris. That was Philippe Bourguignon, not P-Y Gerbeau. It was another masterly display of cack-handed spin, in which the Minister was personally involved.

I wish P-Y, as we must grow to know and to love him, very well. It is not his fault that his appointment prompted Le Monde to gloat:

"A Frenchman, a garlic eater, a vulgar frog is to rescue the failure of what Tony Blair only 2 months ago called 'This extraordinary Testament to British creativity'".

The dome is indeed a national embarrassment.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): Does my hon. Friend agree that what the dome has become in the public mind and certainly in the media's mind is a testament to new Labour, the epitome, a paradigm—all spin and no substance?

Mr. Ainsworth: My hon. Friend is right. If he waits, I may dwell briefly on that theme, too.

Mr. Clive Efford (Eltham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ainsworth: I will not at the moment.

P-Y appears to have got off to a good start, helped by half-term and by the weather, although people do not have to pay £20 to go to the dome to watch a rugby international, however gratifying the result. He faces an unenviable task, hampered again by time—the project's enemy—and by money. He is also hampered by the content of the dome itself.

The original vision for the dome was noble and thoughtful: a symbol of Britain on the cusp of the new millennium, a celebration of our past. History has been air-brushed from the dome. The theme of time has become a mere memory. It was a chance to take stock of ourselves as a nation and to glimpse the future with the help of the best of our creative talent and cutting-edge technology, but the dome is not a symbol of Britain. It is a symbol of a trite, self-regarding and bossy Government who believe in nothing and have to their credit only a mounting pile of broken promises and malfunctioning zones, such as health, crime and rural areas. The Government have fashioned a dome in their own image, partly on purpose, partly by mistake.

When the creative director, Stephen Bayley, walked out on the project because he could not hack the daily intrusions by Ministers in a project that was meant to be above politics, the dome was consigned to whatever fate bureaucrats, long-suffering and competing sponsors and Ministers could incompetently contrive between them. The result is the noisy, brash, part dull, part sensational exhibition that we are discussing tonight.

Sure, people will go, and good luck to them. I hope that they have a great day. Sure, children will enjoy the day out. When did children ever not enjoy a day out?

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lord Commissioner to the Treasury): Often.

Mr. Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman obviously leads a sad life. We took the children to Brighton at the weekend. They had a very good day out and I do not think that Brighton has had £400 million of lottery money. It does not take £400 million of lottery money to give children a good day out.

The staff at the dome are universally helpful. I am told that the show is good as well, but on the day I went—and paid for my ticket—I was told that the show that I wanted to see had been cancelled owing to a lack of visitors.

What do people say about value for money at the dome?

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): The cost of the dome is continually presented as not being a charge on the taxpayer. It is not clear whom the Government think that £400 million of lottery money came from if not from the taxpayer by another means. Unlike the Government, my hon. Friend has paid some attention to tourism. Could he make a guesstimate of what £400 million might have done for the seaside heritage of Britain?

Mr. Ainsworth: My hon. Friend tempts me down a road that I do not wish to travel. The Government have many times admitted that lottery money is public money. Obviously, £400 million could have done a great deal for our tourist areas. However, the British Tourist Authority anticipates that the dome will attract a significant number of visitors, although I doubt that the claim that it will attract £1 billion of extra spending is anywhere near the mark.

People who go to the dome have a reasonable day. There is no doubt about that. However, do they think that the money spent on it was well spent? A handy website—www.DomeVote.co.uk—has been set up to enable those who have visited the dome to voice their opinions. The first question is, "Is the dome worth £758 million?" So far, 16 per cent. say yes and 78 per cent. say no. Some 48 per cent. rate the dome as a waste of money and 39 per cent. say that the queues are too long. The dome is not cutting it in terms of value for money.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) said a few moments ago, the dome is an emblem of new Labour. It betrays a failure of vision. Worse, it betrays an inability to understand where politics should give way to art, design, science, architecture and history. It is not a triumph of spin over substance because it is not a triumph at all.

In the long run, what happens after the exhibition closes will be of far greater importance than the exhibition itself. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) will confirm, Greenwich was chosen partly because of its location on the meridian line, but also because of the immense possibilities for regeneration in that part of London. It is worrying that Ministers have got off to such a delayed start in seeking bids for the site. It is worrying that nobody seems to have calculated the cost of decommissioning the exhibition. It is worrying that there appears to be a dispute with British Gas over the site. I am sure that the last thing that any of us wants is for the dome to stand idle for months after the exhibition closes at the end of the year. We want to get on with creating jobs and creating a development that will bring something of great value to the capital city and to the nation as a whole.

All that is for the future. For now, our message to Ministers is that they have done enough damage: leave P-Y to get on with the job, and leave the dome alone.

8.5 pm

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Chris Smith): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"believes that the Millennium Experience—and the many other Millennium activities—represent both an excellent celebration for the people of this country and a tangible and enduring legacy for future generations; further welcomes the announcement that the New Millennium Experience Company team will be introducing improvements which deliver even greater value for money both to the paying visitor and to the Millennium Commission; and, in particular, notes the record attendances at the Dome in the week commencing 7th February and the recent high satisfaction ratings amongst visitors."

I am grateful to the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) for giving me the opportunity to speak on this important subject, if not for a speech that amply justified the title "monstrous blancmange".

I am sure that our discussions this evening will focus on the dome, but it is important that we see it in its proper context. Unlike the hon. Gentleman, I think that context matters. We have always said that the dome was the centrepiece of the country's overall millennium celebrations. Those celebrations comprise a rich and colourful tapestry of projects and schemes that embrace the whole country and will enrich our cultural life for many years. There are projects as diverse as the immensely successful dynamic earth centre in Edinburgh, the new Tate gallery of modern art on Bankside and the spectrum of new village halls and greens that are being supported throughout the country.

There are also projects such as the millennium awards scheme, which enables thousands of ordinary people to achieve extraordinary things. It has helped 10,000 people to date, aged between 16 and 92. Grants from the millennium festival fund will enable communities in villages and towns across the country to mark the millennium in their own special way. Two projects were opened to the public just last week—the new art gallery and conservation centre at the Peter Scott wildfowl and wetlands trust headquarters at Slimbridge in Gloucestershire and the access no barrier project, which is a centre providing facilities for the physically handicapped and able bodied club in Jarrow.

Of course the dome matters, but it matters because it is part of a wider entity, not because it is the entirety of what we are doing. Let us remember that four fifths of Millennium Commission funds are going to projects, events and people other than the dome.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): The right hon. Gentleman has made our point. Because everything has been so dome-centric, attention has not been drawn to all the other worthwhile and magnificent projects. With all their appalling handling of the situation, the Government have ensured that attention is focused on the dome. That has discredited the whole millennium exercise.

Mr. Smith: I hesitate to point out to the hon. Gentleman that it might have been better if the Opposition had tabled a motion about the entirety of the millennium celebrations, events and projects if that was how they felt.

It saddens me to hear the hon. Member for East Surrey criticising the project and trying to make the dome a partisan issue. One of the project's greatest strengths is that it has enjoyed good cross-party support. Neither the dome nor the other millennium projects should be seen as the property of one political party. The Conservatives are trying to do that. I am sorry that they are unable to feel some pride in their initiative to use part of the national lottery for millennium schemes. It was their idea to have a strand of lottery spending devoted to the millennium, their idea to establish the Millennium Commission and their idea to develop the dome. It is not, and should not be seen as, a political entity. The same is true of the other millennium projects and events. The aim of all the projects is to represent the aspirations of a nation and to provide an opportunity for enjoyment for communities and individuals across the UK.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I am sure that everyone applauds the successful millennium projects to which the Secretary of State has referred. What does he feel about the second millennium failure—the plastic cone-topped tower in Portsmouth? It has been four years in the planning with three false starts, but still there has been no contract, no planning permission and no works act, yet £14 million of lottery money is still tied up in the project. Will he give us an update on that project and tell us when it will be built?

Mr. Smith: I understand that the rest of the Portsmouth scheme, involving the rehabilitation of the waterfront, is forging ahead very well. The city council is in discussion with the Millennium Commission about the tower. It has some proposals that appear to be viable. They need to be tested but, if they are indeed found to be viable, they will be proceeded with.

The hon. Member for East Surrey talks about political interference in the project. I cannot accept that accusation. The Government are not running the millennium experience, nor should we be. The previous Government recognised the national significance of the project by appointing a Minister as sole shareholder of the operating company. We have retained that arrangement because we believe that it is right for a national project of this scale to be subject to proper parliamentary accountability.

It was important that the Minister holding the share should not be the same Minister as the one chairing the Millennium Commission—that is, myself—and ultimately providing the finance. As the New Millennium Experience Company shareholder, Lord Falconer is accountable to Parliament for the millennium experience. That means that he needs to take an active interest in the project's development and progress along its critical path, but that is very different from interfering in the day-to-day management, which is the responsibility of the NMEC board.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: How then does the Secretary of State explain the frustration and exasperation repeatedly expressed by Jennie Page about the constant, almost daily, interference by Ministers in affairs that she considered to be her own?

Mr. Smith: That is not something that she has ever said to me. If it had happened, it would have been regrettable; but it did not. The shareholder of the millennium experience set the overall parameters, along with the Millennium Commission, which is funding the project, but the day-to-day development and running of the experience are up to the board of the company and those running it. The Government believe in proper accountability, not unnecessary interference. We are not in the business of directly running visitor attractions.

I am proud to account for what has been achieved so far. Let us consider the first weekend: the turn of the millennium year. Well over 4.5 million people joined in the festivities in the 22 cities that received special grants from the commission to celebrate the run-up to, and the arrival of, 2000. As the report that I placed in the Library the other week shows, the celebrations were a great success and were well received by both those who attended and those who watched on television.

The dome opening celebrations involved more than 10,000 people, the majority members of the general public, and was viewed by 1 billion people on television around the world. The four millennium Church services on 2 January in London, Edinburgh, Cardiff and Belfast involved more than 5,000 people: members of communities and Christian congregations the length and breadth of the United Kingdom, as well as members of the royal family and both Government and Opposition Members of Parliament.

Mr. Ainsworth: Will the Secretary of State remind the House how much compensation was paid to those who had their evening spoilt on new year's eve?

Mr. Smith: If the hon. Gentleman will wait a moment, I am just about to come to that.

In addition to the millennium Church services on 2 January, the shared act of reflection and commitment by the faith communities of the UK, held in the Royal Gallery here at the Palace of Westminster the following day, was a very special and historic occasion, bringing together faith leaders and others from communities throughout the country to focus on the values that we need to shape society for the future.

Not surprisingly, there were a few glitches. Perhaps the most widely reported—or milked, depending on the agenda of those commenting—were the delays at Stratford tube station for those travelling to the dome for the opening celebrations. The arrangements for guests using Stratford did indeed go wrong. People should not have experienced the lengthy delays that they had to endure. Both NMEC and the Metropolitan police have apologised to those affected, and NMEC has offered—this is the answer to the question that the hon. Member for East Surrey asked—all those who used Stratford complimentary tickets for use during the year.

Despite the problems, virtually everyone enjoyed the evening, including many who travelled through Stratford. The millennium celebrations have continued since that first weekend. The dome opened its doors to its first paying visitors on 1 January. So far, 700,000 people have been, and the overwhelming verdict has been one of satisfaction and enjoyment. People like the dome.

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): To reinforce that point, a letter in the Brighton Evening Argus of 17 February says:

"I would like to put the record straight over the bad publicity concerning the Millennium Dome.

It is a great achievement to build such a modern building. It is impressive and functional.

It is a splendid exhibition centre with many interesting displays with something for everybody.

The afternoon spectacular show is really something worth seeing.

I shall go again and I am a senior citizen."

Is that not the true reason for the dome?

Mr. Smith: That is indeed the overwhelming verdict of those who go to the dome. Indeed, some primary school children from Hull visited the dome this very morning. Louis Dorton, who is 11, said:

"I loved it all, the show was absolutely terrific, it's the best thing I've ever seen."

Kimberley Barlow, who is 10, said:

"The millennium show was amazing—the gymnasts are incredible and I don't know how they manage half the things they do. I'm amazed at it all."

Time after time, those are the sort of comments that people who visit the dome make about their visit.

Despite what the media and some politicians may say, people who visit the dome thoroughly enjoy it and most would recommend it to their friends. Of course, the dome is not the first example of the professional critics misjudging the public's reaction; nor is the visiting public's positive feedback some kind of hyped-up spin from NMEC or the Government: it is more than borne out by independent polls commissioned by the very newspapers that in the same breath criticise the dome.

The Sunday Times found that 85 per cent. of visitors said that they had enjoyed their visit to the dome and 74 per cent. would recommend it to their friends; a poll in The Mirror found that 71 per cent. rated the dome as "good" or "very good"; Independent Television News found that 91 per cent. of those interviewed thought the dome worth the trip; and 61 per cent. of those interviewed by The Independent thought the dome and its contents spectacular. That same poll found that 0 per cent. thought it dull, yet in the self-same edition of the self-same paper, the leading article asked why so many people found the dome dull.

When I visited the dome myself as a paying visitor on Saturday—and had an extremely enjoyable time—it was obvious that the very large number of people there were enjoying themselves; quite a few of them came up to me to make that very point.

With immaculate timing, as always, the Opposition have called for this debate at the very time when we have had the four best-ever days of attendance at the dome. On Friday, there were 27,000 visitors; on Saturday, 24,700; on Sunday, 26,200; and this morning the dome was totally sold out by 11.30.

The hon. Member for East Surrey mentioned the recent change of chief executive at NMEC and the resignation of the operations director. The House will be aware that Jennie Page stood down as chief executive earlier this month. The NMEC board has appointed P-Y Gerbeau to succeed her, reflecting the view that a different set of skills was needed to manage the project during its year of operation. I will comment in a moment about Mr. Gerbeau's appointment, but I wish to pause briefly to reflect on Jennie's achievements on the project.

When Jennie accepted the post of chief executive of the then Millennium Central Ltd., three years ago, many people thought that completing the dome on time and on budget was an impossible task. Indeed, many thought the same when she previously took on the post of chief executive of the Millennium Commission. Both tasks required a unique vision and both required commitment, dedication and determination—skills that Jennie has in spades. Jennie met both of those challenges with her customary enthusiasm, intelligence and style. To build the dome on time and on budget was an enormous task in anybody's book. To do all of that under the intense scrutiny of both the media and Parliament was even more of a challenge, but it was a challenge to which Jennie was more than equal and I wish to put firmly on record my gratitude for her tremendous achievement in bringing the project to fruition.

The NMEC board's decision to appoint Mr. Gerbeau in no way detracts from Jennie's achievements. I can tell the hon. Member for East Surrey that it was a decision of the board. In answer to his specific question, Lord Falconer did telephone sponsors on Friday 4 February. He informed them that P-Y Gerbeau would replace Jennie Page and he indicated that P-Y was part of the team who turned round Disney in Paris.

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Smith: No, I must make progress. The board believed that running a major visitor attraction required very different skills from those required to take that unique project from concept through development of content, including the national programme linked to the dome, to construction and fit-out of the dome itself. P-Y Gerbeau's experience as part of the Disney team will help to deliver the visitor experience that the visiting public anticipate. He has been in the job for two weeks and already decisions have been taken to improve signing, to provide more entertainment for visitors between the zones, to develop more activity in the central arena, to provide a better management of visitor flows, and to bring in greater flexibility in ticketing and marketing.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the additional grant that the Millennium Commission has agreed to make available to NMEC to help with its cash-flow requirements in the early months of this year. As the House is aware, I am the chairman of the commission. The commission has recognised from the outset that cash-flow difficulties are often associated with large-scale start-up businesses. Provisions to deal with such potential difficulties in the case of the dome always formed part of the arrangements between the commission and NMEC. The commission has therefore agreed to provide up to £60 million in additional cash-flow support, subject to demonstration of need and to vigorous appraisal.

The commission has so far released £32 million of additional repayable grant in that way. The release of the remainder will similarly be in accordance only with demonstrable need. Both NMEC and the commission keep the company's budgets, commercial plans and operational strategies under review and the latest such appraisal by the commission will be completed shortly. The final decision on how much additional cashflow support might in fact be needed, and when it should be paid, will be taken in the light of that appraisal.

In all this, let us not forget that, even before it opened, the dome had already made a major impact on the economy of the local area. Thanks to the dome, one of the poorest areas of the country has undergone a transformation. The dome has been a catalyst for a whole range of environmental and infrastructural improvements that will leave a very tangible and lasting legacy for the people of Greenwich and the wider United Kingdom. A derelict gasworks site has been cleaned up, in what is widely recognised as a model for brownfield site development across Europe. One can now travel between central London and the north Greenwich peninsula on the new Jubilee line extension in only 12 minutes and the new river boat services have once again brought the Thames into play as one of the great communication links of the capital. We have the new millennium village, with its mix of social and commercial housing and its modern, energy-efficient designs, and £300 million to £500 million extra tourist spend is expected across the UK this year as a direct result of the dome, with a halo effect of double that.

Regeneration is not just about money and places: it is about people. Perhaps the greatest testimony to the dome is that it has been the catalyst for the creation of around 13,000 jobs, both in itself and in the developments around it on the peninsula. The impact that those have made and will continue to make on the life of the community is, in my mind, far more important than the empty whingeing from the Opposition. The millennium celebrations are about making a real difference to the lives of the people of this country, through jobs, through boosts to the economy and through regeneration. That is what is at stake and that is what we should focus on tonight. Anything that can have such an enormous positive impact on the life of both its local community and the national economy should be encouraged, not knocked. We need to stop talking it down, get behind the project, give our full support to the NMEC team at the dome and together make it work.

[Mr. Smith]

8.26 pm

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): I am grateful to be called. The House will know that it is now some years since my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), the former Prime Minister, invited me to become a member of the Millennium Commission. As the House will also know, the commission was one of the distributor bodies set up under the previous Government to distribute funds gathered by the national lottery. It cannot be disputed that there has never been such an infusion of funds into good causes—the charities, arts, heritage, culture and sport—under any Government policy ever initiated in this country at any time in our history. That is a proud claim to make on behalf of a policy initiative by my right hon. Friend.

Part of my right hon. Friend's vision was that it should be an all-party concept, and when the Millennium Commission was set up under the chairmanship of the responsible Minister at the time, a representative of the Labour party, the late Michael Montague, was invited to join the commission to ensure that it was conducted on an all-party basis. There has never been a party political discussion in the commission. Having attended meetings for some years, I do not even know the party choices of the members of the commission. They have not been relevant to our deliberations.

The decision to attempt a great celebration was predictably controversial. The Great Exhibition of 1851 was stopped in its tracks by Tory Members of Parliament who complained about the design, which led to the redesign by Paxton that enabled the project to proceed. The 1951 celebration, the Festival of Britain, was equally controversial and, on a tiny and humble scale, the Liverpool garden festival, for which I was responsible in the early 1980s, was treated precisely the same way as we anticipated the dome would be. And so it has been. As the Secretary of State said, the dome was designed to be an all-party statement about Britain's prowess. That was the context of the birth pains that such projects characteristically undergo in this country.

Looking back, I remember that people said we would never do it, but we did. They said that we would never do it to cost or to time, but we did. The headlines screamed that we would never get the Jubilee line open and that no one would be able to get to the dome, but the line did open and people are getting to the dome. At every turn, the whole process has been attacked—ruthlessly and irresponsibly—by the national press. Unlike many hon. Members, I have spent my life in the commercial world launching projects. I know that they are always a risk, that there is always, by definition, an element of unpredictability, and that things go wrong. In my experience, it is impossible to conceive that a project could be successful if every question were asked at every stage, and if those managing the project were held to every decision that they ever took.

The most obvious example involves the project's sponsorship. It fell to my noble Friend Lord Levene to help in raising the money. He and I advised the commission that we thought that we could raise £150 million. From that moment, the media rendered that task well nigh impossible. Every time we opened our mouths, we were asked whether we had secured the money—if we said, "Not yet," the headlines claimed that we had failed to get the money. When asked how much we had secured, we would say that we had a list of prospects, that some were firm, some less so, and that we still had to talk to some of them. The press response then was to ask, "So you haven't got anything you can prove?" We had to admit that we had not, and from that moment on the attacks began to build.

As confidence began to be undermined, a number of company chairman who had been broadly sympathetic to our aims asked how they could continue with the project. They said that their under-managers believed that their companies would be made laughing stocks, and the same questions were asked—about value for money, about whether the dome would be ready on time, and about how people would get there. On and on it went: I believe that our national press cost the project at least tens of millions of pounds in lost sponsorship because of the uncertainties that were built up into crises.

In the event, Lord Levene and I secured more than £150 million, as we had always believed we would. However, problems remain. Some sponsors have not paid yet: although the sponsoring companies' chairmen came on board with good will, their underlings tried almost immediately to turn the zone that was being sponsored into something closer to a trade show than the editorial concept behind the project allowed. So the process unfolded.

The present Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), was accused of being obsessively secretive. I find that hard to recognise: every Tuesday, Simon Jenkins, my fellow commissioner and a former editor of The Times and the Evening Standard and I met the right hon. Gentleman and subsequently his successor, Lord Falconer, to go through every relevant detail about the dome. My right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) and my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) were invited, on various occasions, to see the same presentations that we had seen. I can only assume that they took advantage of those offers and were relatively content with what they witnessed. Therefore, I do not believe that there was excessive secrecy.

Mr. Baker: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) did not utter a word in the Chamber about the project for many months into the life of this Parliament? In fact, no debate was held on the subject until 1998, and the then Minister with responsibility for the dome was required only to answer questions before the House for five minutes once a month. That hardly amounted to parliamentary accountability.

Mr. Heseltine: It is within the gift of opposition parties, if they feel that they are not getting the answers that they need, to hold debates on matters of their choosing. In fairness, I must admit that I would not have wanted to debate the matter either. How can a project of such complexity and sophistication be debated as it unfolds? How seriously can people be expected to pin down answers?

Before the House becomes convinced of how it will determine the outcome of tonight's debate, I suggest that hon. Members consider two other great projects undertaken in this country on the same time scale. First, Covent Garden opera house has been rebuilt, and is now one of the great opera houses in the world—and the clamour for it to be closed because of teething troubles has now gone. Secondly, the millennium wheel is one of the most inventive tourist attractions ever created in this country, but its builders had to delay its opening for a month until they could be sure that it would work safely. The fact is that things go wrong with great projects. I would be the first to say that there have been plenty of examples of things going wrong, and the Secretary of State has mentioned some of them. There was the catastrophic opening evening, with the Stratford delay. The fact is, we must look at these matters in context.

The dome is now operating, and the numbers of people visiting it are building significantly. My hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey spoke of a test on an internet website regarding people's view of the dome. As I listened, it occurred to me that that was a fairly narrow test of opinion. How many people in this country are able to access the internet? Who will bother to access it? It would be more realistic if all the national newspapers, which have headlined the weaknesses all the way through in the polls to which the Secretary of State has referred, revealed that the majority of people going to the dome like it, and think it well worth while. How is it that that view is never flavoured in the headlines of the same newspapers, which go on repeating the same arguments that they have run ever since the concept was initiated some years ago?

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: There may be a misunderstanding. The poll to which I referred dealt with the public's attitude towards value for money, not with their reaction to a day at the dome.

Mr. Heseltine: I understood the point that my hon. Friend was making, but I remain where I began. What sort of people would go to the trouble of accessing that site and from what sort of background would they come? Do they meet the test that we faced, as millennium commissioners, of providing an experience that was not just entertaining but educational, and would appeal to the majority of people? How does one appeal to elderly people who are retired, to young people, to children and to middle-aged people and avoid the charge of producing something that is relatively wide in its appeal as opposed to narrow and intellectually excellent?

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): Might I help the right hon. Gentleman and suggest that the kind of people who would access that dome site are sitting on the Conservative Benches? They clearly do not have the ability to look much further than what is being projected on to that dome site by some very sad people.

Mr. Heseltine: Before the hon. Lady gets carried away, if she has criticisms of my hon. Friends, she should have listened to what her party was like in opposition. The lengths to which they went to exploit difficulties made what we have heard today seem as nothing.

There is one point on which I would like to follow the Secretary of State. Jennie Page has been replaced, following her resignation as chief executive. I have known Jennie Page since her days at English Heritage, and then as chief executive of the Millennium Commission. She is, in my view, one of the outstanding public servants of her day. The fact that her arrangements were terminated, with or without agreement, by the New Millennium Experience Company, is a matter of the most profound regret. However, that does not make it the wrong decision in the circumstances.

Jennie Page confounded the critics and delivered the project to time and to budget. As the great civil servant that she is, she had to assess a whole range of conflicting professional advice and to take from that the means by which the project was delivered. That is a different skill from feeling in one's bones, from long personal experience, how to deal with day-to-day problems. The board could well have felt that someone who was not reliant upon outside expertise but who had hands-on personal experience was needed to cope with the teething problems. It would be very difficult to run those two people in harness. Jennie Page is nothing if not a determined and extremely talented deliverer of results. Those results are in the classic public sector mould, and I have not the slightest doubt that her future career in the public sector will build on the excellence of what she has achieved to date.

I have one last point to make, and it is the last point to which the Secretary of State referred. In 1979, I looked with horror at the east end of London. The Labour-dominated Greater London council and the Labour-dominated London boroughs had ensured that there were thousands and thousands of acres of derelict land, apparently with no future. The Government of whom I was a member took over some 6,000 acres on the north bank of the Thames. We left untouched, at the express request of the London borough of Greenwich, the 300 acres of dereliction now known as the dome site.

When I returned to the then Department of the Environment in 1990, that land was as derelict as it had been in 1979. On my best judgment, derelict it would have remained if we had not taken a decision to enable English Partnerships to acquire the site, clear the toxic waste and give the land a hope of life. It is today a site of huge potential. Once again, the critics have been confounded. Far from having no use for the dome, we are besieged by people who seek to acquire it for after-use. I do not know what decision will be made, but those of us who backed the concept from the beginning always believed that if we had the faith to see it through, it would deliver a massive surge of regeneration in that important and historic part of London.

The dome is a national project. It is important in the eyes of both the British people and the world. Everyone knows what we have invested in the project. We must be seen to support it and to give it every chance to be the success that I have always believed, and still believe, it will prove to be.

8.41 pm

Mr. Clive Efford (Eltham): I must respond to the final point made by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) by saying that the Greenwich peninsula was never in the ownership of the London borough of Greenwich. The site was heavily contaminated and the cost of clearing and decontaminating it had always prevented development. That is the historical reason why the site remained derelict for 20 years.

When the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) opened for the Opposition, he said nothing positive about the dome. However, the project was bipartisan from the outset. It was conceived under the previous Conservative Government, and I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Henley and others for their bravery in supporting it from an early stage. I recall attending a reception on the Cutty Sark at Greenwich almost a decade ago, when I was a councillor, and I spoke with the world's media about the potential of Greenwich for millennium celebrations. We discussed the possibility of regenerating the site, but we knew it would take a scheme of the magnitude of the millennium experience to generate enough investment to clear the site for development and regeneration.

Those 300 acres were London's largest derelict waterfront site, and they had been empty for 20 years. Greenwich is within the Thames gateway area, which includes seven of the 20 poorest boroughs in the country. One third of London's unemployed live in the gateway area. The dome was initially intended to create 7,000 jobs, but by the end of the year it is expected to have created about 25,000. Between 1991 and 1993, Greenwich lost 500 businesses and more than 10,000 manufacturing jobs. Regeneration of the millennium project site was much needed.

The wider benefits of the millennium project were never forgotten during its development. The masts that have become such a feature of the dome were built by a steel company based in Bolton and Bristol. That company provided 1,600 tonnes of steel and 70 km of steel cabling. Construction contracts for £38 million were issued throughout London. A further £9.6 million was spent on labour. Construction contracts issued throughout the rest of the country totalled £130 million.

During the construction of the dome, the long-term benefits were also considered. The British Tourist Authority estimated that the millennium experience could generate up to £500 million from additional overseas visitors, and that the halo market effect would be £1 billion. Tourism is among the five largest UK industries; it is worth £40 billion a year.

South-east London lacked the infrastructure enjoyed by many other parts of the capital. We did not have direct access to the London underground. Anyone travelling to central London from north Kent, east Sussex or south-east London had to rely heavily on the rail network. Buses were not seen as an option because of heavy traffic congestion—which grew during the 18 years of the Conservative Government.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who was until recently the shadow Transport spokesman wrote an article in The Guardian in which he criticised the dome because it was not possible to reach it by car. People in my constituency think that is one of the benefits of the scheme. Obviously, the right hon. Gentleman has never tried to drive through Greenwich during peak periods. Visitors to the dome will have to do that if they are to spend a full day there. Commuters who queue to go through the Blackwall tunnel every morning will be mindful of the fact that they would be enjoying the company of several thousand car users trying to get to the Greenwich waterfront if the Conservatives had won the last election.

The dome will be a major attraction for many years to come. The transport scheme will benefit south-east London and the dome for a long time. A huge car park on the Greenwich peninsula would have encouraged people to bring their cars and ignore the public transport alternatives. Even the Conservative Government acknowledged the need to limit out-of-town developments when they changed planning guidance in order to restrict car use in new shopping developments and encourage greater use of public transport.

People who visit the dome do not want a long traffic queue to be the beginning of their millennium experience—or of future events that may take place in the dome.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Looking to the future and to the success of the dome in its passage to other hands, does my hon. Friend agree that the funds generated could be redeployed—perhaps to the midlands or the north-west—where the dome should have been built in the first place?

Mr. Efford: I have already explained why it was necessary to build the dome in Greenwich—the place that gave its name to the way in which we record time. In my opinion and that of my former colleagues on Greenwich council, that was the only site for the millennium experience.

The Jubilee line extension brings enormous benefits to south-east London. It will be available for future generations of people who want access to jobs in the east London corridor. For far too long, people in south-east London have been forced to rely solely on rail services or to undertake long car journeys. Moving around the perimeter of London has meant either a long bus ride or a train journey into and out of central London. The opening of North Greenwich station and the extension of the docklands light railway to south-east London offers many public transport options for people in the area, and will assist in minimising the traffic that has blighted it for far too long.

People in my area are very concerned about the dome's future. The dome has created many jobs in south-east London, and the prospects for its future use concern them greatly. I have recently raised with London Regional Transport issues to do with its transport planning and the way that it has linked other parts of south-east London and the south-east with the new options that have been created by the extension of the new transport links. The prospects for employment in the area are extensive as a result of the development that is taking place along the entire river frontage.

The dome has been a victim of its own success. Initially, the headlines were about the length of time that it was taking to queue for the attractions—there was no suggestion that too few people were making it to the dome to enjoy a day out. Then the headlines focused on the fact that there were not enough people at the dome to form a queue of any sort. I understand that today the reports are that people are complaining that they turned up at the dome to buy a ticket and were unable to do so. I have to conclude that, whatever happens at the dome, it will never be reported as a success.

The attendance figures for January need to be viewed in perspective. All the large theme parks with which the dome has been compared do not open at this time of year. Nevertheless, attendance figures for the first week in February show that 105,000 people attended the dome, and that figure has shown a steady increase despite the amount of negative publicity that there has been recently.

As the Secretary of State said, in the last four days 25,000 to 26,000 people have attended the dome, which means that it has reached almost capacity every single day. We need to put those statistics in perspective and consider the prospects for the dome in an entire year. The hon. Member for East Surrey has taken the opportunity to criticise the Government while few people are attending the dome, but he has not taken into account the forecast attendance figures for an entire year. He should focus on the forecasts to assess whether the dome will be a success in the long term.

The Secretary of State drew attention to surveys of those visiting the dome. The London tourist board surveyed visitors from abroad to London during the last summer period. It found that eight out of 10 of those who were planning to return to London next summer intended to visit the dome. The dome also compares favourably with all other major attractions in London. In a recent MORI poll undertaken on behalf of the New Millennium Experience Company, 82 per cent. of those interviewed said that they were very satisfied or fairly satisfied with the new millennium dome.

The Opposition are attempting to fill the void that is left by their total lack of any coherent set of policies. The dome is a success. It now features on many corporations' logos. It features in the work of the advertising industry, which would not associate itself with something that is likely to be a failure.

Visitors continue to vote with their feet and express their approval on leaving the dome. We should celebrate this achievement and seek to maximise its benefits instead of continuing to undermine it. We should also seek to enhance the regeneration benefits that it has brought to an important area in south-east London.

8.54 pm

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): The Secretary of State—who, sadly, is not in the Chamber at the moment—said that the dome should not be a partisan issue. He implied that anyone who had criticisms of it was in some way disloyal to the country, which has the dome as its national icon as part of the millennium celebrations. I hope that he will accept that Liberal Democrats try to judge the issues on their merits. Earlier, I gave warm support to his statement on the funding of the BBC, which contrasts with the comments that were made by Tory Members.

It is no use saying that those who have qualms about the dome must be quiet or that they are somehow being disloyal. Questions need to be answered and they relate to the Government's performance on the issue. I hope that they will answer the questions rather than seek to portray those who have queries as being disloyal.

The Conservative party was right to call this debate. It was right because we have not had proper parliamentary scrutiny of the issue since day one. The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) said that there has been no secrecy and that everything was properly accountable However, from the time when the Prime Minister gave the green light to the dome project on 19 June 1997, we had to wait months for the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), who was then responsible for the dome, even to turn up in the Chamber. He went more than a year without saying a word here. After intense pressure from the media, me and others, we finally received a five-minute question session to deal with the millennium dome. The time was eventually extended to 10 minutes and the first debate took place only in 1998. We cannot say that the issue has received proper parliamentary scrutiny.

This is the first debate that we have had since the dome opened, and it is been called on an Opposition day. The Government have not made statements on what happened on 31 December or on any other event related to the dome, despite the fact that we are told that it is so important. The Government cannot have it both ways. They have been happy to take the credit for the dome where appropriate, but they are happy to run away when problems occur with its running.

Secrecy has been a feature from the beginning. In January 1998, a Labour Member, the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), called for details of spending on the dome to be published each month. That was refused. My constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), also called for the dome's cash-flow forecasts to be published on a monthly basis. That was refused.

I and others have asked countless parliamentary questions, but they have simply not been answered, on the so-called ground of commercial confidentiality. Any student of Westminster will say that that is the easiest way for a Government to avoid answering parliamentary questions.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): Just the hon. Gentleman's questions.

Mr. Baker: No, not just my questions, but questions from many Members. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should read Hansard more closely.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Janet Anderson): I remind the hon. Gentleman that, when he was going through one of his bouts of asking many questions about the dome, I took the trouble to invite him to meet my officials and members of the New Millennium Experience Company, so that they could answer his questions. Will he now kindly acknowledge that offer?

Mr. Baker: I am happy to acknowledge it. However, I point out that there is a difference between off-the-record briefings behind closed doors and proper parliamentary scrutiny on the record and in the House.

[Mr. Baker]

The questions that have been answered on the record have not been answered fully. I asked one question in November and another in December. Both received holding answers and, when they were finally answered at some length in late December, they received exactly the same answer even though my questions were totally different. Someone pressed the button for the acceptable form of words for that month, and the same answer came out.

I have also asked the Minister about the tendency for so many questions to receive holding answers. When I asked her how many holding answers had been issued, she told me that she would reply to me shortly. In other words, that was a holding answer to a holding answer.

The Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport has also examined the matter. It has said that getting information about the dome is "akin to drawing teeth" and that it is "not so much a journey through time as a journey into the unknown."

Mr. Bermingham: If, like many of us, the hon. Gentleman had been in the House before 1997, he would have known that formal and informal discussions went on about the dome. There were arguments about its location, cost and everything else. Does not the hon. Gentleman appreciate that once a commercial operation is up and running, there is a need for confidentiality? That is simple common sense, and to carp and gripe from ignorance is not very edifying.

Mr. Baker: There are occasions when certain matters have to be kept confidential, but that excuse has been used to refuse an answer to many legitimate questions asked by hon. Members—including Labour Members who do not share the hon. Gentleman's rather rosy view.

When the Government committed themselves to the dome project in June 1997, they set five conditions: it would result in no extra burden on the public purse; its content would entertain and inspire; it would be a truly national event; it would provide a lasting legacy; and the management structure of the operating company would be strengthened. There was, incidentally, no mention of jobs or the benefit to Greenwich. I accept that Greenwich has benefited and that jobs have been created, but that was not one of the five conditions that the Government imposed when they decided to go ahead.

The key to this multi-million pound project has been private sector sponsorship. There has been confusion about exactly what has been promised to the sponsors and exactly how much they have paid. Those are more unanswered questions that ought to be cleared up by the Minister in her response. For example, in answer to a parliamentary question on 24 February 1998—two years ago this Thursday—the then Minister responsible, the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), told the House that the NMEC had that day announced the first four sponsors, and the list included Sky. In a parliamentary answer of 3 December 1998, he confirmed a number of sponsors, including Boots the Chemist and Sky.

On 31 January this year, the Under-Secretary, who has inherited this portfolio, revealed that three sponsors have not yet signed on the dotted line, including Boots the Chemist and Sky. The same three companies were named in a parliamentary question that I asked on 11 February, and again it was confirmed that they had not signed. That was confirmed again on 14 February.

Why have those companies, which were confirmed as sponsors two years ago, not yet signed on the dotted line? What reservations do they have? What are they trying to extract before they sign? Is there any doubt about whether they will hand over the money? If there is no doubt, why have they not signed and why have they not paid the money? The Minister must answer those questions. It is simply not good enough for Ministers to try to duck them and to set a loyalty test in respect of the dome.

On 31 January this year, the Under-Secretary said on sponsorship:

"we are confident that contractual arrangements will be finalised in the very near future."—[Official Report, 31 January 2000; Vol. 343, c. 476W.]

Perhaps we can find out what the Government mean by "very near future". Is that an early pledge that those sponsors will be providing money for the dome?

Mars, which is another sponsor that has not signed, and Boots use the dome and millennium experience logo on their products. Perhaps Sky does too. Why should they be able to use that marque when they have not handed over the money? In the meantime, who is stumping up the cash to make up the shortfall or cash-flow problems that the sponsors are causing by not handing over the money?

We are told that the dome is a massive success, that people think it wonderful and that everybody is flocking to it. The average number of visitors in January was 11,820 a day. If that rate continues, the dome will attract only 4,000,300 people over the year. That would fall short not only of the long established visitor target of 12 million this year, but of the new target—I wonder where it has emerged from—of 10 million. The 10 million target will still require an average of more than 27,000 visitors a day, which answers the point made by the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford), who was saying what a great success the dome is. It will not reach the new target, even with this weekend's performance.

Mr. Efford: Does not the hon. Gentleman accept that this is a quiet time of year for tourism? Most of the country's major attractions are not open, but the millennium dome is achieving high attendances. Would the hon. Gentleman care to comment on that and explain to the House what he would consider success for the dome?

Mr. Baker: I am happy to deal with that point. Given the hype, the attraction and all the newspaper coverage, positive and negative, nobody could be unaware of the millennium dome. I should have thought that those who wanted to visit it would be queueing up in January, when it was allegedly quiet; January should have been a good month for the dome, not a poor one.

Will the Minister clear up the question of the target number of visitors? The target was 12 million. In a letter dated 6 December to the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones), the Under-Secretary wrote:

"I am confident that NMEC will achieve its 12 million visitor target and that the resulting income targets will be met enabling the project, over its lifetime, to be delivered within the £758 million cash budget set for it in February 1997."

As recently as 6 December, the Minister was committed to a 12 million target. Why has that target now been dropped to 10 million? Who dropped it? Is that based on revised expectations of the number of visitors who will attend, or is there some other explanation?

Is it not true that the Minister and those involved in the dome are trying to drop the target so that they can, at the end of the year, claim that it has been met? Is there to be a further drop to 8 million later this year? According to the Financial Times, 75,000 visitors made it to the dome between Friday and Sunday, which makes it the best weekend yet. However, even if that success were repeated every day this year, the number of visitors would not reach 10 million over the year.

I shall not dwell on the troubles of the opening night, which have been well rehearsed both in the debate and in the newspapers, but I am concerned about the questions surrounding the management of the dome. Why, despite the fact that visitors are not turning up in the expected numbers, are there long queues, at least for certain zones? Those are apparently now being sorted out by the repair man from France, Mr. Gerbeau. On the issue of repairs, he might like to deal with the broken exhibits listed a week ago by The Times, whose impromptu survey found 10 exhibits broken in the living island zone; three in the work zone; 2,000 robots—the majority—not working in the mind zone; 18 exhibits broken in the learning zone; nine broken in the money zone; and the heart beat irregular in the body zone. All that suggests that the repair man from Disneyland is needed.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that one of the exhibits that has broken down is a laughing toilet bowl? I am pleased to report that it is being repaired and, in the meantime, a life-sized sculpture of a rhinoceros has been erected. Does he agree that the rhinoceros is an admirable symbol for the dome, given that it is known for its lack of vision and its tendency to charge a lot?

Mr. Baker: With my animal welfare hat on, I am tempted to agree with the hon. Gentleman, but I should perhaps leave that matter to one side.

It was said that the dome would be a truly national event, yet only 34 per cent. of visitors have come from outside London, with only 5 per cent. coming from northern England, 2 per cent. from Scotland and fewer than 1.5 per cent. from Wales and Northern Ireland combined.

There was a fiasco about the dismissal—let us be frank, it was a dismissal—of Jennie Page. We have been told tonight that she was wonderful, fantastic, the best thing since sliced bread; but if she was so good and we owe her so much, why was she dumped out on her ear and left to cry in her office? Was it treachery, or was she not as good as has been suggested? If she was that good, she should not have been treated in that manner. Is it not the truth that the sponsors are in control and they demanded her head on a plate?

Mr. Bermingham: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have two questions. First, is it not a convention of the House that hon. Members do not attack people who cannot reply for themselves? Secondly, is it not the case that we do not read speeches unless they have been circulated in advance?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): First, there is no question of a person outside the House being attacked. Secondly, no Standing Order states that speeches may not be read, but "Erskine May" has something helpful to say on the subject and I should be pleased if more hon. Members read it.

Mr. Baker: For the record, I am not reading a speech; I am reading notes and improvising as I go along. Other Front Benchers have the benefit of the Dispatch Box on which to rest their notes, but that facility is not currently available to the Liberal Democrats. Let us hope that it will be when the House is reconstituted after the next election—but that is another debate.

The dome is architecturally a great achievement. The Jubilee line extension and the tube station there are great achievements, as is Westminster station. The staff at the dome are extremely friendly and helpful. However, the dome lacks cohesion, because the entire process has been driven by a small clique which started under the Conservative Government and continues under the present Government. Decisions are taken behind closed doors. It is not a people's dome; it is the dome of a small clique.

Mr. Efford: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Baker: No, I shall finish my remarks.

If a committee designs an animal, it comes up with a camel. The dome is all right, but it could have been so much better. It is not worth £758 million. It is not the icon that it has been talked up to be. The Government are not wholly responsible for that, but they had a role in it. Some serious questions have been asked in the House tonight, which the Minister has a duty to answer when she comes to the Dispatch Box.

9.10 pm

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): I am amazed by the Opposition's choice of subject for this debate. It represents political opportunism of the worst kind on the part of the Conservatives. They are exploiting what was a cross-party venture, yet apart from the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Faber) who has just wandered in, there were at one point in the debate only three hon. Members sitting on the Opposition Benches, including the Front Bench. That is rather strange. The Opposition initiated the debate, yet as a party they have no interest in attending or speaking in it.

The one speech that we heard from the Conservative Benches, from the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), was positive in tone. It took a great deal of courage for the right hon. Gentleman to make that speech.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye): Was not the great distance between the right hon. Member for Henley and the rest of the Conservative party also significant?

Ms Ward: The right hon. Gentleman, who unfortunately is not present, is distant from his party not only on the subject of the dome, but on Europe, I am pleased to say.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) spoke about parliamentary scrutiny. Perhaps he has forgotten that the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport held a number of inquiries into the millennium dome. There is no doubt that parliamentary scrutiny took place; there was even a debate in the Chamber on one of the Select Committee's reports.

Those of us who started off with a degree of scepticism—I include myself among them—have been convinced by the project. As a member of the Select Committee, I was involved in quizzing the right hon. Member for Henley intensely on his ideas for the dome. At that time, I was not impressed, but as the project progressed over the past two to three years, it has developed into a good project that is right for the country.

It is right that we should have a focal point for the millennium, and there is no doubt that the millennium dome provides that focal point. We should be proud that the project has been delivered to target, on time and within the budget that was set. It was built with public money, not taxpayers' money, and that represents only one fifth of the total amount of money available to the Millennium Commission.

Whether or not hon. Members supported the millennium dome project at the beginning is no longer the issue. The dome exists, and it is viewed around the world as an emblem of Britain. We must make it work. No matter what the views were before, it is important to ensure that it does not fail now. That would not be in the interests of the lottery players who contributed the money. It is not in the country's interests for the dome to be perceived as failing when we are the focus of world attention. I hope that Opposition Members will reconsider their views.

Mr. Pound: France marked the millennium with the partial sponsorship of a yacht race, and in Germany there was a trade fair. Can my hon. Friend imagine the reaction of her constituents, mine and the people of this nation, if we had not had such an achievement as the dome?

Ms Ward: There were mixed reactions to the millennium dome in my constituency, as there were in my hon. Friend's. However, there are mixed reactions to a range of lottery projects. It is important that as well as providing a national focal point, the Millennium Commission funded a range of initiatives around the country that allowed people to celebrate the millennium in their communities.

The millennium dome has meant investment in what was a waste site in Greenwich, provided thousands of jobs and played an important part in regenerating that area. No one can deny that the dome has had a difficult start. We should not make excuses for the mishaps on the opening night. It is unacceptable for people to be kept waiting at Stratford station and not to receive their tickets on time. However, one incident is not a reason to criticise the dome for the rest of the year. Perhaps the lesson that we should learn is that it is not good public relations to keep six newspaper editors and their families waiting in the cold.

Some people have always wanted the millennium dome to fail. No matter what happened on millennium eve, the dome would have had its critics. It was interesting to read the newspapers in the first few days and weeks when the millennium dome was open. First, they criticised the queues and the fact that people had to wait a long time. Then they criticised the dome for being empty. Newspapers cannot have it both ways. The dome is either a popular attraction that people want to visit—in which case, queues are to be expected—

Mr. Baker: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Ward: I shall not give way, because of lack of time.

I challenge those who have criticised the queues to compare the dome with other attractions in the United Kingdom at this time of year. I have recommended that my friends not visit the dome in January, February or March, but wait until later, when the weather will be much better and the dome will have an improved programme in the form of other facilities that will be open on the site.

It was interesting to note the names of the six Opposition Members who tabled the motion. Only one of them is present at the moment. I wonder how many of them have visited the dome apart from on millennium eve, when, as I found, there was no opportunity to view all the zones. If those Opposition Members had visited the dome apart from on millennium eve, they would have realised that the proof of the pudding is in the eating, or in a day at the dome.

The independent MORI survey showed that 83 per cent. of those polled were very or fairly satisfied, and that 68 per cent. believed that the dome represented very or fairly good value for money. Furthermore, 26 per cent. of those questioned believed that the dome was much better than expected, 23 per cent. believed that it was somewhat better and 25 per cent. believed that it was about the same as they had expected. Many attractions in the United Kingdom would love to achieve such a response. More than half those questioned would definitely recommend a visit to the dome to a friend, a further quarter would probably do so and 92 per cent. rated the show in the centre good or very good.

Mr. David Faber (Westbury): If the hon. Lady thinks that the dome is such a success and everything is going so well at the moment, why did she and her fellow Labour MPs on the Select Committee reject my suggestion last week that we should reconsider it immediately?

Ms Ward: The hon. Gentleman knows very well why we decided not to hold another inquiry into the millennium dome. That is not to say that the Select Committee will not hold an inquiry—it has been said that we will and I am confident that one will take place—but this is not the right time. We should not hold an inquiry until we have considered both P-Y Gerbeau's new administration in office and the figures over a more reasonable period. The hon. Gentleman accepted that argument at the Select Committee meeting and I am most surprised that he has raised it in an attempt to cause difficulty. I am afraid that that will not work.

People of a good mix of ages have visited the millennium dome, and its links to the community—for example, the McDonald's our town and the Tesco school net—all show that it is a success and will continue to be so, no matter what the Opposition and one or two newspaper editors think. There are 10 months to go, and P-Y Gerbeau should have the nation's backing to make the project work.

I trust that hon. Members on both sides of the House will leave politics outside the dome and consider it a national event deserving of cross-party support, as at the beginning. The Conservatives had the original idea and I invite Opposition Members to listen to the right hon. Member for Henley and provide cross-party support where it is needed.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): I confess to feeling a certain air of surrealism because the debate has been conducted largely in terms that might apply to a bingo parlour: it is marvellous that the dome got up on time, or a little dangerous that it took rather long; it is splendid that so many people visited, or a pity that so few attended. The same might be said of a popular television series or some such thing, but remarkably this particular object is not like such a series or a bingo hall. [Interruption.] I say to hon. Members who are amusing themselves that I do not have an interest in either of those items so I have probably used the wrong terms for them. However, the point is valid.

Ms Ward: Has the hon. Gentleman been to the dome?

Mr. Letwin: No, no. Not only have I not visited the dome, but I have absolutely no intention of doing so under any circumstances. I shall explain why.

The remarkable thing about these populist events, whose success or failure can be measured in terms of the number of people who do or do not visit them, is that people pay to see them and do so because they like them. I do not happen to like them. The public and the sponsors between them have not contributed £750 million. I know that we live in an age of inflation and that the Chancellor is spending an ever-greater proportion of our gross domestic product on numerous matters, but £750 million still strikes me as a lot of money. Were it invested, it would yield about £60 million a year on a modest appreciation. What would that sum support? Many things could be mentioned, but I want to attend to one in particular.

The Secretary of State, many Members on both sides of the House and I attended Cambridge university. What does it receive from the Higher Education Funding Council? About £60 million. What are we saying? A combination of public money via the lottery and the sponsors' money was used to fund this object, which I shall come to in a moment, in place of funding Cambridge university in perpetuity with as much again as it receives from the HEFC at present.

Whether many people went or did not go, whether schoolchildren did or did not get in and whether the Secretary of State or his Ministers were hopelessly at odds with reality when they thought they could make the thing work financially does not matter. What matters is that a colossal sum has been spent on something that is indeed—in the words of the motion—a "national embarrassment". It is a national embarrassment not because it does not work particularly well—which, goodness knows, it does not—or because the food is awful, or for some such trivial reason, but because it constitutes an extraordinary denial of the fundamental aspects of our culture that we should spend time applauding this dreadful object instead of applauding Cambridge university. I say "Cambridge university", but I could just as well name any other great university.

First, there is the question of how this object relates to our national past. In a great university, what is celebrated, what is taught and what it handed on to other generations is a heritage in the proper sense. It is a cultural heritage—something that is inherited, and in that sense a heritage—but also something that is worth having; something that is the foundation of our understanding of the world. In our great universities, however, there is also a conception of the future. [Interruption.] I am sorry; I did not hear what the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) said from a sedentary position.

Mr. Efford: How many people have visited Cambridge university in the past four days?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I encourage the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) not to provoke a sedentary debate.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful for your admonition, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I fear that, if the hon. Member for Eltham believes that the measure of a great university is the number of people who visit it, he is subject to exactly the problem that has afflicted the debate, and afflicts the Government's understanding of this object.

In a great university, we also think of the future in a certain way. We think of it as something that is not disconnected from the past, but is continuous with it. In a great university, what is passed on is not merely the heritage of the past but the foundation of the future. A culture is seen as something that comes from the past and goes to the future, understands the past and the present, and provides the basis for an understanding of the future.

All those aspects are entirely missing from the confection that is the dome. No Labour Member has remotely attempted to defend it this evening in cultural terms. The Secretary of State had an ample opportunity. I remind the House that he is the Secretary of State for, among other things, culture. He made a remarkable speech, which contained not a word about our culture and not a single attempt to defend the expenditure of £750 million on an object with no cultural value whatever.

Ms Ward: First, the £758 million that was spent was not public money. Secondly, the hon. Gentleman should have made his remarks during the education debate that took place earlier. If he wants to consider the contents of the Dome, I suggest that he goes and looks for himself, rather than criticising from a position of no knowledge at all.

Mr. Letwin: I shall resist the temptation to explain to the hon. Lady the degree to which, were I to visit the dome, my future actions might be impeded by the depression that I would encounter. Let me respond to her other point. Does she really believe that a world exists in which we ought to forget about culture because we should not concern ourselves with anything that has only £400 million of strictly public money, and should pay no attention to the fact that a great part of the Government's efforts was devoted to raising another £300-odd million, which could have been devoted to raising that £300 million in addition to the £400 million of public money for one of our great universities? If she thinks that a world exists in which we should not attend to any of that because only £400 million of public money was spent, her conception of culture, and of the state's relationship to it, is different from mine.

The odd thing is that, until prompted by my remarks, the hon. Lady did not even mention that. There she was, another Labour Member, making an eloquent speech—excellent, as always—but uttering not a word about the purpose of this thing. Apparently, it was visitor attraction.

It is sad—I mean it genuinely, not in a partisan spirit—when a nation has been so corrupted, perhaps also in part by the rhetoric of the present Government, although not wholly, that it begins to think that it is reasonable to spend as much money as would keep a great university going in perpetuity on an item that is so entirely vacuous that its defenders do not have a word to say on its behalf in cultural terms.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood): May I advise the hon. Gentleman that, on 14 January, I joined 640 young people who had travelled from Blackpool to visit the dome? They thoroughly enjoyed its educational value, the spectacular show there and the zones. Every one to whom I spoke wanted to come back, thoroughly enjoyed it and benefited in both educational and cultural terms. They also enjoyed coming to the capital, which many of my constituents have never done.

Mr. Letwin: I close my remarks on a note that the hon. Lady prompts. I am sure that she is right. I am sure that what she describes could be replicated manyfold. I am sure that many children and even perhaps some adults much enjoyed the experience. I have no doubt that they would much enjoy many other things. Had they come to a football match, visited the tower of London, walked around and seen the pigeons in Trafalgar square, they would have had a pleasant day. If she really believes, when she reflects on it, that the nation should spend £750 million to celebrate the millennium by giving some schoolchildren a pleasant day out, her conception of what a Government preoccupying themselves with the cultural necessities of our nation means, is, I regret to say, shallow.

We have a responsibility in the House to ensure that our Government do not celebrate a millennium in so superficial a fashion. That is what has happened. It will be a matter of regret for some decades and perhaps centuries. People will look back at the dome and see in it a symbol of the shallowness of a culture that has been corrupted.

9.32 pm

Mr. Roger Godsiff (Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath): I know that time is short, so I will contain my comments to a few points.

I speak as someone who lives, in my London home, close to the dome. More relevantly, I also speak as Member of Parliament representing the centre of Birmingham. Those Members who were here before the last election will be aware that Birmingham was one of the cities that bid for the central millennium festivities. It was the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), along with his colleagues, who, for understandable reasons, decided that those festivities should take place at Greenwich.

It is interesting. If Members read Hansard, they will find that, when the right hon. Gentleman, then Deputy Prime Minister, made the decision about which bid should be successful and defended it in the House, not one Member who is now sitting on the Opposition Benches criticised his decision then, or subsequently.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Godsiff: Forgive me. Time is short.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Ms Ward) refers to political opportunism, she makes a valid point.

The reason why I mention Birmingham is because, as a consolation prize, Birmingham got one of the big projects from the Millennium Commission: Millennium Point, a futuristic science park that will enormously benefit the people of Birmingham and stand for many years as a testament to that great city. Many people in Birmingham would say that that £50 million was a better prize than the original prize of getting the central festivities.

I have been to the millennium dome and it is an interesting day out.

Mr. Pound: As bad as that, eh?

Mr. Godsiff: I shall ignore that remark.

I do not get carried along by the hype. I have never believed that the dome ranks with the Taj Mahal as one of the great wonders of the world. However, it is an interesting building.

I am sure that the Government are aware of the public concern. Those who have been to the dome often come away with the feeling that there is an unresolved clash of themes: the understandable commercial theme of the sponsors, who want to push their brands, and the theme of the artists, who are trying to project something relating to Britain's past and its future. I have had the pleasure to go to Disneyland and, more importantly, to the Epcot centre next door—the futuristic science theme museum and park. The dome is not a Disneyland or an Epcot centre. I regret to say that many people say after visiting the dome that it is really just a pumped-up trade show.

That is sad, because it undermines many of the successes that the dome has brought to the area, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) referred. That part of London, which I know well, has greatly needed the vast amounts of public expenditure. The money that has gone into the infrastructure will bring lasting benefits to the community. I have no doubt that whatever succeeds the dome will stand the test of time. The money that has been spent will be recouped and we can be proud of what we have put there. It is just sad that the clash of cultures and themes could not have been resolved before the dome was opened.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): This has been a short debate, long waited for by the Conservatives. My hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) set out the mishaps surrounding the project and the Government interference that has dogged it. Unlike the Secretary of State, I shall restrict my comments to the dome and not drift off to other issues. The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker), as ever, asked the Government many questions that remain unanswered. My hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) made some telling and intellectual observations on culture and the history of this country.

Some hon. Members have pointed out that the project was conceived by the Conservative Government. My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) confirmed the purpose of the project. He articulated why the dome was to be built and portrayed the philosophy that the previous Government believed would be at the heart of the dome and what it would stand for—an image of a country at the forefront of cultural, artistic, engineering and scientific activity and attainment. It was to be about a sense of unity, bringing the nation together, and the regeneration of a derelict and contaminated area of London. That was my right hon. Friend's vision, embraced by the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport and by hon. Members on both sides of the House. It was not a concept that should divide Members.

The noble vision of all that is best of British was destroyed when the Millbank machine took control and the Labour party decided to make the millennium dome a symbol of new Labour. Ever since the Labour Government finally proclaimed that they would, after all, allow the dome to continue, political interference has dogged the project. If proof were needed of the Government's determination to interfere with the project, as my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State has said, it was found in the appointment of the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), Labour's Mr. Fixit, known colloquially as the Dome Secretary. There is a wealth of evidence of the Government's interference in the millennium dome project. That has been nothing but detrimental to the success of what should have been a national celebration and an object of pride.

If new Labour could not come up with five meaningful election pledges, how could it possibly have been expected to come up with 14 meaningful dome zones? If only the Government had left NMEC and its chosen advisers to get on with the finer details, how much more inspired the zones and the whole experience could have been.

Perhaps the most troubled zone has been the faith zone, which was in true politically correct fashion renamed "faith zone" because the word "the" was thought to imply that only one faith—Christianity—was to be celebrated. It has been the target of much criticism from the Church of England, as a symbol of all that is wrong with the dome itself. On many occasions, we have said that the Government's mantra is one of style before substance; in this case, it is style before content.

The hon. Member for Watford (Ms Ward), who serves with me on the Select Committee, summed it up:

"It is a little like Cadbury's developing a wrapper without actually deciding what the chocolate bar is going to be."

It is a shame that she did not say the same today.

Ms Ward: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fraser: No, there is no time. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] I must carry on.

It comes down to the fact that a Government who so pride themselves on the ability to get the message across and concentrate all their efforts on communication have failed to get the positive message out on the millennium dome. They have thus failed not only the dome but the nation itself. That failure has understandably created apathy in Britain and made nonsense of the Prime Minister's prediction in 1998 that the British people would seize the moment.

The dome is a project that the people of Britain rightly wanted to support. They wanted to be inspired by a new wonder of Britain to visit in the new century. Even the Deputy Prime Minister must have recognised that the Government were pushing against an open door when he was reported to have told the Prime Minister:

"If we can't make this work, we're not much of a Government."

He also said—the words will come back to haunt him—that the dome would be the Labour Government's

"first big test of competence".

Muddle, dither and delay were features of the Government's approach to the dome even before they took office. Even then, their failure to get behind the project was inexcusable; but, as soon as they assumed power, their inability to make up their mind meant that, quite understandably, the private sector was reluctant to commit money. I warned the House two years ago that there would be serious repercussions. Now we know just how serious they are. Even now, nearly two months after the dome opened, three high-profile sponsors are yet to sign their contracts.

Can the Minister confirm that the Government are seeking cut-price deals to get themselves out of this hole? Ministers must learn that, in the real world of business, companies do not like throwing good money after bad. Mr. Michael Grade, a director of NMEC, asked the Select Committee to consider the dome in comparison to two key sporting events. He told us that the organisers had known for more than 100 years that the Olympic games would come in 2000, and that the world cup, as a very predictable event, is planned six or eight years ahead. On behalf of NMEC, he explained that "we are playing catch-up." Playing catch-up two years before opening night? Surely NMEC realised when the millennium would come, or was it playing catch-up because of Labour's dither and delay?

Even now, at the end of February 2000, the Government's dome is surrounded by controversy. We all hope that it will regain its momentum, but it cannot do so while the bad press continues about high-level resignations and allegations of Ministers' involvement. I endorse the words of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), who said in the Select Committee of the resignation of Jennie Page:

"I think we will have to look and ask the questions, both of the ministers and of the company, as to how it happened and why it happened."

One of the Government's special talents is the ability to take the credit when it suits and to deflect the blame when they know that they are responsible. The failures are none the less well documented. Setting aside new year's eve, we all know the history of the Jubilee line extension, which has been an utter disgrace. We know that the opening was delayed and delayed again; that, when the first section finally opened, it had to be closed again; and that, in the final reckoning, the budget went out of control.

[Mr. Fraser]

The Government failed to speed up the construction to tackle the problems caused by the unions representing the electricians. They failed to understand that the implications of the working time directive made it more difficult for contractors to finish on time.

To add insult to injury for the 3,000 people who were delayed on new year's eve and who could have been ambassadors for the dome, their problems were greeted by inappropriate comments from the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who told Radio 4:

"I have nothing to do with the dome. It was a bit of a laugh, really, some of those toffee-nosed people having to queue."

Why does he have nothing to do with the dome? Why is he not here to defend it, not least in the recognition that it is in a derelict part of London, which he hopes one day—God forbid—to have something to do with? What kind of ambassador for London would he be, if ever he were to be elected?

On 1 January, the media wreaked their revenge. Is it any surprise that, as a result of Government mismanagement, the dome has seen poor attendance levels, long queues and failed equipment? Why should people bother to make the trip, despite last weekend's hype, which was mentioned earlier?

I questioned the Government in January 1998 about what would happen if the number of visitors was less than the 12 million needed to break even. At that time, a senior Disney executive—yes, it was involved even then—a man with vast experience of visitor attractions, had been blunt when he told the Select Committee:

"I do not believe those numbers."

The then Minister could not answer me, because—he said—he had not thought about it. Had the Government listened, they would not have had to go cap in hand to that same organisation to sort out the problems that should have been recognised two years ago. They were arrogant then, and they are arrogant now, about the problems.

Will the Minister answer some questions today? What criteria will be used to judge the performance of Mr. Gerbeau, the self-styled saviour of Disneyland Paris? What contingency plan does the Government have in case he, too, should resign? What was the new opportunities fund set up to achieve? Was its original purpose to bail out the dome if it got into difficulties? Does she agree that we must now address the issue of pricing of tickets and transport to the dome to encourage visitors to the attraction? The past three days may have been encouraging, but if people do not come during school holidays and when the tourist season starts, then the dome is doomed from the word go. Will the Minister encourage NMEC to address the problem of queuing now, while the visitor numbers are low, so that the increase in visitors, which we all want to see, does not lead to unmanageable and unpopular queues?

The Prime Minister is reported to have said that the dome and its content will be the first paragraph of his next election manifesto. That will make interesting reading. He and his Government need to do some serious thinking about their priorities. They have failed abysmally on the delivery of key pledges. They have failed to reduce NHS waiting lists, to increase police numbers, and to maintain spending on education at the levels that they inherited, but they find time to meddle and interfere in the organisation of the dome—to the great detriment of the project.

The success of the dome remains to be seen, but what is certain is that the one thing that the dome does not need is more Government interference. I wish the dome well despite the Government's interference. It must succeed and it must be allowed to succeed—for the nation's sake.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Janet Anderson): The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mr. Fraser) who has been newly appointed to the Front Bench and who stood in for the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who sadly could not be with us this evening, has put a lot of questions to us and I am only sorry that he has not left us much time to answer them. I will do my best.

Given that this is an issue that the Opposition clearly take seriously, I was surprised to see so few Opposition Members present for the majority of the debate. In fact, the number we have now is a record. However, it is good to have this opportunity to set the record straight. I was amused by the Opposition's motion, which talks of Government interference. The hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) claimed that he had never done anything to denigrate the dome, but the motion calls it

"a source of national embarrassment, a wasted opportunity to celebrate Britain and the Millennium and poor value for Lottery players' money."

If that is not denigrating the dome, I do not know what is.

Politicians do not have to interfere with the dome and, in fact, we have no locus to interfere, because—as the hon. Gentleman knows only too well—the dome is run by an independent company. The dome can speak for itself. On Friday, Saturday and Sunday of this weekend, the dome was sold out. This morning, as has already been reported, the dome was sold out by 11.30 am. There was an announcement on the Jubilee line telling people not to proceed to the dome because they would not get in. I happen to know that the Deputy Prime Minister was down there today with 600 schoolchildren from his constituency. He found a father and two children distraught outside the dome because they could not get in because the dome was full. So my right hon. Friend brought them here for a tour of Parliament, and to listen to the debate, in which they will have heard some of the pathetic contributions from Conservative Members.

In the past four days alone, the dome has attracted 100,000 visitors. The total had reached 366,000 by the end of January, and the figure is continuing to rise. The hon. Member for East Surrey referred to an obscure website and said that the dome did not represent value for money. However, he is the Opposition spokesman on tourism, and he should know that the Good Guide to Britain said that the dome was the best value for money of any visitor attraction. It is the most popular visitor attraction in the country.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, as I appreciate that time is short. However, there is a difference between value for money in terms of the quality of experience for the people who spend £20 to visit the dome, and value for money in terms of an investment of £400 million of lottery players' money.

We have been talking about the latter problem this evening: if the Minister did not understand that, she has missed the entire point of the debate.

Janet Anderson: I remind the hon. Gentleman that it was the Conservative party that decided to go ahead with the dome project in the first place. The dome was a Tory idea. Of course there have been teething troubles: no such attraction ever avoids them, as the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) explained. The company is seeing what can be done about better visitor management flow and signage. There is a dome-ometer to warn people of waiting times at the zones, and so on.

Some Opposition Members complained about queues, but they cannot have it both ways. Perhaps the existence of queues means that people want to visit the dome.

Reference has been made to Jennie Page. Opposition Members will know that her employment was a matter for the company, but I want to place on record my support for her, and my pleasure at the way in which she delivered the project on time and on budget.

Mr. Baker: Will the Minister give way?

Janet Anderson: No, I have very little time and the hon. Gentleman took a great deal of that in the debate.

The right hon. Member for Henley talked about the initial vision that the dome would be an all-party project. He said that there was no political discussion in the commission, and it is a great shame that Conservative Members should have tried to bring party politics into the matter.

There has been some reference to sponsorship, and I can announce tonight that Mars has now signed the sponsorship contract. In addition, the two remaining sponsors, Boots and BSkyB, are committed at board level and have already made substantial financial contributions. They are using the millennium logo, and it merely remains for them to sign the fine print. I am sure that they will do so.

Conservative Members have also tried to criticise my right hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) for excessive secrecy when he was in charge of the project. However, the right hon. Member for Henley told the House that that was far from the case. Conservative Members should have listened to the right hon. Gentleman, who has a great deal of business experience. He described the dome as a project of complexity and sophistication. As he said, it was unfair that the project should have been subject to constant questioning, which no other similar project would have attracted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) has always been a firm supporter of the project. He mentioned the benefits that it had brought to industries around the country, and he is right. The steel used in the dome came from Bristol, and from Watson's Steel of Bolton, which is just next door to my constituency. I am therefore well aware of the benefits that have accrued to firms around the country.

I am astonished at how Conservative Members appear unaware of the value of tourism. The British Tourist Authority estimates that extra tourist spending of £1 billion will come into this country as a result of the dome. Conservative Members should know that tourism is the fastest growing industry in the world. We look forward to the Conservative party's tourism policy, which I understand was launched in Belfast recently. However, we have not seen it yet.

Earlier, I said that my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister took 600 children from his constituency to the dome today. A special train was hired to bring them down, and I should like to read the comments of a couple of the children who went. Emma Hewick, aged 11, said:

"I loved the trip down, our dinner here and everything we saw. It's been a brill day."

Jordan Mastin, aged 10, said:

"It was all very educational, but also hugely enjoyable. All of it was excellent, and I now want to persuade my Mum and Dad to bring me all over again. The show was spectacular, and I wanted to be up there as well, flying through the air. It's been a brilliant day and I loved every second of it."

The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) talked about an alleged failure to answer his parliamentary questions. I repeat that some of those questions could not be answered in detail; we were as open as possible, but there was a question of commercial confidentiality. No other project of this kind would have been required to make some of that information public at that stage. As the hon. Gentleman knows only too well, I invited him to the Department to meet my officials and members from the company so that we could brief him, off the record. What did he do? After about five minutes, he said, "Actually, I would prefer to talk to you about broadcasting, because I have to draft our party's policy on broadcasting."

Mr. Baker: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I should like to make it absolutely clear that the purpose of the meeting, as far as I was concerned, was broadcasting. It was the Minister who wanted to talk about the millennium dome at that point. There is a difference between off-the-record briefings and public accountability in the House.

Janet Anderson: If the hon. Gentleman had told me that he was going to talk about broadcasting, I would not have taken the trouble to invite representatives of the New Millennium Experience Company to the meeting.

During the debate, right hon. and hon. Members have talked about the target of 12 million visitors over the year. I confirm that that is still the company's aim. It is now saying that it thinks that it can break even if it achieves a figure of 10 million. That is the difference, and I hope that Conservative Members will remember that.

Mr. Fraser: I am extremely pleased that the hon. Lady has given way. I have three pages of questions that I put to her earlier. I am happy to pass them across for her to start answering some of them.

Janet Anderson: I thank the hon. Gentleman. If only Conservative Members had allowed us a little more time in which to respond, we could have answered his questions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Ms Ward) referred, quite rightly, to the lack of interest shown by Conservative Members about the subject of what is, after all, their debate. They have talked a lot about the money spent on the dome. Yet it was their project originally, and the money spent on the dome accounts for only one fifth of Millennium Commission funding. Some 622 constituencies around the country will be celebrating the millennium in their own communities as a result of millennium funding. My hon. Friend also quoted visitor satisfaction surveys. I will not repeat them, except to say that people obviously like the dome.

The hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) says that not only has he not been to the dome to see it for himself, but he has no intention of going. I looked up the hon. Gentleman's career thus far before coming to the House, and I see that it followed the path of Eton, Trinity and the London business school. My strong advice to him is to go down to the dome, get into the real world and enjoy the very real cultural experience that if offers. The dome is all about attracting people—entertaining them, educating them, involving them and inspiring them. It is also about appealing to the many, not the few.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath (Mr. Godsiff) said that he had had an interesting day out, but he referred to a possible clash of themes. That is not the experience of the majority of people who have gone there and confirmed that the dome offers something for everyone. It is not intended to be Disneyland; it is not a trumped-up trade show. The evidence is that so many people want to return.

Many questions have been posed tonight, and I am sorry—[Interruption.] It is no use Conservative Members bleating, because they allowed very little time for a response. We should all put ourselves behind the millennium dome, and put aside party politics. I wish that Conservative Members would stop carping; if they have not been to the dome, they should go now. If they do—

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

MADAM SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House believes that the Millennium Experience—and the many other Millennium activities—represent both an excellent celebration for the people of this country and a tangible and enduring legacy for future generations; further welcomes the announcement that the New Millennium Experience Company team will be introducing improvements which deliver even greater value for money both to the paying visitor and to the Millennium Commission; and, in particular, notes the record attendances at the Dome in the week commencing 7th February and the recent high satisfaction ratings amongst visitors.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Ordered,

That Sir Peter Lloyd and Dr. Lewis Moonie be discharged from the House of Commons Commission and Mr. Eric Forth and Mr. Stuart Bell be appointed members of the Commission under the House of Commons (Administration) Act 1978.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Madam Speaker: With the permission of the House, I shall put motions 3 and 4 together.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Object.

Madam Speaker: To what is the hon. Gentleman objecting?

Mr. McLoughlin: To motion 3, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: In that case, let the Question be put on motion 3 alone.

Social Security

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

That the draft Social Security (Contributions) (Re-rating and National Insurance Funds Payments) Order 2000, which was laid before this House on 31st January, be approved.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Higher Education

1. Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): What representations he has received from the Secretary of State for Education and Employment regarding Scottish higher education students studying in England and Wales. [109584]

The Minister of State, Scotland Office (Mr. Brian Wilson): My right hon. Friends have discussions from time to time on a range of matters.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I thank the Minister for that illuminating reply. Does he agree that the compromise that has been reached with the Scottish Executive is confusing, because students in Scotland will have to repay some of their tuition fees at the end of their courses if they study in Scotland, whereas if they study in England they will have to pay all the fees up front? English students will be discouraged from going to Scottish universities because, unlike their Scottish counterparts, they will have to pay all their fees up front if they study in Scotland, and they will be even further discouraged because Scottish universities have four-year rather than three-year courses. Does the Minister agree with Mr. Brian Monteith, the Scottish Tory education spokesman, that the whole system is chaotic and causes discrimination?

Mr. Wilson: It is not within my power to dictate what confuses the hon. Gentleman and what does not. What clearly confused him was finding the name of the Tory education spokesman in Scotland. For future reference, it is Monteith with an "o".

The hon. Gentleman makes a poor point. There has always been a difference between the education systems in England and Scotland. There have always been four-year honours degree courses in Scotland. If he is confused now, he was presumably confused in the past and will be confused in the future. As for the different funding arrangements, that is what devolution is about. There are two different routes to the same goal, which is to get more money and more people from less well-off backgrounds into higher education. The Tories dismally failed to achieve those two goals in 18 years.

Mr. Mohammad Sarwar (Glasgow, Govan): Does my hon. Friend agree with me that the Conservative party opposed devolution in Scotland and continues to oppose the settled will of the Scottish people? Does he further agree that the Scottish Executive and the Scottish Parliament are free to make decisions on behalf of their constituents without the interference of Conservative Members of this House?

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. If the Scottish Parliament and the Scottish Executive decide to make additional or different arrangements that incur greater costs, they have the right to pay for that from the block grant. That is what devolution is about. I repeat that we have two objectives: to get more money into higher education, and we are doing that to the tune of £58 million this year, which is a 10 per cent. increase; and to get more people from less well-off backgrounds into higher education—40 per cent. of those from Scotland going into higher education do not pay a penny in tuition fees, no matter where they go. Those are the objectives that we shall continue to pursue.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): Has the Minister or the Secretary of State for Scotland made any representations to the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and to the Treasury about addressing the consequences of abolishing tuition fees for Scottish students at English and Welsh institutions? If so, have Ministers in the Scotland Office been privy to the legal opinion obtained by the Scottish Executive that sets out the legal position on this matter?

Mr. Wilson: As I said, we have wide-ranging discussions, and all aspects of funding are part of the continuing discussions between the Secretary of State and his colleagues and myself and my colleagues. We also have access to all legal opinions offered to the Scottish Executive on such matters, which clearly have reserved implications.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): The Minister talks about the settled will of the Scottish people, but I am sure that he has seen the poll in today's edition of The Scotsman, which shows a decline in support for devolution and a rise in support for those who wish to get rid of the Scottish Parliament altogether and for those who want independence. Is not the reason for such a decline in support for devolution the fact that people are mystified by the confusion that has crept in precisely in areas such as education?

The Minister has never given a clear answer as to why the Scottish Executive is prevented from enabling Scottish students at English universities to have the same regime as those who are studying in Scotland. Will he make it clear what the reason is, or will that confusion remain? Does he agree that it is precisely that confusion that makes people disinclined to favour the present devolution settlement?

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman sets an interesting psephological puzzle. If, as he claims, support for his party's position on these issues is on the increase in Scotland, it is truly remarkable that support for his party continues to be on the decrease in Scotland to the point of statistical insignificance.

On the issue of Scottish students in England, there are two different systems for funding students. As I said, 40 per cent. of Scottish students, no matter where they study, will pay nothing in tuition fees. Those who pay tuition fees in England have the right to deferred repayment. I repeat that our goals are to put more money into higher education and to have more students from less well-off backgrounds. There are two different routes to those objectives: one in Scotland, one in England. That is not only devolution in practice, but putting principle into practice to widen the options and to improve the quality of higher education.

Local Government Act 1986

2. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): What discussions he has had with the First Minister regarding the repeal of section 2A of the Local Government Act 1986. [109607]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Dr. John Reid): I have regular discussions with the First Minister on a range of issues relating to Scotland.

Mr. Swayne: Does not this policy prove to parents throughout Scotland and, indeed, throughout the kingdom that the evangelist Pat Robertson may have been right after all? If Scotland is becoming a dark land, the right hon. Gentleman's policy is responsible. Is he aware of the fate of the cities of the plain?

Dr. Reid: I do not think that I could have done better than the hon. Gentleman in illustrating why we needed to look again at section 28 of the Local Government Act 1988. His views, and those of Mr. Robertson, gave rise to this, under the Thatcher Government.

The issue is sensitive, and it should be dealt with in a sensitive fashion. It is also an extremely complex issue, on which there are strong feelings on all sides. The First Minister and the Scottish Executive are trying to find a sensitive and correct solution, but, in view of what the hon. Gentleman has said, let me make it clear that neither the Scottish Executive nor the United Kingdom Government seek to promote homosexuality in schools. That is not the intention of anyone in government, north or south of the border. An attempt is being made, however, to balance the protection of children in our schools and the assurance to every one of them that, in civil and criminal terms and in the eyes of God, they are of equal value with ensuring that we do not go to the other extreme, and allow the promotion of homosexuality.

As I have said, the issue is complex and sensitive, and I am afraid that polarisation, and the language used sometimes by the hon. Gentleman and certainly by his hero Mr. Robertson, contributes not light but merely heat to the debate.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Would my right hon. Friend care to comment on the cynical way in which the leader of the Scottish National party, having voted for the repeal of section 2A in the Scottish Parliament recently, now appears to be trying to gather support from those who oppose the repeal in the Ayr by-election? Is that not just another example of the SNP leader's apparent belief that any means justifies the end that he is trying to achieve?

Dr. Reid: I do not want to make any personal remarks. The personalisation of politics seems to be the hallmark of the Scottish National party, and I prefer to leave it that way.

I think that people will make their own judgment on what is apparently a matter of principle that has been overtaken by a Damascene conversion at the launch of a by-election in Ayr. They will decide whether decisions have been made in a profound and principled fashion, or whether they are the result of opportunism.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I would not expect the right hon. Gentleman to take a great deal of notice of Mr. Robertson. Does he accept, however, that he really ought to take notice of Cardinal Winning? Has not Cardinal Winning spoken for many people, not only in Scotland but in the United Kingdom as a whole, in voicing his real concerns?

Why on earth bother with the section at all? It can only encourage the few predatory people who would cause great damage to many young and vulnerable people.

Dr. Reid: Let me answer the first part of the question by saying that I have a profound respect for, and indeed friendship with, Cardinal Winning. The hon. Gentleman will have noted that I was the first Secretary of State to honour the cardinal with a ceremony and a lunch here in his official capacity. He speaks for a great many people, and we take his views very seriously.

As for the second part of the question, we have no intention of allowing anyone, whether predatory or otherwise, to promote homosexuality in our schools. We—and the First Minister and the Scottish Executive—are attempting to find a correct solution to a complex issue, having taken consultations into account and having listened to what people are saying.

As the hon. Gentleman will understand, we are required not only to defend ourselves against those whom he mentioned who would proselytise and promote homosexuality, but to protect children in our schools—all children. Surely, all children are of equal value and equal worth. We have to allow those who care for those children, including the teaching profession, to be able to reassure them of that value and worth without the prospect of falling foul of the law.

That is the profound and complex issue that we are trying to deal with. I thank the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he expressed his remarks. If many others did it in that fashion, rather than in the way that his colleague, the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) did, we would probably make more progress on the matter.

National Minimum Wage

3. Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): If he will make a statement about the impact of the national minimum wage in Scotland. [109608]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Dr. John Reid): The national minimum wage has brought substantial benefits to a large number of people throughout the UK, including Scotland, with no adverse effects on the economy. It is estimated that about 150,000 people in Scotland will benefit from the national minimum wage.

Mr. Murphy: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. On behalf of those 150,000 low-paid people in Scotland, may I welcome the recent announcement of the increase in the national minimum wage, which will improve the quality of life of many families in Scotland? I urge him to be tough on two groups who oppose the national minimum wage: first, the small number of Scottish businesses that continue to evade the procedures and legislation. Will he work with others to close those loopholes? Secondly, and perhaps more significantly, will he reserve no effort and no energy in being tough on the Conservative party, which continually opposes the national minimum wage in Scotland and which would have ensured that those 150,000 Scottish families had no national minimum wage whatever?

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend is correct. The national minimum wage, which is one of the most radical and beneficial changes brought about by the Government, was carried through in the teeth of opposition from the Tory party, with the Scottish National party standing aside, as usual, betraying the low paid in Scotland by refusing to turn up even to vote on the matter. We will be tough on those employers who refuse to implement the national minimum wage. It is of enormous benefit to people not only in his constituency, as he knows, but in a place—I just pluck somewhere out of the air—such as Ayr, where almost 1,000 low paid workers have had an increase. It is not something that they are sneering at, unlike the SNP.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): The Secretary of State is right to say that the introduction of the minimum wage has had many beneficial effects, but will he concede that some groups of workers cannot take advantage of it over a year? I think of people such as school dinner staff, who, because of the way in which contracts are configured, are laid off for the long summer recesses.

The Secretary of State will be aware that the ability of those people to claim jobseeker's allowance during the summer holidays is deadlocked between the Court of Session in Edinburgh and the Court of Appeal in the House of Lords in London. Will he work with his ministerial colleagues and others to change the regulations? At a stroke, they could be changed and those important staff could get access to JSA during the summer.

Dr. Reid: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but, he will appreciate—in fact, he mentioned it—that the matter is sub judice. Court proceedings are taking place on the matter. As he will know, there have been several court decisions, not all entirely consistent, so we have to wait until the legal position is resolved. I would not want to say anything more than that while the legal proceedings continue.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries): Will my right hon. Friend welcome the fact that the action of national minimum wage enforcement officers has ensured that women employed at Chicony Electronics in Greenock now receive the national minimum wage and not the pitiful 96p an hour that they previously received? Does he agree that Scottish employers now have a duty to their employees to pay that minimum rate?

Dr. Reid: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. The national minimum wage is one example of how people's lives are being made better. Politics is not about charts on accountants' walls or graphs published in official statistics, but about ordinary people gaining benefit from their Government. The case that my hon. Friend mentioned is an example of that. The increase that he mentioned amounts to almost £3 an hour, which is £24 a day or £100 a week. With the other social justice measures that we are introducing—such as the working families tax credit, increase in child benefit, restoration of free eye tests to pensioners and the Christmas bonus—we are the first Government not only to pledge ourselves to combating and eradicating poverty, but to put our pledges on those matters into practice.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): Given that the minimum wage has been introduced without detriment to the economy, is there not an unanswerable case to give a commitment to upgrade it annually in line with inflation or, preferably, with average earnings? Will the Secretary of State lobby his colleagues to give that commitment?

Dr. Reid: Given the hon. Gentleman's absolute passion and commitment on the national minimum wage, I am rather surprised that he could not be bothered even to turn up and vote for it. When we were up all night fighting the Tories in the House on the minimum wage, he was absent. Therefore, I do not particularly want to take lessons from him on the matter. All I would say is that 150,000 people in Scotland will be substantially better off as a result of a measure passed by the Labour Government in the teeth of Tory opposition—when, once again, we looked around and found that the Tories' allies in failing to support the minimum wage were the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues in the Scottish National party.

Strategic Rail Authority

4. Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): What assistance he has given in establishing the Strategic Rail Authority; and what its impact will be in Scotland. [109610]

The Minister of State, Scotland Office (Mr. Brian Wilson): The establishment of the Strategic Rail Authority is an important step forward in ensuring a co-ordinated oversight of railway services across the United Kingdom. In Scotland, the Strategic Rail Authority will administer all passenger rail franchises, including the making of franchise payments to the relevant train operating companies.

Mr. Savidge: Will my hon. Friend seek to ensure that new rail franchises stipulate the maintenance and improvement of direct through train links between Aberdeen and London, and particularly the progressive upgrading of passenger and freight services on the neglected stretch between Aberdeen and Edinburgh?

Mr. Wilson: I congratulate my hon. Friend and his Labour colleagues in the north-east on their pursuit of that issue. I well remember, during opposition to privatisation, going to Aberdeen to make it clear that if privatisation and fragmentation proceeded, there would not be the same commercial incentive for the upgrading of the link between Edinburgh and Aberdeen. We shall have a Strategic Rail Authority that is able to intervene in those circumstances.

Moreover, the Scottish Executive will be able to make directions to Railtrack. If Railtrack resists, the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Department of Transport will be able to adjudicate. We now have a structure within which it will be possible to pursue those objectives. We have also had to overturn the damage of rail fragmentation that was caused by the previous Government and that endangered the type of upgrading that my hon. Friend and I both want.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Does the Minister agree that one of the important functions of the Strategic Rail Authority will be to promote and re-introduce rail services through rural parts of Scotland? Does he welcome with me last week's report highlighting the fact that there is the possibility of a viable railway through the borders, connecting Edinburgh with England and the west coast main line? Will he work with me and my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) in promoting that railway and in working with the SRA to ensure that that railway is one of its top priorities?

Mr. Wilson: As the hon. Gentleman knows from my visits to the borders, I am very interested in, and attracted to, the proposition of restoring that link. He will also know that the Scottish Executive have been examining the matter and have expressed positive interest in the proposals. It is a very important project for the borders.

Again, it would be for the Scottish Executive to make proposals to Railtrack. It would then be for Railtrack to respond, in consultation with the train operating companies. Ultimately, it would be for the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to adjudicate on the matter, if that were necessary. The structure is in place, making it possible for us to go forward on those projects. The Tories sought to make doing that impossible by their fragmentation of the railways and by leaving it all to the free market.

Mr. Desmond Browne (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): My hon. Friend will be aware that, despite recent improvements in the infrastructure, the rolling stock and the timetabling of rail services in Scotland, it is still not possible to travel from Ayr on the west coast to Edinburgh on the east coast in any time that rivals a direct road journey. In his discussions with the Scottish Executive, the strategic rail authority and Railtrack, will he stress the importance to the economy of the areas west and south of Glasgow of better east-west links and better access to the national rail network?

Mr. Wilson: The Under-Secretary of State for International Development, my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) is cheering with particular enthusiasm as he wants a direct link between Ayr and Tynecastle. The point that my hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. Browne) makes is exactly right. It is important that once again we are getting back to the concept of a united national rail network and a strategic framework for the development of the railways. The Scottish Executive has an important role in promoting rail services and working with the strategic rail authority to make exactly the improvements that we would like. My hon. Friend mentioned Ayr, so we should remember the important role of the Strathclyde passenger transport executive, working hand in hand with other authorities to achieve what Labour wants—an integrated public transport system.

ADVOCATE-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

The Advocate-General was asked—

Legislation

22. Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): How many Bills introduced in the Scottish Parliament she has considered; and on how many occasions she has advised that such Bills are not within the Parliament's competence. [109632]

The Advocate-General for Scotland (Dr. Lynda Clark): Thus far, two Bills have been passed by the Scottish Parliament and I have not considered it necessary to refer either to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. They are now the Mental Health (Public Safety and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 1999 and the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000.

Mr. Clappison: Although the hon. and learned Lady of course considers such matters in an entirely independent way, given the fact that, so far, she has not considered any Bills to be outside the competence of the Scottish Parliament and given the political composition of that Parliament, does she agree that one would not have to be a tremendous cynic to think it unlikely that any future Bills will be challenged in that way and that there is very little point to what she is doing?

The Advocate-General: I do not share the hon. Gentleman's cynicism. He will remember that, in my position as Advocate-General, I have legal functions to exercise. As an advocate, I have been exercising legal functions for many years and I intend to continue using my independent legal judgment when I act as Advocate-General. We shall wait and see what happens when Bills are introduced.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): I have listened carefully to the hon. Lady's comments and they are not very illuminating. She mentions her other roles. She will be aware that she has a constitutional right to intervene in cases which might have a constitutional dimension north and south of the border. Why, for instance, did she not intervene in the cases of Starrs v. Procurator Fiscal and Clancy v. Caird, which have direct constitutional relevance to the United Kingdom because they concern the rights of temporary sheriffs to sit, which could have a knock-on effect south of the border? Did she not see it as part of her role to take a part in that, in view of its profound constitutional implications?

The Advocate–General: The legal advice that I give as Advocate-General is confidential. I know that the hon. Gentleman has a great respect for precedent in the House and for legal precedent, so I quote from the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) the former Attorney-General in the previous Conservative Administration, who said, on 7 November 1996:

"By convention, the fact of whether the Law Officers have advised on a given issue is not disclosed, nor is the substance of any advice which may have been given."—[Official Report, 7 November 1996; Vol. 284, c. 610W.]

European Convention on Human Rights

23. Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What representations she has received on the application of the European convention on human rights to the conditions in which trials in third countries take place. [109633]

The Advocate–General for Scotland (Dr. Lynda Clark): I have received no such representations.

Mr. Dalyell: Assuming that the trial at Zeist ever gets under way, do Ministers think that it should be televised?

The Advocate–General: That is a matter entirely for the Scottish Executive, and in particular, the Lord Advocate in his role as independent prosecutor and the decisions that he makes in relation to that. The matter is also before the courts and is sub judice.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

The Parliamentary Secretary was asked—

Circuit Judges

26. Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): What systems there are for assessing the views of circuit judges on proposals to change the operation of Crown courts. [109637]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Jane Kennedy): Whenever changes to the operation of the Crown courts are proposed, the views of the judiciary are sought through consultation, including the views of the Council of Circuit Judges.

Mr. Grieve: I am sure that the Parliamentary Secretary will agree that the Council of Circuit Judges has an important role to play in trying to ensure the smooth running of the court system and trying to minimise costs. Why then is it that the impression that one derives is that the council considers that on issues such as court layout, new court building and information technology, their representations to the Lord Chancellor's Department appear to be disregarded? Is it simply because the council is meant to be a mere focus group sounding board to be disregarded at will, or is it because the Government do not like the suggestions that it makes?

Jane Kennedy: I cannot be held responsible for any impressions that the hon. Gentleman may form. The views of the Council of Circuit Judges, which is the body that represents the circuit bench, are taken very seriously. It is consulted by the Lord Chancellor and the Court Service on all proposed policy and operational changes relating to the courts.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I declare an interest as a practising lawyer. When the various proposals for the change in the operation of the Crown courts are considered by the Lord Chancellor's Department, will the Department take into account the change in format and procedure that will arise directly from the incorporation of the European convention on human rights on 2 October and ensure that the judges sitting in the Crown courts have been well tutored in the complex nature of the proposals and the various precedents and other cases that have been decided in the European courts, which will of course affect the running of our courts?

Jane Kennedy: My hon. Friend makes a good point, and great efforts are being made to ensure that the judiciary and those responsible for administering the Court Service are well briefed on the implications of the Human Rights Act 1998. Important as that legislation is in establishing the rights of individuals in this country, it does have major implications for all public agencies, including the Court Service.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): The Parliamentary Secretary must sometimes be embarrassed to defend the actions and attitudes of the Lord Chancellor. I wish to follow up the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve). Does she accept that it is a matter of profound concern if the Lord Chancellor gives the impression that he goes through the motions of receiving delegations from the judiciary, but that the judiciary feels that its views are simply being ignored and that all that is happening is a face-saving exercise? Increasingly, as one talks to people at all levels of the legal profession, the impression left by the Lord Chancellor is that he is contemptuous and dismissive of any representations that are made to him.

Jane Kennedy: It is difficult to respond to generalised complaints such as those made by the hon. Members for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) and for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve). All I can say is that, for example, in the consultation on the transforming the Crown court project, more than 62 judges responded individually and six circuits responded collectively. Those responses will be considered along with the conclusions of various groups that have been organised to discuss that project, including the judicial focus group, the think tank and the case management working group. The recommendations of those groups and the individuals who responded will be brought together and a way forward approved by the trials issues group, the senior presiding judge and the Court Service. The views of the judiciary are sought in a range of ways, and those views are taken very seriously indeed by the Lord Chancellor.

County Courts

27. Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): If he will make a statement on the closure of county courts in England. [109640]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Jane Kennedy): I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I provided to a similar question from him on 12 January. The Court Service is committed to ensuring that it achieves value for money from its assets and properties and provides good services to its customers. It constantly reviews its estates in the light of work load trends, the state of the available facilities and local county court users' needs.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to the Minister for that response. She is aware that I have raised this subject from time to time. In her written answer to me of 25 January, she listed a number of county courts that are proposed for closure. I was pleased that the courts at Altrincham, Leigh and Tameside were not on that list. Can I take it from that that the Government have seen sense and decided not to proceed with the planned closure of those county courts? Do the Government now understand the vital service that those courts perform for the community?

Jane Kennedy: A preliminary court-user survey has been conducted in the Manchester area, which includes the Altrincham, Leigh and Tameside county courts. Such surveys play a very important role in informing the decisions of the Court Service, and they are often a precursor to seeking the Lord Chancellor's approval for formal consultation on possible closures. However, at present there are no plans to take the matter forward.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will my hon. Friend the Minister remain her normal, totally impartial self and simply ensure that under no circumstances will Crewe lose its county court?

Jane Kennedy: I shall take my hon. Friend's comments on board.

Lord Chancellor

28. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): How many times the Lord Chancellor has sat in a judicial capacity in the last 12 months. [109641]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Jane Kennedy): The Lord Chancellor has sat in a judicial capacity four times in the past 12 months.

Mr. Prentice: That is four times too many. I suspect that my hon. Friend the Minister will not agree that it is simply indefensible for the Lord Chancellor to sit as a judge while he is a member of both the legislature and the Executive. Does she share my disappointment that the report of the royal commission on the House of Lords recommended that the status quo be retained? That is a complete anachronism. Will not the Government be forced by the European Court of Human Rights in the Guernsey case to revisit the matter, and to make it clear that a Minister cannot serve as a judge at the same time?

Jane Kennedy: I could not disagree with my hon. Friend more profoundly, although he makes his point forcibly, as he has done for some time. The decision in the case to which he referred—the case of McGonnell—is confined to the special position of the Bailiff of Guernsey and his role in that case. In addition, if the Lord Chancellor were not a judge, he could not have the necessary close relationship with the senior judiciary. The relationship between the Executive and the judiciary could therefore deteriorate, with damaging consequences and consequential risks to the judiciary's independence.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): I declare an interest as a member of the Bar.

Does the Lord Chancellor ever preside over cases that are heard by a jury? If not, could the Parliamentary Secretary make sure that he has the opportunity to do so? That would enable him to see the good sense of the jury system in operation, and the lengths to which our constituents go when they serve on juries. It would also allow the Lord Chancellor to see that there is no substitute for the fairness of the jury system. Could he then knock some sense into the head of the Home Secretary?

Jane Kennedy: Lord Chancellors in the past sat judicially for most of their working day, but that practice ceased after the second world war. Although Lord Chancellors since then have not sat as judges to the same extent, there are no particular restrictions on the cases for which they may choose to sit. However, the Lord Chancellor would never sit on any case that involved legislation in whose passage through the House he had been directly involved, nor in any case in which the Executive's interests were directly engaged.

Solicitors

29. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): What assessment he has made of the progress made by the Office for the Supervision of Solicitors in dealing with complaints against solicitors. [109642]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Jane Kennedy): There are fewer outstanding cases, and the last month has also seen an improvement in the turnaround of complaints. However, there are still areas of serious concern, particularly in relation to the quality of adjudication of complaints. My colleague as Parliamentary Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Lock), will be visiting the OSS on 20 March to discuss these concerns. In the meantime, we will continue closely to monitor the progress made at the OSS.

Mr. Kidney: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Does she agree that it is the responsibility of every solicitor to take seriously complaints about poor legal services? Will she ensure that every solicitor understands the message that if complaints are not dealt with responsibly by the profession, the Lord Chancellor will have to use his reserve powers provided in the Access to Justice Act 1999 and impose a statutory system for dealing with complaints?

Jane Kennedy: My hon. Friend is right. We have those reserve powers. However, we believe that it would be better if the Office for the Supervision of Solicitors met the targets that we have set. We wish to give the OSS every opportunity to meet those targets. We must bear in mind that anxieties about the quality of casework, real though they are, must be balanced against the practical difficulties experienced by the OSS in turning things around, especially while new staff are being recruited and trained.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): The hon. Lady may know that Mr. Tony Walden-Biles, one of the leading lights in the organisation Complaints Against Solicitors-action for Independent Adjudication—CASIA—is one of my constituents. I have on a number of occasions taken him to see two Conservative Ministers and now three lots of Labour Ministers. They all promised that as the supervision of solicitors was not really going according to plan and that as it was a last chance, the Government would probably start to impose supervision of solicitors from outside. Why do Ministers constantly say at the Dispatch Box that they are still not happy with the OSS while doing nothing about it? When my constituents have a serious complaint about solicitors, they are not satisfied with simply having their bills reduced and having a maximum compensation limit of £1,000.

Jane Kennedy: It is not true that no action is being taken. It was precisely because we had concerns about the operations of the OSS that the reserve powers are provided in the 1999 Act. However, as I have just said to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), we wish the OSS to make every effort to meet the targets that have been set in improving its service to those who complain about the service that they have received from solicitors. We are determined that improvements be made, and we have powers in reserve to use, should it prove necessary.

Circuit Judges

31. Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): How the Council of Circuit Judges' views are taken into account in respect of proposed changes in the work of the courts. [109644]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Jane Kennedy): The Council of Circuit Judges, as I have said, is, like other interested groups, consulted on proposed changes to the operation of the Crown and county courts. Their views are taken into account with the other responses that are received, and they receive the same careful consideration as those of other consultees. Consultation is carried out in various ways—for example, by sending copies of consultation papers for comment, or by inviting circuit judges to sit on project boards.

Mr. Blunt: Why does the hon. Lady believe that there is such concern among circuit judges that their views are not being taken into account?

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends have made a series of representations on this subject. Such a concern has not previously been expressed to me. We will take on board the comments that have been made—we take them seriously, as they purport to be representative of circuit judges. I will make every effort to reassure circuit judges on the serious way in which their concerns are taken on board by the Department.

Community Legal Service

32. Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): If he will publish a referrals handbook for the community legal service which includes details of all national advisory services. [109648]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Jane Kennedy): The community legal service partnerships will create local referral networks which will be supported by regional directories. The directories, to be published at the start of April 2000, will list details of local information and advice providers, and will also include details of relevant national organisations and telephone helplines.

Fiona Mactaggart: I am very aware of that because we have an excellent community legal service partnership growing in Slough. Our concern is that to get effective referrals, we need a national database of advice centres. We do not want to have to invent our own. We were hoping that the Lord Chancellor's Department would provide a national one that we and those in other areas could plug into so that we can get a better community legal service.

Jane Kennedy: I, too, have that ambition for the community legal service. The directory will be available on the service's website, which is being designed and built so that it is accessible to the majority of the community. The website directory will be updated daily.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The President of the Council was asked—

Ministerial Statements

35. Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye): How many times Ministers have come to the House to deliver statements since May 1997. [109652]

40. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South): On how many occasions Ministers have made statements to the House since May 1997. [109659]

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): As of Monday 21 February, 24 times.

Mr. Foster: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply, which shows, impressively, how this Government are committed to parliamentary democracy. Does my right hon. Friend have comparative statistics on the number of occasions on which we had such statements from the Conservatives when they were in government, so that we can see who are the true friends of democracy?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend is entirely right. Obviously, those statistics were for this Session, but they compare favourably with the record of the Conservative party in the equivalent period in the 1992-97 Parliament—105 statements were made under this Government compared with 96 under the Conservative Government in a comparable period. Similarly, in the previous Session, 80 statements were made compared with 77 in a comparable period. That overall picture is also reflected in the statistics for individual Ministers.

Mr. Cunningham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has an impressive record for appearances when compared with his predecessor, who in 1993-94 made only seven appearances, while our right hon. Friend in 1998-99 made 12, which is more than twice the number?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend is correct, and that record is not a flash in the pan. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made statements on no less than 25 occasions compared with 19 by his predecessor in a similar two-year period. That exact picture is reflected in their dealings with questions, where again my right hon. Friend has answered more than his predecessor.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Will the Leader of the House assure the House that, when Ministers make statements which refer to reports in which hon. Members have been mentioned, the Government will make every effort to ensure that those hon. Members see the report before the statement is made, so that they can comment properly?

Mrs. Beckett: Of course, I take the hon. Gentleman's point. Colleagues usually endeavour to do that, although there may be occasions when there is a difficulty. In general, we hope and expect that that would be the norm. If the hon. Gentleman has a particular case and concern in mind, I should be grateful if he would draw it to my attention.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Surely, the real question is not how many statements have been made to the House, but how often they have conveyed new information. Will the right hon. Lady put in the Library a list of those statements that have not been trailed either by a press leak from No. 10 or on the "Today" programme in the morning? Is it not deplorable that we all have a clear idea of what we are to be told in the statement that is to be made in about 12 minutes' time, when in fact that information should be given new, fresh-minted to the House?

Mrs. Beckett: First, although the hon. Gentleman says that it is not a question of how many statements have been made or questions answered, because the facts do not suit the Opposition's case, the Opposition normally claim that this Government are in the House less and that that is a sign of our disrespect for Parliament. Clearly, neither of those contentions stands.

On whether information is trailed or comes fresh to the House, I recognise that there are times when there is intense press speculation—sometimes it is so detailed that it is clear that someone has leaked something. The hon. Gentleman knows how often the Government have deplored such detailed leaking. Indeed, he will recall that not so long ago the Home Secretary was extremely upset on behalf of the House because a statement that he had planned to make to the House was leaked in the press. We cannot wholly prevent that, although we try to do so. However, I also take the view that the House needs to give more thought to how we can handle such matters effectively.

House of Commons Commission

36. Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): What representation she has received on the method of appointing Members to the House of Commons Commission. [109653]

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): I have received no formal representations on that matter.

Fiona Mactaggart: But has the President of the Council read the debate on the matter, held in the House on 2 February? Is she aware of the unease among Back Benchers about the unaccountability of the House of Commons Commission and the way in which it deals with some of the issues before it? Will she consider finding ways to give the views expressed in that debate some resonance in the Commission?

Mrs. Beckett: Yes, I have read the debate, and I recognise the concerns that were expressed—not least by my hon. Friend. Like the whole House, I also recognise that one unsatisfactory aspect of the development of the Commission's work is that it is not easy for Members to find out how they can raise issues and have them dealt with. My hon. Friend will be aware that, recently, there was a report on how the Commission could improve its working, so that there are better links and a better flow of information from Members. We hope to make progress on that in the near future.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Does the right hon. Lady accept that, whatever the methods of reviewing the means by which Members of the House of Commons Commission are appointed, it is a source of joy to Members on both sides of the House and, no doubt, to a large number of people the length and breadth of the United Kingdom, that last night my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) was wisely appointed to the Commission, without a Division? Does she agree that it augurs well for the future that a man of such wisdom, judgment and legendary discernment should make his talents and experience available to that august Commission?

Mrs. Beckett: Without any disrespect to the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), I do not think "joy" is quite the word I would have chosen. However, I am sure that he will make a distinguished contribution.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

The President of the Council was asked—

Privy Council

37. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): If she will institute a review of the purpose and effectiveness of the Privy Council; and if she will make a statement. [109654]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Privy Council Office (Mr. Paddy Tipping): No, the Privy Council is a long-established and effective example of joined-up government, which continues to play a useful role in a variety of policy matters.

Mr. Prentice: I am again disappointed. Does the House share my astonishment that some Orders in Council are never seen in the Houses of Parliament—for example, orders on new coinage? The pound in our pocket—its shape, what it looks or feels like—is not debated either by peers or Members of this place. The matter is decided by the Privy Council using prerogative powers. Given that we have such a tremendously modernising Government—they want to modernise everything out of sight—surely some parts of our ancient, creaking constitution should be visited. Is not the Privy Council one of those?

Mr. Tipping: Much has already been done to modernise our procedures and more will be done. Later this year, the Privy Council will have its own website—a real example of new technology and forward thinking.

As for Orders in Council, my hon. Friend will be aware that they are all published and available for public scrutiny.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The President of the Council was asked—

Timetabling (Legislation)

38. Mrs. Eileen Gordon (Romford): If she will make a statement on the work of the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons in relation to the use of timetabling for dealing with legislation. [109657]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Privy Council Office (Mr. Paddy Tipping): The Modernisation Committee considered the use of timetabling and programme motions in its first report of the 1997-98 Session—on the legislative process—and recommended that, for a trial period, some Bills should be programmed.

Mrs. Gordon: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a great shame that the conclusions of a cross-party Select Committee report have been flouted by the Conservatives, whose antics in this place have been nothing short of scandalous? Will he ask the Committee to review progress on that important matter? Does he agree that the Conservatives are a bunch of sad people? Even if they have no life outside this place, we do. That is why we are in touch with reality and they have completely lost it.

Mr. Tipping: My hon. Friend is right to say that the Government are keen on further programme motions. There is a record of working with the Opposition on such matters but, unfortunately, the number of Bills introduced under programme motions has declined. I think that that is the fault not of the official Opposition, but of the unofficial Opposition that sometimes lies behind the official Opposition. I do not want to comment on hon. Members' sad lives, but wish to congratulate the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) on his Channel 4 award. I note that he was not here for his Defence question yesterday. One fears that his reputation does not give us joy, but is slipping.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Will the Minister examine carefully the effect of timetable motions? I am serving on the Standing Committee considering the Utilities Bill and am having great difficulty finding out what Labour Back Benchers have to say about it. I am also concerned that we are hearing rumours that the Bill is supposedly being blocked in Committee. That is not the case; we are making rapid progress. However, Labour Whips keep ending our sittings early, and I hope that the Minister and the President of the Council will take note of that. I suspect that the Government will suddenly decide that it wants the Committee to make more rapid progress, will pretend that it has not been doing that and will table a programme or guillotine motion for the Bill's Committee stage.

Mr. Tipping: My right hon. Friend and I always take note of what hon. Members tell us. Labour Members on the Committee considering the Utilities Bill clearly think that it is an important piece of legislation that has consumers at its heart. I suspect that they are content with proceedings.

I was not aware that the Committee's sittings were finishing early. Sometimes that is done for the convenience of the Opposition. The hon. Gentleman asked me to take note of that point, and I shall do so.

Lobby Facilities

39. Ms Helen Southworth (Warrington, South): If the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons has considered the facilities available to members of the Lobby. [109658]

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): The Modernisation Committee has received numerous representations on the matter, some of which it still has under consideration. However, we have already obtained agreement from the Administration Committee and from Madam Speaker to some relaxation in the use of recording equipment, which had long been sought by the Press Gallery.

Ms Southworth: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does she agree that it is about time that the filming procedures in Members' offices were updated, especially considering that Portcullis house now means that all Members will have an office? Will the Modernisation Committee please address that issue?

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As I said, tape recorders have been permitted in the Press Gallery since January. We have had further discussions with the Administration Committee and, with the agreement of Madam Speaker, a further extension to taping to cover the proceedings of Westminster Hall has been permitted since about a week ago. As from yesterday, filming in Members' offices will be allowed. I know that the lack of facilities for the sensible making available of Members' views to the news media has been a source of irritation to them in the past. I hope that the easement will be welcomed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, was asked—

Reform

41. Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): What representations he has received on proposals to reform the Commission to make it more accountable to the House. [109660]

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (on behalf of the House of Commons Commission): We have received one formal representation directly on the matter from the Finance and Services Committee, together with a cogently argued letter from the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South–West (Dr. Starkey). These views, as well as those expressed by the hon. Members who took part in the debates on 22 January and 2 February, are all being taken into account by the Commission in deciding how to move forward with improvements to the House's domestic administration and the provision of services to Members.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. In the light of the earlier exchanges, can he undertake that he and his colleagues in the Commission will examine one important issue in the context of the Braithwaite report—namely, the way in which the Commission itself is appointed and its accountability to the House?

Mr. Kirkwood: The way that the Commission is appointed is determined by the House of Commons (Administration) Act 1978. Section 1(2)(d) says that the Commission shall include "three other members of the House of Commons appointed by the House".

The Commission obviously has to submit to that statutory provision, but the method of producing the names that are confirmed by the House is a matter more for the usual channels than for the Commission.

If there were to be different ways of producing names for appointment by the House, they could be introduced by the usual channels—once memorably described by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) as the most polluted waterway in Britain. I do not need to give my hon. Friend any lessons about how the usual channels work.

Rail Safety

12.30 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. John Prescott): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on rail safety.

There is a lot of progress to report in the four months since the tragic accident at Paddington last October. In the week of the Coroner's inquiry into the deaths at Paddington and the Professor Uff report on the Southall tragedy, the deepest sympathies from hon. Members on both sides of the House go out to the relatives and friends of those who died.

That prompts us to redouble our efforts to raise the standards of railway safety. Today is a day for decisions, but not for final decisions. We are taking a significant step towards a safer and more secure railway system. The Paddington disaster taught us that we must do more to improve railway safety in Britain. I have asked Lord Cullen for a full, comprehensive report on rail safety and I have asked Sir David Davies to look at the immediate steps that could be taken now to improve safety.

Both the Davies and the Health and Safety Executive reports published today show that we can make a start on improving rail safety. I am not prepared to wait for the most perfect technology to be developed, for the most perfect administrative machinery to be put in place or for the most perfect legislation to be drafted if that means needless delay in the meantime. What can be done must be done to improve rail safety immediately.

I have been pressed, rightly, not to pre-empt Lord Cullen's inquiry and report, and I shall not do so. What motivates me is asking whether there is anything that I can reasonably do as quickly as possible to improve railway safety. The decisions that I am announcing today are not, therefore, final decisions. They are part of a step-by-step process that started before Paddington and has moved forward today with the Davies and HSE reports.

That process will move forward again when Lord Cullen reports, and again when we put in place any legislative changes that follow from that. The report will cover the overall regime of safety management and safety regulation on the railway. Lord Cullen set to work immediately after the Ladbroke Grove incident.

Shortly after the crash, I called together the industry's leaders to talk about an urgent action plan. We agreed a programme that covers matters such as driver training, signals passed at danger, train protection and a national confidential safety reporting system, which was welcomed by everyone. That programme is on target.

One issue that has caused great concern, particularly in the House, is signals passed at danger. I am glad to report that far fewer trains are now passing red lights. The average monthly figure over the past three months has fallen by one third, from 56 to 38, compared with the same period a year ago. Over the past decade that figure has nearly halved. I am sure that the House will welcome that and congratulate all those who have played a part in reducing the number of those incidents.

I said to the House last year that I was minded to separate out the main functions of Railtrack's safety and standards directorate—that is, its responsibilities towards train operators. I made it clear that that required careful consideration to ensure greater coherence on safety and not increased risk. I can now announce steps to achieve that separation, pending Lord Cullen's public inquiry. The separation is needed to remove conflicts of interest between Railtrack's responsibility to manage the network safely, which it must retain, and the responsibilities of its safety and standards directorate to train operators, principally in approving their safety cases.

The Transport Sub-Committee identified that conflict, as did the Health and Safety Commission, and today I am taking action to correct it. I asked the commission to investigate those concerns further. It has made a detailed examination of the way in which Railtrack undertakes its safety duties, and will now establish a programme of action to achieve best practice in that work.

A second report was prepared by a senior team with wide experience of safety management and regulation drawn from different industries and led by my Department. It made several recommendations. First, the main area of conflict in Railtrack's safety directorate is its prime role in approving the safety cases for train operating companies. Contrary to press reports, I accept the recommendation that Railtrack should be stripped of that responsibility, which will in future be carried out by the Health and Safety Executive. Secondly, Railtrack will lose direct control of its remaining industrywide responsibilities, principally to develop group standards and prepare the rail group safety plan.

The department concerned, Railtrack's safety and standards directorate, will become a free-standing subsidiary company. New conditions in Railtrack's network licence and a board representing the whole industry, with outside members and an independent chairman, will ensure the independence of that company from Railtrack's commercial interests. It will have finances and accounts separate from those of Railtrack. The company's chief executive will be appointed by the separate independent board, not by Railtrack, and he or she will not be a director of Railtrack. His or her remuneration will be based on safety, not on Railtrack's commercial success.

The existing safety advisory board, a broadly based body with industry and trade union representation, will continue to provide strategic advice to the new company. The new company will be separated from Railtrack's operational management. The Health and Safety Executive will play a greater role in safety audits. The new company will be tasked with a more comprehensive audit regime, including annual audits of safety case holders.

The two reports confirm my judgment that immediate action was needed. The measures can be taken now, without awaiting primary legislation and without pre-empting Lord Cullen's recommendations. They emphasise Railtrack's responsibility to operate the network safely; however, Railtrack's dominance of the industry's safety agenda has not delivered and it must end.

In addition, I have decided that it is not right that responsibility for setting and enforcing security standards, including anti-terrorist measures, should reside in a private company. Therefore, I am transferring that role from Railtrack to my Department, which will bring security regulation of the railways in line with that of aviation, shipping and the channel tunnel.

[Mr. John Prescott]

I should like to make two things clear: first, nothing relieves any railway company of its proper responsibility to protect the safety of passengers, staff and the general public. Secondly, today's announcement sets out an interim position; the final fate of the SSD will be decided following Lord Cullen's report.

The Paddington crash underlined the need for better train protection systems to protect trains from passing red signals, independent of a driver's response. I was determined that our railways should provide the best train protection at the earliest opportunity. I asked Sir David Davies, president of the Royal Academy of Engineering, to assess the effectiveness, practicability and cost of train protection systems.

Sir David's principal conclusion is to support the installation of the train protection and warning system across the network as soon as possible, with automatic train protection on lines with speeds above 100 mph when they are upgraded. Track installation of train protection warning systems will be complete by the end of 2002, a year earlier than planned, and installation on rolling stock by the end of 2003. The system will be brought into use across most of the network before then, starting with the Bedford-Brighton line this year.

Sir David supports an enhanced version, TPWS-plus, which would increase the speed at which TPWS is effective from 75 to 100 mph. It would add some £70 million to the approximately £250 million cost of TPWS. Sir David's clear advice is that that strategy strikes the right balance, irrespective of cost. With the added benefit of TPWS-plus, the system will provide within four years a level of protection that it would take 10 years to achieve if we switched to a programme of installing ATP retrospectively across the network to the fastest realistic time scale.

ATP is already in operation on the Great Western line, the Chiltern line and the Heathrow Express. It is being fitted on the channel tunnel rail link, and will be included in the resignalling of the west and east coast main lines. Sir David recommends that all lines running at over 100 mph should be fitted with ATP as they are upgraded. He specifically recommends taking forward the current programme to fit ATP on the west coast main line from 2002; fitting ATP on the east coast main line, with work starting in 2006, if possible; and fitting full ATP to the Midland main line.

TPWS would have prevented the Paddington crash. The enhanced TPWS that Sir David recommends would have prevented the Southall crash. It can be introduced quickly and it can save lives—more than seven out of 10 accidents are caused by trains passing red signals.

Looking further ahead, Sir David recommends that the industry start planning now for a transition to the most advanced European standard of automatic train protection and train control. That is the next generation of ATP, which will use radio-controlled moving-block signalling for optimum safety at all speeds.

At this stage, it is not possible to put a precise figure on the cost of future ATP installation. Radio-controlled moving-block systems should be cheaper and offer greater benefits than current technologies. Some have estimated the cost at between £1 billion and £2 billion. That is a cost which the industry would have to cover, as safety is not an optional extra.

Sir David's report contains a thorough analysis and a comprehensive programme for now and for the future. I am extremely grateful to him for his clear account of a complex and much misunderstood area. It now falls to the industry to take Sir David's recommendations forward without delay. I look to the industry to take urgent action to upgrade the current TPWS programme to the TPWS-plus that Sir David recommends.

Sir David's other recommendations will provide valuable input to the joint inquiry by Lord Cullen and Professor Uff into train protection systems, which will start this autumn. All reports are being published and placed in the House of Commons Library today.

Since coming to power, and particularly since the Paddington crash, the Government and the safety regulator have taken comprehensive action across all aspects of rail safety. We have worked to bring forward the removal of old slam-door rolling stock from the network; to improve driver training; to protect trains from passing red lights; to improve the processes for setting and enforcing standards; and to address the conflicts and confusions that arose from the way in which the railway was fragmented.

The Strategic Rail Authority is already giving leadership. Lessons learned from investigating the causes of the Southall crash have already been put to good effect in the investigation of Paddington.

On Thursday this week, the Health and Safety Commission is publishing the report of the public inquiry chaired by Professor Uff into the Southall crash in 1997, which will make further recommendations.

Taken together with the decisions that I have announced, I believe that we are now well on the way to a significantly safer railway than the one that we had three years ago, before the Southall crash. Last October, I said that the Paddington tragedy must be a watershed for railway safety. The Government give safety in transport the highest priority. As the House knows, I have campaigned for it all my political life.

Never before have we seen such a concerted effort by such respected authorities to ensure greater safety on our railways. Their work is impressive; their conclusions are persuasive; and the industry's response is positive. Now we look forward to Lord Cullen's report on how the strongest possible culture of safety can be constructed throughout the railway industry. Such a total commitment to safety is the response demanded by the tragedies of Southall and Ladbroke Grove, as I am sure the whole House will agree.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for his statement and for providing me in advance with a copy of it and of the three reports. I join him in his renewed expression of sympathy for those involved in the Paddington crash.

The Conservatives will shortly submit proposals on rail safety reform to the Cullen inquiry for consideration. We support entirely the Government's objective of strengthening the safety culture on the railway—immediately, if possible. However, the railways could learn from civil aviation, an industry that is privatised and fragmented but enjoys the best safety record of the transport industries.

We want the Cullen inquiry to consider whether the railway inspectorate should be removed from the health and safety inspectorate, and put in a specialist legislative framework with the rail regulator, thus resembling the Civil Aviation Authority.

The Cullen inquiry should consider whether the Government should establish a new independent rail accident investigation branch of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, similar to that which exists for air and marine accidents to ensure the impartiality of investigations. It should also consider whether Railtrack should continue to be responsible for the safety and standards directorate and, if so, in what form.

We have already recommended an independent chairman for the safety and standards directorate. The report issued this morning recommends that its prime functions—setting group standards and the intra-industry system of safety assurance—remain in Railtrack. Does the Deputy Prime Minister accept that recommendation?

I shall remind the House of the chronology of events that surround the safety and standards directorate. The intensity of the immediate reaction to the Paddington disaster on 5 October demanded a cool head and measured judgment. On Wednesday 6 October, the day after the fatal crash, the Deputy Prime Minister announced the Cullen inquiry, and we gave that decision the fullest possible support. When I visited the crash site with Lord Macdonald of Tradeston, the Minister for Transport, on Friday 8 October, he gave no hint that the Government were about to do anything precipitate.

Why, therefore, did we read in newspapers on Sunday 10 October that the Government were to "strip" Railtrack of its safety role? The Deputy Prime Minister has had to change his mind, and I respect him for coming to the House to make his announcement. However, I ask him to reflect on whether his briefing to the Sunday papers on Friday 8 and Saturday 9 October contributed anything to rail safety. Is not there a lesson to be learned? Does the Deputy Prime Minister recall the words of Sir Alastair Morton, the chairman of the Strategic Rail Authority, who gave the following warning:

"If you change the rail safety regime in haste, you will repent it at leisure"?

I welcome the Deputy Prime Minister's assurance that nothing that he has said today or on previous occasions is intended to limit the remit of the Cullen inquiry. Whatever our view of the issues, that is the basis on which we supported his decision to set up the inquiry. That is also the view of the victims' families.

I welcome the conclusion of Sir David Davies' inquiry, which vindicates the decisions of the Deputy Prime Minister and his predecessors to proceed with TPWS. What assurances can the right hon. Gentleman give that the next generation of ATP and computerised train control systems, which we all support, can be delivered? What assurances can he give about the increase in the number of signals passed at danger in the past month? What does he learn from the most recent figures and when will the welcome initiative on driver training begin to bear fruit?

It is our duty to question and hold the Deputy Prime Minister to account on this matter as on any other. However, I assure him that we shall put no obstacle in his path to prevent the improvement of rail safety, not only for the sake of today's rail passengers and staff but for those who were injured, those who died and those who were bereaved last October.

Mr. Prescott: I thank the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) for his statement and his intention to give evidence to the Cullen inquiry. We should all do that if we believe that lessons can be learned and improvements made.

Some of the hon. Gentleman's statements tried to rewrite history. I do not want to go into detail, but I shall respond to two points that he made. I am glad that he welcomes Sir David Davies' recommendation on TPWS, but the previous Administration did not make a decision on that. This Government made the decision. Arguments took place in the previous Administration about whether they should adopt TPWS and, indeed, ATP.

Mr. Jenkin indicated dissent.

Mr. Prescott: Well, it is a matter of record. I shall not go into the arguments, but we had to make a decision. That is why I came to the House and made the decision. However, that is history.

If we can combine to improve safety on the railways, I welcome that. I also welcome the hon. Gentleman's first point and the general tone of his response, for which I am grateful.

On whether there should be a separate regulatory body similar to the Civil Aviation Authority, although I understand the respect that is shown for it as a safety regulatory body, it was hoped that the same might have been achieved for the maritime safety body, but after the Marchioness affair people do not feel quite the same. There is no guarantee that that will occur, but my point is that the Select Committee made it absolutely clear that it wants a separate transport safety body. That is why I set up the transport safety review, which is about to report. There are a number of options—the hon. Gentleman identified one or two and I look forward to the debates on that matter—but it is important to separate the safety and commercial functions. Let me now deal with his point about Railtrack.

Under health and safety legislation, every company in this country—whether a railway company or not—has a direct responsibility for safety. Nobody has ever suggested that Railtrack should be stripped of its direct safety responsibilities, but, like the Health and Safety Executive report, we draw a distinction. I ask the hon. Gentleman to believe that I did not brief on that report. I should make it clear that that is not my style; I do not play that way—I did not do so even yesterday, I might add. The separation of those responsibilities was asked for. Group standards affect the train operating companies, for example, and they complained of unfairness and a conflict of interest because Railtrack administers railway system standards.

I initiated two reports—one by the Health and Safety Executive and another, to which I am referring today, by my Department—which confirmed that judgment. That is why I have separated those responsibilities—I have not left responsibility for governing group safety with Railtrack. I ask the hon. Gentleman to read the reports to see why I have reached that conclusion. The separation of powers is clear to this extent: there is an independent company and an independent chairman—[Interruption.] Well, we shall continue the debate, but the prime purpose of the statement is to show exactly what the reports asked of me—that there should be separation.

There could be an argument for going all the way and legislating to take safety out completely, but I would like to hear what Lord Cullen has to say. However, I am not prepared to do nothing and wait for him. I believe that the statement will improve safety. My obligation is to achieve the best possible safety on the railway system, and that is what I have recommended today.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): My right hon. Friend cares very much about railway safety and when he identified Ladbroke Grove as the watershed he expressed the views of many of the people of this country. Can he tell us, therefore, whether the independent company will be a subsidiary of Railtrack? If so, to whom will the independent chairman report? Will he report directly to the Secretary of State and not through Railtrack under any circumstances?

My right hon. Friend will be aware that, since the accident, not one senior Railtrack executive, apart from the person responsible for public relations, has been required to resign. That is a matter of considerable astonishment. Can he give the House a very precise timetable for the implementation by the train operating companies and Railtrack of the new TPWS that he suggests? That can be only an interim measure before we move on, in the next decade, to the new and much tougher equipment.

Mr. Prescott: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments. The work of her Select Committee has influenced us a great deal in these matters. She asks when TPWS can be implemented. The date has been brought forward by a year, so I can confirm that it should be implemented by 2003. However, I would not want people to believe that that is all we are doing. ATP is already being implemented in the system and it is important that we continue with that, but the argument is about achieving the best balance and the best mix. Going with one—at least TPWS, but not ATP—would not achieve the best possible safety. However, adopting the TPWS recommendation means that about 70 or 75 per cent. of accidents can be avoided, so it is my obligation to implement it as quickly as possible. As Sir David Davies says, it will take the best part of eight or 10 years to implement ATP completely, but I have to make a judgment for the safety not only of train drivers, but of the passengers on the system. We must also consider prevention. That is sufficient justification for me to act today.

The company that is being set up will have an independent chair and the directors will be appointed by the company. It will be a subsidiary of Railtrack.

The main concern is not Railtrack's responsibility for stations and tracks but its responsibility for group safety involving the operators and freight companies. The subsidiary company will have direct responsibility in those matters. It will produce annual reports, be audited and work closely with the Health and Safety Executive. Its finance will come from Railtrack, but it will not be involved in Railtrack's commercial decisions. Its finances will be properly audited, separated and ring-fenced so that we can all make a judgment.

It is important to take this step now, but a total separation may be necessary, as the Transport Sub-Committee has recommended. I await Lord Cullen's report, but my statement improves the situation and reduces the confusion.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): I begin by reiterating our sympathy to the friends and relatives of all who died in the Paddington rail crash. I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for his statement, especially the reaffirmation of his commitment to making safety his first priority. I also thank him for making available a copy of the Davies report. I welcome that report and the Deputy Prime Minister's acceptance of its main recommendations.

Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether it is his intention that the total cost of meeting those recommendations will fall on the operating companies, and subsequently on the users of the services, or whether the Government will make a contribution towards those costs? I found his answer to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) somewhat ambiguous. In October, he agreed with me that public confidence in our railways would be re-established only with the setting up of an entirely separate body responsible for establishing and monitoring safety standards. What he has proposed is half baked. I do not believe that it will give the clarity that the public require.

Although I appreciate that the right hon. Gentleman has no intention of pre-empting the Cullen inquiry, will he reaffirm to the House his statement in October last year that he is minded to have a complete separation, not this half separation that he is offering? As he has just said, the money for the subsidiary body will still come from Railtrack.

Mr. Prescott: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words, and his congratulations to Sir David Davies on an excellent piece of work. In commissioning that report, I was asking an independent engineer to give a proper judgment on the technical possibilities of the different systems and their cost. The cost is approximately £250 million across the industry. The industry is already gearing up for and carrying those costs: it entered into an agreement with me 12 months ago, so they are already being fed into the system.

The hon. Gentleman asked me whether the costs will come out of the directors' pockets or be covered by the fare structure. I think that he will agree with me that the regulated framework of fares and track charges will cover most of the costs. Sir David Davies makes it clear that he has made his judgment not on cost, but on safety. That is what the House wanted him to do, and he has given his judgment.

My position on a separate body remains the same, but I am in some difficulty. I could make the decision now to introduce legislation and separate the function entirely before Lord Cullen makes his recommendations and before I have been able to come to a full and proper conclusion on the advice presented to me by the Select Committee. However, it is also necessary to consider other issues, such as the proper evidence of inquiries, whether there are conflicts between inquires and court cases, and the whole business of corporate responsibility. Those matters are being decided now.

I think that the proper way to deal with the problem is to separate these functions. The House will make a judgment about whether the subsidiary company is operating independently. I have no doubt about that. I am sure that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) will read the reports and make a judgment about the recommendations given to me. It is not me who is making a judgment: the inquiry will give me, and the Select Committee has given me, recommendations and the House can make its own judgment.

I believe that this measure is the best solution at the present time. We can make changes in the licence that governs the railways to improve safety without primary legislation. I have tried to do what relatives and lawyers have often asked me to do, which is not to pre-empt Lord Cullen's report. That is absolutely right. I have no doubt that it will require legislation, and then I can deal with the matter properly.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May I offer strong support for the Deputy Prime Minister's statement? I support both his recognition that the best is sometimes the enemy of the good, and the passion with which he spoke. But will the Deputy Prime Minister do one thing that relates to my constituents? It is a question of the Forth rail bridge, and the outrageous circumstances in which the firm, Wilkie Hook, which is carrying out the maintenance without which the bridge might be in danger, has been driven into receivership by an absurd row—not of its making—between Railtrack and Rigblast? Will the Deputy Prime Minister ask Railtrack what on earth it thinks it is doing?

The chairman of the Royal Bank of Scotland, George Younger—who is known to the House—is as exasperated as I am by the idea that the greatest monument to 19th-century engineering, let alone the connection to the highlands, has been put in danger. This is a safety issue: it honestly is.

Mr. Prescott: My hon. Friend always makes a powerful case—

Madam Speaker: It does not always relate to what is being discussed.

Mr. Prescott: My hon. Friend related his question to safety in this instance. Let me reassure him: he has raised an important issue, and I shall write to him.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us by what date the process of fitting ATP to all lines on which trains run at more than 100 mph will be completed?

Mr. Prescott: I recommend Sir David Davies's excellent report to the hon. Gentleman. The report says that ATP cannot be introduced before 2008 to 2010. I was forced to decide whether to wait until the modern European technology arrived, or whether to act now, some five or six years earlier, and possibly prevent a great many accidents. I think that I achieved the right balance.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Like a number of other hon. Members, I lost constituents in the Paddington disaster. I lost a good friend in Bob Cotton.

I think that what the Deputy Prime Minister has said will allay the fears of relatives and friends. In the immediate aftermath of Paddington, he met MPs representing people affected by what happened. Will he keep that dialogue open? It is relatives and friends who will pay most attention to what he has said today. I feel that we should do all that we can to convey to them that steps are being taken, and that a balance is being achieved between action now and waiting for the results of, in particular, the Cullen report.

Mr. Prescott: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend has said. He brought to mind the moment when, on the day of the tragedy, Rodney Bickerstaffe—also known to hon. Members—rang me to ask about his close friend Bob Cotton, who, tragically, was on the train.

My hon. Friend reminded us of the role and the concerns of relatives. As the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) said, it behoves us all to ensure that we establish the best possible safety measures, and we must all work to achieve that.

I did meet a number of people, and intend to retain the obligation as we carry out the various processes involved in improving safety. Many changes will be necessary. In the next year or so we shall receive important reports—quite apart from those that we have already received—and, in view of that, I shall certainly maintain my direct dialogue with relatives.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): I listened carefully to the right hon. Gentleman's answer to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). He has announced that the safety and standards directorate will, after all, be part of Railtrack. Will he confirm that that is contrary to his previous announcements? We all appreciate that it is important to take account of the reports of the various commissions and that of the Transport Sub-Committee. Why, then, did the right hon. Gentleman say anything at all about his intentions in October, given that he has now completely changed his mind?

Mr. Prescott: I know that the hon. Lady is usually given a question to ask, but I will try to give the best answer. I made the statement about being minded to make a change because I had received a Health and Safety Commission report on the day of the collision itself. Indeed, I commissioned that report in response to the request of the Select Committee to look at the conflict of interest in Railtrack.

That report made it clear—we quoted it and the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) has quoted it at the Dispatch Box—that there was a feeling that there was a conflict of interest—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Prescott: The report said that there was a feeling in the industry of a conflict of interest, particularly from the train operating companies. It is a matter of record; it has been written into the record of the House. I have had two reports since then to confirm that. Therefore, I am taking action of the kind that I have set out today. It is a proper balance; the balance is right. It may not have finished the process, but basically it will make the position safer. The Opposition would have done better to understand that, as they directed the safety system and implemented it under the privatisation of the railways.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): My constituency of Slough is very concerned about this matter—five people who worked in Slough were killed at Notting Hill. I can forgive my constituents for being confused about what is going on because, having read this morning's newspapers, I arrived thinking that we were planning to go completely backwards from the Deputy Prime Minister's welcome statement to the House. I have been immensely reassured by what he has said, particularly by his statement that the step to improve the independence of the safety and standards directorate is not the end of his consideration of the matter, but that, quite properly, he will reflect further after the Cullen inquiry. Particularly in view of the question from the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing), perhaps he could reassure my constituents that, if the conclusion of all that consideration is that having independence in that function is the way to make our railways safer, he will introduce any necessary legislation to do that.

Mr. Prescott: I have some sympathy for my hon. Friend's remarks. With the modern communications of today, there are always complaints about leaks and whether statements are made to the House. It has always been my intention—and my history—to make statements for which I have responsibility to the House.

I cannot guarantee that there will not be leaks. That is unfortunate, with even the Opposition perhaps responding to them. I find that the turf is set out before I can make the statement. It leaves me a little bemused, but my job is to come to the House and to make the statement. I have done that today. I have given my best judgment of what the balance is with regard to independence. My hon. Friend can rest assured that, if necessary, and certainly if Cullen recommends it, we will take the necessary legislative actions to ensure that we have the best and safest railway system in Europe.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): Will my right hon. Friend accept my congratulations on the two-stage approach that he has outlined: immediate improvement by separating responsibility for safety; and the prospect of further steps if so recommended by Lord Cullen? Just half an hour before the statement, there were television interviews of relatives of victims of the tragedy on the basis that no change was to be made. Does he agree that that was totally irresponsible and that victims should not be exploited by the media on the basis of press speculation?

Mr. Prescott: I thank my hon. Friend for his words of support. I agree with what he has said, particularly having heard the reports on the BBC. It was made clear to the BBC that the reports could not be based on the statement that I was making. It made no difference. It had all the interviews lined up, went on and made its case.

BILL PRESENTED

CRIMINAL JUSTICE (MODE OF TRIAL) (NO. 2)

Mr. Secretary Straw, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Secretary Smith, Mr. Secretary Murphy, Jane Kennedy and Mr. Charles Clarke, presented a Bill to make provision for determining the mode of trial in the case of offences triable either summarily or on indictment; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Monday 28 February, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed. [Bill 73].

Television Licence Fee (Abolition)

1.10 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949; to remove the requirement for the obtaining of certain wireless telegraphy licences; to make provision with respect to the funding of the British Broadcasting Corporation; and for connected purposes.

Did you know, Madam Speaker, that the United Kingdom is spending more than £150 million every year collecting and enforcing the television licence fee? Did you know that the BBC, through its agents, detects more than 1,000 people every day—more than 365,000 people every year—who should be paying the licence fee, but are not? Did you know that, every year, our court system is clogged by up to 150,000 cases—involving mainly women and students—in which non-payers of television licence fees are prosecuted, convicted, fined and/or imprisoned? Did you know that in Northern Ireland the rate of licence fee evasion is said to be more than 30 per cent?

This deregulatory Bill—that is what it is—would put an end, once and for all, to the monumental waste, abject misery and injustice that the archaic television licensing system entails. It would also set the BBC free. May I—with you, Madam Speaker, and more than 20 million other people in the United Kingdom—declare a financial interest in the Bill? This measure, when enacted, from April, will save us each £104 annually, with the saving rising to about £150 annually in 2006.

My Bill already enjoys significant support. Last week, The Southern Daily Echo conducted a telephone poll on my proposal, causing it to produce a headline in Saturday's newspaper saying, "Our Readers Back MP's Bid to Scrap TV Licence". However, that already strong support is increasing even further, as the impact of yesterday's Government announcement sinks in.

Yesterday, the Government announced that, on 1 April, the television tax, or licence fee, would increase by double the rate of inflation, and by 60 per cent. above the rate of inflation for each of the next seven years. If only the Government treated our deserving pensioners with the same benevolence that they bestow on the BBC!

The so-called digital surcharge is now to be paid by everyone. Yet, the Davies panel concluded:

"It is unfair to charge analogue households for the development of digital services which they cannot receive".

The panel also said:

"The licence fee is a regressive charge since it falls equally on all households whatever their income. It, therefore, bears more heavily on the poor than on the rich."

I welcome the introduction of free licences for those who are over 75—an idea that was promoted earlier this Parliament in a Conservative ten-minute rule Bill. However, as the Institute for Fiscal Studies told the Davies panel, a free licence for those who are over 75 and a 15 per cent. increase in the standard licence for everyone else would result in 71 in every 100 poorest households being worse off. That is exactly what the Government have achieved. They are making 71 in every 100 poorest households worse off.

One might have expected a Government who say that they are committed to reducing social exclusion to act accordingly. However, as is so often the case, the Government say one thing but do another. The increased television tax will hit the poor hardest and make social exclusion worse.

Is it possible to have public service broadcasting without having to have a licence fee? The answer is that of course it is. The BBC World Service is already funded by the taxpayer, and the principle of taxpayer funding for at least part of the BBC has been accepted by the Government in the abolition of the fee for those aged over 75.

Advertising and sponsorship are also compatible with the public service requirement. Indeed, Lord Bragg, in addressing a meeting at last year's Labour party conference, said:

"ITV and Channel 4 are capable of every bit as much quality, integrity and creativity as the BBC."

The question everyone is asking is why, if ITV and Channel 4 are able to achieve that without a licence fee, the BBC cannot do the same.

Yesterday, the Secretary of State repeatedly referred to the quality of the BBC as though it were the licence fee that generated such quality. However, the Labour-supporting Lord Bragg has exposed the fallacy in such thinking. He has also drawn attention to the way in which, in the past 10 years, the BBC has taken on a great deal of advertising of its own—advertising itself, time and time again. He observed:

"The BBC has actually helped ITV as British TV is now much more seamless than it has ever been before."

Every year some £14 billion is spent on advertising in the United Kingdom—including £4 billion on television advertising and £500 million on radio advertising. Advertising makes innovation and product development more attractive as a competitive weapon. The Bill would make advertising itself more competitive.

I have been asked what the BBC would do without access to the licence fee. My answer is that it would have the freedom to compete globally, deciding its own expenditure priorities and investment, free from Government control. A significant element of yesterday's statement was that the Government wished to take even greater control over the BBC. The Secretary of State wants the BBC to engage in self-help. If it has the freedom that the Bill would give it, it will then be able to exercise that self-help.

At present, because the demand for television advertising is greater than the available air time, the price of advertising is artificially high. That works to the benefit of the independent television companies, but against the interests of consumers and those who wish to advertise their products. That explains why we never find the independent television companies arguing in favour of advertising on BBC.

The Bill would remove a licence fee system that was appropriate in 1949 when independent broadcasting funded by advertising had not been invented and when ownership of a television was the privilege of only a few, but it is not appropriate today. We are in the midst of a digital revolution and the technologies of television, telecommunications and personal computing are converging. Those technological changes will render redundant the concept of a licence for individual items of television receiving equipment in the same way as the advent of transistor and portable radios rendered the old radio licence fee redundant.

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

The Bill is a modernising, radical and inclusive measure. Indeed, it is a Conservative measure and I hope that it will have the support of the House. If any right hon. or hon. Members are not yet convinced, let me draw to their attention the editorial in one of today's national newspapers, the Daily Star, which says:

"The £3 rise in the TV licence fee is £3 too much. In fact the entire licence fee of £104 is a costly farce . . . Most BBC programmes are about as exciting as old wallpaper paste . . . The BBC says it wants to be more adventurous. It can do that by scrapping the licence fee altogether. Think of all the dosh it will save on those stupid detector vans."

I could not have put it better.

1.17 pm

Mr. John Grogan (Selby): Like democracy in another context, I would contend that the TV licence system is the least worst system on offer, particularly if we have as our central aim the need to nurture and develop the world-class public service broadcaster, which is still our BBC.

Generally, there is no widespread revolt against the licence fee. Evasion rates are falling sharply. When the BBC took control of the collection of licence fees in 1990, 10 per cent. of licence fees were evaded. According to the report published yesterday by Pannell Kerr Forster for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the figure had fallen to 8 per cent. in 1995-96. It is now down to 5.1 per cent. and is projected to fall to 4 per cent. in the next couple of years. The report concludes that "the overall cost of collection and evasion"

"down to 9% by 2006-07 compared with 13.2% in 1995-96."

That is due to the widespread development of easier payment mechanisms.

Let us set the £104 licence fee in context. The average spend by a cable, digital or satellite subscriber last year was £300, largely on sport and movies. In its report "Public Service Broadcasters Around the World" published in 1998, McKinsey consultants looked at 20 countries. It found that the BBC's operating income per capita was very much in the mid range.

In terms of distribution, the licence fee is certainly regressive, though less so since the concessions for 75-year-olds. Indeed, my father was 75 on 12 November last year, three days after my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the concessions. At least now my father has to accept that I am a man of some influence.

Even though the licence fee is regressive in pure economic terms, I contend that it is progressive in its effects on society as a whole because it means that the BBC can be properly funded. It means that many of the good things about our national life and many of the best things in our culture are available to everyone who has a television or radio set. We should celebrate the mantra of the BBC that it strives to make the good popular, and the popular good. It still accounts for nearly 40 per cent. of our total television viewing. In homes with satellite and cable, the BBC is still the market leader and accounts for 27 per cent. of total viewing. The BBC accounts for 43 per cent. of our total listening and viewing. Its online site is the most visited in Europe and two thirds of all GCSE students last year visited BBC online sites.

McKinsey concluded that there were two essential characteristics of a public service broadcaster that is successful throughout the world. The first was that it was distinctive in programming, content and scheduling; the second that it retained a sufficiently large market share to keep the commercial sector honest. That is one of the reasons why the commercial sector supports the licence fee. The evidence of the Culture, Media and Sport Committee shows little support for the privatisation of the BBC and the abolition of the licence fee, other than from Mr. Kelvin MacKenzie, the ex-editor of The Sun and current managing director of Talk Sport. Both BSkyB and the ITV companies support the continuation of the licence fee.

What are the alternatives? The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) suggested funding through taxation, which is an interesting tax and spend promise. Total state funding for the BBC would mean about 2p on income tax. What would that do for the independence of our national broadcaster? Would Jeremy Paxman seriously grill a Treasury Minister if he knew that the next morning the director general would have to troop into a meeting with the Chancellor of the Exchequer to plead for next year's income? All the evidence from abroad suggests that state funding of a national broadcaster is massively cut in times of recession, as happened in Canada and Australia with great harm caused to the state broadcasters.

The total advertising income of the commercial television sector was £2.6 billion last year and that would not rise dramatically if the BBC was involved. The consultants London Economics suggested that the BBC could obtain some £1.6 billion from advertising if it freed its schedules to advertising. That would totally disrupt the commercial sector but, perhaps more seriously, it would also dumb down the BBC. The news at 9 pm would go the way of the "News at 10" as the BBC chased ratings because its schedules had to fit in with the needs of advertisers.

Sponsorship of programmes is not really an option either. The total sponsorship of British television programmes last year amounted to £50 million and is projected to rise to £100 million, according to ITV. Individual subscription to BBC programmes would destroy universality of access. Fund-raising by the BBC, as happens in the United States, would mean that programme content and management time were totally devoted to fund-raising.

John Birt said that it was the privilege of his life to lead the BBC and Pannell Kerr Forster concluded that the BBC had made significant savings of £500 million over the past five years. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State rightly sets the BBC challenging targets for the next five years, but the BBC should be involved in the digital as well as the analogue world. Market failure also applies in the digital world and market concentration is likely to be more dangerous in the digital world than in the analogue world.

Why should not the BBC seek approval from the Secretary of State to run a children's channel on free-to-air digital to compete with the cartoon-based children's channels that are available at the moment? Why should not it seek to run a 24-hour news channel? The viewing figures for cable television show that News 24 is now outperforming Sky News. On digital television, Sky News is outperforming the BBC, but that is not surprising because the BBC channel is 584th on the Sky programme guide. That is another big issue for the digital world—who controls the programme guides and the gateways?

The McKinsey study of public service broadcasters around the world concluded by stating:

"Our analysis shows that licence-fee-funding has been more stable and predictable than the other forms of funding . . . This allows PSBs to invest in programming or operational improvements, as they can be confident about their revenue for the term of the licence agreement."

Who knows what the future will bring? Perhaps people will receive their television pictures mainly through the internet—if so, we shall indeed be in a different world. However, for the foreseeable future, yesterday's settlement and the licence fee provide the best basis for public service broadcasting in this country.

I do not intend to divide the House but, as chairman of the all-party BBC group, I want to illustrate the strength of support in all sections of the House for the BBC and the principle of the licence fee. For those reasons, I oppose the Bill.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Christopher Chope, Miss Julie Kirkbride, Mr. Ian Bruce, Mr. Eric Forth, Mr. Michael Fallon, Mr. Edward Leigh, Mr. Owen Paterson and Mr. Christopher Fraser.

TELEVISION LICENCE FEE (ABOLITION)

Mr. Christopher Chope accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949 to remove the requirement for the obtaining of certain wireless telegraphy licences; to make provision with respect to the funding of the British Broadcasting Corporation; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 7 April, and to be printed [Bill 72].

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I beg to move,

That this House approves the 1999 Defence White Paper (Cm 4446).

I am very grateful to have the opportunity to open the debate on the 1999 defence White Paper—the first that I have had the privilege to present to the House. It gives me the chance to bring the House up to date with the many initiatives that we have under way to modernise Britain's defence.

This debate also enables me to respond to some of the points made in the recent report by the Select Committee on Defence on the White Paper, and in the Ministry of Defence performance report, although we are of course preparing a detailed written memorandum to respond to the issues raised there.

The central theme of the White Paper is modernisation. It sets out the progress that we have made in many areas, not least in delivering the strategic defence review and in taking forward European defence. It describes how we are modernising the whole of defence—from the farthest end of the procurement chain right through to our front-line capabilities. It is a massive programme of change.

This is not modernisation for the sake of it. The process that we have begun is about delivering improvements to the capability of our armed forces. It is about giving them the structures, equipment and support that they need to do the job effectively. It is also about ensuring that we have developed the security architecture to meet the strategic landscapes of this century, not of the last.

Let no one underestimate the ambition or the significance of the undertaking in which we are now involved. It is a hugely complex and challenging process, but it is a necessary one. A modern Britain needs modern defence forces, and the strategic defence review provides them.

When the outcome of the review was announced by my predecessor in July 1998, it was widely acclaimed on all sides. It was admired for its logic, its good sense and its vision. However, we always knew that we would really be judged on our delivery of the improvements that the SDR proposed.

We made it clear that the changes that we are making would take time to achieve. The heavy operational commitments which our forces undertook around the world last year—in Bosnia, the Gulf, East Timor and Kosovo—have made this still more challenging. We might have preferred a period of calm in which to conduct this revolution, but of course the real world continues, and real operations—such as the need to act to bring an end to Milosevic's repression in Kosovo—had to take priority.

Moreover, our operational experiences over the past year, not least in Kosovo, have reinforced the conclusions of the review. The SDR is on track and will be delivered. The additional £500 million that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer recently allocated to the defence budget to take account of the additional cost of operations in the Balkans and elsewhere will help to ensure this.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hoon: In a second.

The White Paper describes the significant SDR milestones that we have already met. We have already achieved an initial capability for the new joint rapid reaction forces. When complete, in 2002, the JRRF will enable us to deploy forces with real punch anywhere in the world. It will draw forces from a pool of up to 50 warships and support vessels, four brigades and 260 aircraft of various kinds.

Last October, we set up the joint helicopter command. It brings together under a single command almost all our battlefield helicopters and will command 16 Air Assault Brigade. It is responsible for peacetime training and for providing helicopter force packages for operational commanders. Most importantly, however, it will provide a real improvement in operational effectiveness.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hoon: I undertook earlier to give way to the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), so I will do so now.

Mr. Hayes: Could the right hon. Gentleman confirm how many troops are on permanent standby for United Nations global peacekeeping missions? We were told last year that it was in the order of 8,000 to 10,000. Is that number still valid, or has it changed? Has the plan been drawn up or abandoned?

Mr. Hoon: I think that the hon. Gentleman is confusing the mechanism for making force available to the United Nations. What happens is that we declare a number of forces that could be available to the United Nations in appropriate circumstances. In the event of a requirement arising, a request would come from the United Nations to the United Kingdom Government and, if appropriate, we would accede to that request. However, there are no forces specifically standing by waiting for a request from the United Nations.

Mr. Dalyell: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hoon: Certainly.

Mr. Dalyell: At some point convenient in his speech, and not necessarily at this moment, will my right hon. Friend say something about what is happening in Mitrovica?

Mr. Hoon: Yes, I will.

A new joint doctrine and concept centre is already up and running. It will provide the fully joined-up thinking needed to address the security challenges facing us in the future, and will achieve its full capability in April of this year.

We have created a joint nuclear biological and chemical defence regiment. The joint Rapier training unit is now a reality. The Defence Procurement Agency opened for business last spring, bringing greater efficiency in delivering fighting equipment to the front line. The first of our defence diplomacy scholarship courses is already under way. We said that we would do all these things, and we have done each of them.

In the next few months, we will see a number of major new developments. The first Apache attack helicopter for the Army is already flying. Once in service with the British Army, this world-beating piece of equipment will mark a quantum leap in our ability to bring force rapidly to bear on the battlefield. It is about real capability, every bit as revolutionary in its way as the introduction of the tank in 1916.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): The Minister is going through a list of initiatives that sound impressive, but when the Royal Navy runs out of fuel and cannot put its warships to sea, how can any of that lead to a credible defence for our country?

Mr. Hoon: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I will deal with that in due course. However, the list does not simply sound impressive—it is impressive. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will concede that, with his characteristic generosity.

On 1 April, joint force 2000—the joint Royal Navy/Royal Air Force Harrier force—will form. It is not about organisational neatness—it is about modern ways of working to deliver defence output most effectively. The aircrew who will operate these aircraft tell everyone of their excitement about the new arrangements.

In April, we will launch the new Defence Logistics Organisation. That brings together the three single service logistic support areas into a tri-service organisation employing more than 40,000 people. It will allow us to deliver more cost-effective support by rationalising common functions across the services, freeing up more resources for the front line.

We have also made radical changes to defence procurement, an area in which the record of the previous Government was lamentable. Our smart procurement initiative will help to fix that. Smart procurement is already delivering results. It will provide high-quality world-beating equipment cheaper, faster and better. For example, the White Paper mentions that the Challenger 2 integrated project team responsible for introducing this new world-class tank to the British Army has so far identified £200 million in savings. That figure could easily rise to £400 million. The adoption of innovative support arrangements for Eurofighter will save up to £1.8 billion over the life of the aircraft.

Smart procurement is also helping to reduce overstretch. In response to an urgent requirement, we have worked closely with industry to place a competitive contract for a new communications system for Bosnia and Kosovo, freeing up to 260 Royal Signals soldiers from their Balkan commitment by the end of the year. Overall, the changes that we have introduced will provide better equipment at lower cost and help to reduce to a minimum the wasteful cost overruns that had become the hallmark of procurement mismanagement under the Conservative Government.

This is an impressive programme of change, but hon. Members might have been forgiven for doubting the picture I paint had they relied on some of the more sensational reporting of recent weeks. I know that some journalists do not like to let the facts get in the way of a good story, but it is a serious matter if misleading reporting leads to a reduction in public confidence in the armed forces. These are important issues and I want to spend some time confronting them head on.

First, much has been written recently about the equipment that our troops had during the Kosovo campaign last year. The fact is that our service personnel had everything that they needed to do the job that they were asked to do. That is not just my view: it is the view of force commanders at all levels; yet there have been constant criticisms, for example, of the boots used in the Falklands campaign—criticisms that have been packaged up and applied to the entirely different and very modern boots worn by our soldiers in Kosovo. The clothing given to our soldiers is excellent. I have seen myself that it is light, warm, waterproof and easy to wear, even in the most difficult conditions.

It would be ridiculous to suggest that every piece of equipment that we have is absolutely perfect. The SA80 rifle, for example, is a capable and highly accurate weapon. It has some reliability problems, especially in extreme conditions, and steps are being taken to ensure that those are put right quickly.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): The Secretary of State mentioned equipment. As he knows, I was in Kosovo last week. I visited the Mitrovica bridge last Wednesday with Lieutenant-Colonel Nick Carter. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that our forces on the bridge there will, as of today, have the right respirators, so that if a riot breaks out, as it did yesterday, and French or other KFOR troops use tear gas, our troops will not be left vomiting and crying on the banks of the river because they do not have them?

Mr. Hoon: That is something that we are looking at. I recognise the concern.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): The right hon. Gentleman mentioned press reports. He will have seen in this morning's newspapers reports that our armed services in Northern Ireland may be asked to apologise for their activities there in the past 30 years. He will be only too well aware that many British service men have given their lives in defence of their country and to prevent Northern Ireland from falling into anarchy so, as Secretary of State for Defence, will he assure the House that he will stand firmly opposed to our troops being dishonoured in that way?

Mr. Hoon: I will deal with that matter, so, if the hon. Lady will bear with me, I will return to it in a moment. However, as a former journalist she should know that she must not believe everything that she reads in newspapers.

The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) referred to what I can only describe as the ill-informed speculation about activity levels for the Navy. Let me make it clear that the fleet was not withdrawn at Christmas, it has not run out of money and it is not confined to port. Of course, the Navy has to adjust the fleet's programme to keep within budget and to balance new training against the unusual level of operational activity in 1999, but it is being done without reducing our overall capability. As the Commander-in-Chief, Fleet recently said,

"I have no difficulty with managing my business within the limit given to me".

The Navy is not only going about its business as usual, but has entered a period of major overseas deployment. At the end of last month, HMS Illustrious left for the Gulf at the head of a task group including a nuclear submarine, nine warships and 2,000 men. In the spring, HMS Cornwall will lead a global deployment—Navy task group 2000, which will be one of the largest in 15 years. It will involve three Royal Navy warships, three auxiliaries and a submarine.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): Since the Secretary of State is in denouncing ill-informed press speculation mode, perhaps he will extend that to Warship World, which has informed us that, under the long-term costings, Invincible and Fearless will be transferred to the reserve, along with about seven mine counter-measure vessels and three Royal Fleet Auxiliary ships. As he is rubbishing press speculation, is he in a position to deny that all that is true?

Mr. Hoon: I thought the hon. Gentleman was in the House for Defence questions yesterday, when the same point was made. I made it clear then that there is no truth in that speculation. Whatever the alleged quality of the publication, the hon. Gentleman would do well not to believe all that he reads.

Our amphibious capability will be transformed over the next few years, when the new assault ships Albion and Bulwark enter service. They will complement the new helicopter carrier HMS Ocean, which I had the privilege to visit during a major multinational amphibious exercise off the coast of Egypt last October. We also have plans to acquire new destroyers, frigates and nuclear powered submarines and two new aircraft carriers—the largest vessels to be ordered for the Royal Navy since the second world war. All our attack submarines will be equipped with the highly accurate Tomahawk land attack missile, which was used to such precise effect during the Kosovo campaign. We are tripling the size of our strategic lift capability, and constructing two new auxiliary oilers. It is no wonder the First Sea Lord commented that that represents the best forward-looking equipment programme that he can remember during all his time in the Navy. Taken together, those measures will mark a step change in the Royal Navy's capability.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): Will the Secretary of State explain what he means by "under normal budget constraints"? He sets the budget, so the commanders-in-chief have to live within its limits. When he set the budget, why did he reduce the fuel bill for the Navy by a quarter and then reinstate it as a result of other changes?

Mr. Hoon: As the hon. Gentleman is well aware, the budget is set for a year. One of the innovations that we have been able to introduce is to allow budget holders to determine levels of activity over the course of the year. In those circumstances, it is right and proper that the Navy should make those determinations in the light of the budget. We have allowed that process and it is working most successfully. That is why we have received positive endorsements from leading figures in the armed forces.

I accept that some exercises have been cancelled. The Select Committee report picked up on that matter. There is always a need to strike a balance between the requirements to train our people, to meet operational commitments, to live within resources and not to place unnecessary burdens on personnel and their families. I spend more time thinking about the problems created by the armed forces being asked to do too much than I do thinking about almost anything else. We have now got the balance right. Our forces are up to meeting any likely operational requirement—and they will meet it effectively.

There have been suggestions that large parts of the RAF are grounded. That too is nonsense. The RAF has deployments in the Balkans, Italy, the Gulf and the Falklands. That huge programme of activity is being maintained with sufficient resources, aircraft and pilots. Operations necessarily mean that some routine tasks must come second, but not at the expense of safety. Certainly, we need more pilots, but the RAF has more than achieved its recruitment target this year, and a number of measures are in hand to improve retention.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): The Secretary of State referred to safety in RAF training. Will he say more about that in relation to my constituents in Cumbria? They accept the absolute primacy of national security, but they were most concerned about some of the reports as to the possible causes of the air crash in Shap, in Cumbria, at the end of last year. Will the right hon. Gentleman give a categoric assurance to the people of Cumbria, and of other areas affected by low-flying aircraft, that no reductions will interfere with the primacy of safety—of people in the air and on the ground?

Mr. Hoon: I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising that issue. I have just given that assurance. Safety is paramount and will continue to be so—both for those who fly the aircraft and for his constituents on the ground. I am happy to be able to repeat the assurance that I gave him in writing when he properly raised those matters with me.

We are spending £140 million making good the under-investment in the Defence Medical Services and the demoralisation of their staff that we inherited. The former Second Sea Lord commented:

> "I have been greatly reassured that two successive Secretaries of State and armed forces Ministers have shown greater interest in the welfare of our people than I have ever known before."

The focus of our investment remains to bring our forces up to the standard where they can operate entirely successfully within the structures set out by the strategic defence review.

Mr. Hayes: Does the Secretary of State agree with the Select Committee on Defence that medical services in the armed services are in a state of crisis, which is the term that the Committee used?

Mr. Hoon: No, I do not accept that medical services are in a state of crisis, but I accept that work has to be done. That is precisely why we have allocated £140 million to address the issue.

That money is part of a continuing programme of modernisation. In the last few months alone, we have approved a wide range of new equipment measures: production of the airborne stand-off radar system, worth some £800 million; the assessment phase of the future aircraft carrier and studies on the type-45 destroyer programme, worth a potential £100 million in all; more Rapier surface-to-air missiles, worth £200 million; and an upgrade of RAF Harrier engines, worth £120 million.

The Government's record on defence is there to be judged by the House. We rightly demand the best for our excellent armed forces. However, we would like to be judged on what we are doing, not on what others sometimes claim that we are not doing.

I have talked a lot about equipment. Let me now talk about the men and women of the armed forces. We made our policy for people a central component of the strategic defence review, because we know how vital recruiting and retaining the best people is to our defence capability. We said that we would introduce measures to improve recruitment and retention, and we have.

I mentioned, when I launched the White Paper last December, that I was determined to tackle overstretch. This has been a tough challenge. We inherited an Army undermanned by more than 5,000 people. On top of that, during the strategic defence review, we identified a requirement for more than 3,000 new posts. Despite that shortfall, our forces performed magnificently last year, at the expense of ever more overstretch. We are now making progress. Recruiting is buoyant. Last year, recruitment figures for all three services were the best in a decade. However, the key to tackling overstretch is to stem the flow of skilled people leaving the forces.

We have now made huge strides in reducing commitments. The latest reductions in the Balkans, when fully implemented in the spring, will bring down the percentage of the Army preparing for, deployed on, or recovering from, operations to 28 per cent., compared to 47 per cent. at the height of the Kosovo campaign. That means that we will have reduced commitments below the level that we inherited. During that period, our force levels in Bosnia will have reduced by more than 2,500 and in Kosovo by 6,500. We have also made smaller reductions in other areas such as the Gulf and the Falklands.

I am also pleased to tell the House that improvements in the security situation in Northern Ireland have enabled us to make significant reductions there. Force levels are now well below 15,000, their lowest level since the 1970s, and 30 installations have been closed. We have been able to make those reductions in the Army's presence in Northern Ireland as a result of the peace process. Of course, we want to make more progress, but I make it clear that further reductions in the military presence must be justified solely in terms of the security situation.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has made it clear, not least in the House, that the Government cannot and will not contemplate anything that suggests any equivalence between the security forces and terrorists. There is no gun-swap plan and there is no way in which such equivalence would be acceptable.

Mr. Brady: The Secretary of State has partly answered the point that I was going to make. However, will he give an absolute guarantee in the House, so that it is clear to the public and to those in Northern Ireland who are trying to give the opposite impression, that the commitment of British troops to the Province is to protect the public and law and order and that they will not, in any circumstances, be allowed to enter negotiations with Sinn Fein-IRA?

Mr. Hoon: I have just given that assurance. The security forces are there to assist the police in performing a valuable security function, and they will continue to do so as long as necessary.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North–East Fife): The assurance that the Secretary of State has just given—that there will be no public ceremony of the kind suggested in the newspapers this morning—will be received with great enthusiasm and some satisfaction on both sides of the House. However, will he tell the House by how many the Army is below its permitted establishment? What is the number of vacancies in the Army today?

Mr. Hoon: I shall have to check on the precise figure as of today. We are making progress towards achieving full complement. If we were able to continue at the present rate of improvement, we anticipate that full complement in the Army would be achieved by 2005. We would hope to achieve full complement in the Navy and the Air Force rather more quickly than that. However, that would depend on ensuring that our retention figures improve and, as I said yesterday at Defence questions, on our continuing to make progress away from the previous net reduction in numbers and towards the improvements that we have seen in recent times.

As I have indicated, and as events in Northern Ireland have demonstrated, reducing commitments is not always easy. We have responsibilities around the world and we must discharge them. There are unforeseen contingencies and emergencies to which we must respond. Disruption is in the nature of service life. It is therefore important that our armed forces are well treated and properly rewarded. I am glad that the Select Committee recognises and values the significant steps that we have taken, such as improved access to NHS dentists, to improve the welfare of service families. I am pleased that the Committee also welcomes other practical and manifest changes that the Government have introduced.

We have delivered a package of improved allowances for people deployed on operations. That includes an additional bonus of £1,000 for all who have experienced more than 280 days paid separated service over the two years since December 1997, and a bonus of £2,000 for those who have experienced more than 365 paid days away.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton–Brown (Cotswold): The Secretary of State has described how our commitment throughout the world is being reduced in a number of theatres, such as Northern Ireland, Bosnia and the Gulf. Will he assure us that he will not use that as an excuse to reduce the number of our armed forces below the existing establishment levels forced on him by the budgetary cuts made by the Treasury?

Mr. Hoon: I made it clear in an answer in Defence questions yesterday that we have maintained the levels set out in the strategic defence review and, as the hon. Gentleman will recall, that involves an increase of some 3,300 over the numbers in the armed forces that we inherited.

The bonuses will continue in future years; they will apply to all three services, and they will benefit several thousand of our hardest-working men and women. We have halved the qualifying period for longer separated service allowances from three years to 18 months. We have made personnel who regularly deploy away from home for short periods eligible for separation allowances. We have introduced a common leave allowance. We have guaranteed to all personnel a period of leave after an operational deployment so that they can spend time at home with their families. We have increased free telephone call time on operations from three minutes a week to 20. We are also increasing the allowance for the disruption of normal military life—the so-called X-factor.

A key feature of placing service personnel issues firmly at the heart of our thinking, and part of the implementation of our policy for people, is the armed forces overarching personnel strategy. That is a mechanism that clearly identifies specific actions, breakthrough objectives and responsibilities that will be reflected in the Department's corporate plan. Its aim is to promote operational effectiveness by providing a coherent framework for the development of personnel policies for the future. Implementing those policies will enable us to recruit the people we need and to develop, motivate and retain them. I am pleased to announce that the development of that strategy is now complete, and it will be brought into use from April.

We have just embarked on a major review of training and education, both service and civilian. That is part of the continuing process of modernising defence. Training and education are crucial to the provision of front-line capability. Although much of our training is of a very high quality, there is a need for it to be better integrated and more responsive to training requirements, and to take full account of best practice both inside and outside the MOD.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid–Sussex): The right hon. Gentleman clearly recognises the great importance of armed forces training, and that it should be extremely realistic and pretty robust. Will he therefore explain in a little more detail what he meant by his last comment? What sort of changes has he in mind: for example, to make training more integrated?

Mr. Hoon: Essentially, we are looking to add to the list that I gave earlier many more examples of joint operations between the armed forces. That process began years ago, and I am not suggesting that we have invented it. There is a need for more effective preparation for joint operations and to ensure that training and education integrates activity across the services. In some specific respects, as I have said, we are forming joint organisations that will require a degree of integrated preparation, so that people whose background is in the Royal Navy, for example, will receive training similar to that of people doing a similar job in the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): The Secretary of State will appreciate that, following the drawdown from Germany, there is a problem with training grounds for infantry. I know that a lot of training is carried out jointly between cavalry and infantry, but the Salisbury training area near my constituency has been completely taken over by tanks, with the result that there is now nowhere for the "poor bloody infantry" to train—at least, its training areas are greatly restricted. What plans does the Ministry of Defence have to take back in hand those MOD farms that are currently let to tenant farmers—admittedly, with provision made for training? There is a shortage of training areas for the infantry; what is being done to address that problem?

Mr. Hoon: We are carefully considering that problem, because I recognise the importance of having sufficient training grounds. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) appeared to be somewhat surprised to learn that his constituency has been entirely overrun by tanks, but given all his complaints about defence cuts, I should be thankful for small mercies. Nevertheless, we are pursuing a review of training grounds and we shall continue to do so.

On the subject of education and training, I recognise that some of our structures have not quite kept pace with the changing world. It is important that we complete our review early next year, and I shall report to the House on its findings. Policy for people is delivering for service personnel. Once again, as the Labour Government have done every year, we are implementing in full the pay rise for our service personnel. In addition, we have made real improvements to opportunities for personal development in the services through our learning forces initiative. We are determined to ensure that service personnel have access to modern learning facilities such as interactive learning centres and the internet. Those measures will provide skills for life, not simply for an individual's career in the armed forces.

Our efforts in this sphere extend to the reserves. Reservists do vital and important work and help to make a real difference as a force for good in the world. They have proved their worth time and again, for example in the Balkans, where more than 10 per cent. of our forces are drawn from the reserves. They help to reduce the demands placed on our regular forces. In addition, there is a real benefit to employers or potential employers of reservists: the training and experience provided in the reserves, working alongside our world-class regular armed forces, really does give back a better employee—one who is better skilled and better able to take tough decisions.

Following the strategic defence review, we have taken two key steps to make our reserves more usable. First, we have set up the reserves training and mobilisation centre at Chilwell. That is a dedicated facility to handle the needs of the Army and reservists during mobilisation and demobilisation. Secondly, we have completed the reserve mobilisation study, which has clearly shown that compulsory mobilisation of reserves for peace support operations, such as in the Balkans, can be done: it is both legal and feasible. Although there is no operational requirement to mobilise reserves, I assure the House that we will not hesitate to do so if it becomes necessary. That is not a sign of weakness or lack of preparation—quite the opposite.

I have no doubt that we shall shortly hear a great deal about cuts from the Conservatives. I expect that we shall hear even more about the need to tackle overstretch. However, at no time will we hear anything that even remotely resembles a coherent defence policy. What exactly is the Conservative party's policy on defence? In their so-called common-sense revolution policy document, the Conservatives said that they would match commitments to resources and that, unless commitments could be reduced from their current level, Britain would require a larger Army. However, when my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces asked them to name a commitment that they would cut or into which they would not have entered, they could not name a single one.

While Conservatives talk of cutting commitments, the Labour Government have actually been doing it. We are already committed to increasing the size of the Army by 3,300 people—in many cases, plugging the gaps that were left by the previous Government in terms of support to the front line. What exactly would the Conservatives do differently? Would they spend more on defence? If so, how are they going to pay for it? More important is the question of how they are going to pay for extra defence spending when their own so-called tax guarantee commits them to cutting taxes, regardless of the state of the economy—a policy so barmy that even the shadow Chancellor appears to be trying to get rid of it.

The shadow Chancellor is not the only one. Listen to the comments of the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), the Conservatives' former leader and Prime Minister, in The Daily Telegraph on 13 October last year:

> "In principle, it's a good idea to lower taxes if you can. But to say that you are going to reduce the proportion of taxes to GDP in all circumstances is mad. How do you deliver that in a recession? You don't. You simply don't unless you make such swingeing cuts in the health service and education and the Armed Forces as are inconceivable."

There we have it. Even the previous Conservative Prime Minister does not believe in Conservative policy on tax and spend, particularly when it is applied to our armed forces.

For a moment, it looked as though the Leader of the Opposition had decided to water the pledge down by demoting it from a tax guarantee to a tax aspiration, but he did not have the good sense even to do that, so the policy still stands, with its disastrous implications for defence. The Conservative party has no strategy for easing overstretch, no ideas for cutting commitments, and no money to pay for its empty promises. In short, it has no defence policy worth the name.

Mr. Brady: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way. He seems to be competing with me for generosity. He says that he is looking for a coherent defence policy. Does he think that the Select Committee on Defence recognised a coherent defence policy when it stated that "the problems of overstretch and undermanning suggest that if the wheels have not yet come off the SDR, they are certainly beginning to wobble alarmingly"?

Is that the Government's coherent defence policy?

Mr. Hoon: No, it is not. I have made it clear that I will respond in detail and in writing to the Defence Committee. I have got through 12 detailed pages this afternoon setting out precisely what we are doing. What the hon. Gentleman must do—perhaps he should raise the matter with those on his Front Bench—is establish where the money will come from to fund all the various commitments into which he and they seem to be entering. I am certainly prepared to respond to the Defence Committee, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will ask the same sort of questions of those on his Front Bench and of himself, if he is to advance Conservative policies with any conviction.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): I regret that I must intervene on my right hon. Friend when he is entering his Tory-bashing phase, which we all appreciate. However, his remarks are clearly drawing to an end. If he does not intend to address the policy of the European Union and the development of the common foreign and security policy, will any of his Front-Bench colleagues do that, later today or in the debate on Monday?

Mr. Hoon: I thank my hon. Friend. My very next sentence deals with that matter. I cannot resist the temptation to invite the Conservative party to consider afresh its thinking on European security and the European security and defence identity. That appears to be the only specific thing to which they are opposed—the only coherent element that we can detect in their otherwise incoherent defence policy, despite the fact that it was the previous Conservative Government who signed up to the idea of a European security and defence identity in the first place.

Before I explain to the House what our European defence initiative is about, let me first say what it is not about—in words which I hope even the Opposition will be able to appreciate. They are these:

"It is not a plan for subverting or replacing NATO. It is not a plan for duplicating the huge investment which we and our allies have made in the NATO infrastructure. It is not a plan for a supranational European army under the control of the European Commission subject only to the European Parliament . . . what we are seeing now is an evolution of thinking which began to take shape eight years ago."

Those are not my words. They are the words of the former Conservative Foreign Secretary, Lord Hurd of Westwell, one of the few sane individuals left in the Conservative party when it comes to the subject of Europe, taken from a speech given earlier this month to King's college, London. I was hoping that there might be a Conservative Member willing to challenge those words, but either Conservative hon. Members agree with them, in which case, presumably, we need not take much notice of their comments on Europe, or they disagree with them, in which case, presumably, there has been a fundamental shift in thinking. No doubt the shadow Defence Minister will clarify the matter when he responds.

Mr. Marshall: Clearly, the Opposition do not wish to respond. I understand my right hon. Friend's comments on the development of the policy to which he refers, but if we are to enhance security in Europe through that policy, it is essential that we keep on board the European NATO countries that are not members of the European Union. Will my right hon. Friend explain how we can ensure the involvement of those six countries in the discussions, and in shaping and making decisions about the way in which the second pillar of the European Union will evolve?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise that matter, which is of great concern to the British Government. During the negotiations that led to the Helsinki summit, we insisted that words were incorporated in the resolution that took account of the anxiety about non-EU NATO allies. Those words were included, and we are in the process of elaborating on how the policy will work in practice. I assure the House that the British Government continue to regard that as a priority.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The Secretary of State is dying for us to intervene, so it is only fair to do so. He was keen to quote Lord Hurd, but he should also know that one of our predecessors, Malcolm Rifkind, who was a Member of this House at some point, rejected Lord Hurd's interpretation. Furthermore, as we are considering predecessors, what about Lord Owen, one of the Labour party's great stalwarts? He recently said:

"This is exactly what the EU integrationists wanted. They will now 'communitarise' defence just as they have slowly brought the whole of the CFSP into the orbit of the Commission."

Fair game?

Mr. Hoon: That was an interesting quotation from someone who left the Labour party. As for Malcolm Rifkind, his views show the difference between someone who clearly has ambitions in the Conservative party and someone who has given up the party—or at least its views on Europe—as a lost cause. I have no doubt that Malcolm Rifkind is trying to curry favour with the rampant anti-European obsession tendency which the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) characterises so well.

Mr. Soames: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hoon: I shall certainly give way to a pro-European.

Mr. Soames: I am surprised at the levity and foolishness with which the right hon. Gentleman seeks to dignify his argument. No Conservative Member does not favour sensible, useful co-operation with our European allies and partners. That happens every day in NATO and on many other occasions on joint projects. The previous Administration undertook such projects with the French and many others. Some projects have been more successful than others, but that is because we have to feel our way in those matters.

Conservative Members object to the fact that the Labour party's proposal will undermine the credibility, authority and cohesion of NATO. That is why Conservative Members have grave anxieties about the future of the policy that the Secretary of State advances. For 98 per cent. of us, our objections have nothing to do with being anti-European; we have a genuine anxiety about the defence and security of Europe.

Mr. Hoon: I am surprised by the hon. Gentleman's remarks, because he was a Defence Minister at precisely the time when Lord Hurd was developing the policy of which he now approves. The hon. Gentleman made no objection during the evolution of the policy. On our policy on European defence, Lord Hurd stated:

"what we are seeing now is an evolution of thinking which began to take shape eight years ago."

The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) either overlooks developments that took place while he was a Defence Minister, or his party has made a fundamental lurch to the right, in the direction of anti-European thinking. I suspect the latter.

Mr. Blunt rose—

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) rose—

Mr. Hoon: I must make progress. I have given way often.

Lord Hurd made it clear that it is wrong that Europe collectively can contribute such a small proportion of the total forces required to solve a problem on its doorstep. During operations over Kosovo last year, Europeans flew only a third of the total number of aircraft sorties during the campaign. American military power gave credibility to the diplomatic campaign, although it is true that the majority of forces that now operate under NATO command as KFOR are from European nations. However, deploying a force of a few tens of thousands—a fraction of the total military personnel available to us—on precisely the type of expeditionary peace support operation that we envisage as typical of the operations of the future has stretched Europe's collective resources. It has also raised very difficult questions that will not go away. They need to be confronted head on. That is what we have been doing, together with our European allies and partners.

At the Helsinki European summit in December, the European Union took an enormous step forward in the process of solving Europe's military capability problems, which were so evident in the first half of last year as we pulled together forces to go into Kosovo. We seek to improve Europe's ability to put more forces in the field and to put them there more rapidly. Unfortunately, that relatively clear goal—a straightforward determination to improve European nations' individual and collective military capability—has been lost sight of at times. I regret that sensible discussion of that important issue is often impossible. As it is frequently viewed through the distorting lens of Conservative europhobia, some people seem to be unable to focus on the substance—how best to make Europe pull its weight in providing its own defence.

Let me emphasise that our security, and that of Europe, rests fundamentally with NATO. The alliance has been our guarantor of safety for more than 50 years and we have no intention of changing that. As it has shown over and over again since the end of the cold war, not least at the Washington summit last April, it is able to move with the times and to adapt to changes in the strategic environment. As our American allies have said for almost as long as the alliance has existed, Europe should do more and should contribute more to its own security. The Government agree, but that does not mean simply spending more money. In any case, as Kosovo showed, Europe's problem is not so much the quantity of its defence spending, but its quality. We need to generate more real, usable, military capability. That is what we seek to achieve—not window dressing, but real improvements in our collective ability to conduct operations in the real world.

In the United Kingdom, we have led the way, through the SDR, in turning our forces towards the future. That required some hard decisions. Our allies will have to face the same difficult lessons if they have not yet done so. I urge hon. Members to look closely at the language that came out of Helsinki and to consider carefully the European headline goal for defence. European Union Heads of State and of Government committed themselves to be able, by 2003, to deploy rapidly and sustain for at least a year forces up to 60,000 strong for crisis management tasks, as a contribution to a NATO-led or an EU-led operation. That is a challenging but entirely realistic target, and meeting it will require the modernisation of Europe's armed forces. It will mean making them more readily deployable and sustainable in areas where local infrastructure may be very limited—both are major themes in the SDR—and achieving it will tackle those areas where Europe has proved itself to be weak. It is all about enhancing military capability.

Mr. Dalyell: The national service regiment in which I served, which made me an honorary member of its mess, is shortly to go to Kosovo. May I ask, therefore, exactly what is happening in Mitrovica and what are the medium and long-term aims? There is great concern about that.

Mr. Hoon: There is clearly great tension between the two communities in Mitrovica. British forces, together with other police forces and others, have been involved very recently in seeking to ensure continued stability there, but I do not necessarily recognise a description of what took place as a riot. I saw on the television yesterday, as perhaps my hon. Friend did, a British commander describing the demonstration as essentially good humoured. It speaks volumes for the experience and ability of our armed forces that they were able to resolve the situation so professionally. Clearly we are concerned and shall maintain vigilance to ensure that it does not get out of hand.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I am most grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way. He is showing considerable generosity. As he knows, I support the European security and defence policy, but he, like me, attended the recent Munich conference on security at which there was substantial representation from both the Senate and the House of Representatives. Is it not clear that we have some way to go to allay the anxieties of legislators in the United States? I believe that we can do that. Will he accept from me that we may be able to help to allay those anxieties by accepting that there should be a formal right of first refusal for NATO before any EU action is contemplated?

Mr. Hoon: As the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, I was present at the conference. I spoke there and discussed that issue with a number of members of the House of Representatives and the Senate. I recognise that some legislators have some concerns. I cannot possibly expect to be able to allay every single one of them, because the United States, like the United Kingdom, is a robust democracy in which there is a wide variety of views. We have work to do and we continue to do it.

I visited the United States last month and was encouraged by the support that I found for what we are trying to do. In particular, the US Administration are with us, which is why they signed up to the European defence initiative at the Washington summit last year and have continually repeated their support for it ever since, not least during my visit. As Strobe Talbott, the US Deputy Secretary of State said last December:

> "There should be no confusion about America's position on the need for a stronger Europe. We are not against; we are not ambivalent; we are not anxious; we are for it. We want to see a Europe that can act effectively through the Alliance or, if NATO is not engaged, on its own. Period. End of debate."

Our American allies understand that the proposal is not about weakening NATO. It is about strengthening it and getting rich Europeans to pull their weight in their own defence. That is realised in Washington. It is a pity that, for whatever reason, it is not realised by some here.

I have set out an impressive programme of activity—modernisation, reorganisation and new thinking—but let us not forget that all that innovation is a means to an end. That end is the delivery of effective military force. We will be judged by one thing, and one only: our ability to deliver that force better than ever before. As I speak, we have men in Kosovo acting with skill and courage of which we can all be proud. We have HMS Illustrious in the Gulf at the head of a major naval deployment. We have Royal Air Force aircraft in the skies over Iraq. Those interventions show that we are acting as a force for good, day after day. All the developments that I have described are designed to increase the effectiveness of our forces. I commend them to the House.

2.17 pm

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): I should say at the outset that our support and respect for the members of the armed forces is not in question and will not be disputed by any Member of the House—certainly not any Opposition Member. The Secretary of State was correct to say that they serve in the most difficult circumstances and deliver for this country a service of which we can be justifiably proud. If we ever needed a reminder of their skills and quality, it came in the past few days at Mitrovica. I say without fear of contradiction that the arrival of British troops in that area added greatly to the stability that then ensued. They dealt with difficult circumstances, which could easily have flared up and become worse, and the sheer quality of our armed forces—particularly of the Royal Green Jackets, but also of others—calmed the situation. I am proud of, and determined to support, them. That will not be part of the debate, nor of the criticism, and I hope that he accepts that from Members on both sides of the House.

I agree with the Secretary of State that the strategic defence review was, in essence, debated correctly and welcomed if not in its entirety, then for its central thrust. It would be churlish to say otherwise as I happen to be one of those who published a pamphlet calling for an SDR perhaps two years before the Labour party in opposition came to the idea. A few of my hon. Friends were also involved. I not only thought that an SDR was a good idea, but had high hopes and expectations when it happened. The question is, what happened as a result of the review and what is happening now? The key judgment about which the Secretary of State talked is correct: the review will be judged not on the high hopes of that time, but on what has been delivered. That includes the critical issue of what money has been made available.

To set the debate in context, we must begin with what the SDR delivered in budgetary terms. For all the criticisms of the previous Government about reducing budgets when Labour were in opposition, the fact is that the defence review went on to reduce the budget further. According to Library figures, the reduction is about £800 million, but that is in cash terms and depends on certain variables. If it is not a point blank budget saving of £800 million, much will depend on the in-house savings that have been identified to avoid having to bear the full brunt of the reduction.

It is important to identify the two critical areas, because we need to know whether we are likely to make progress and whether the recommended savings will be made. The first is the smart procurement programme. As Conservative Members know—I am sure that Labour Members also know this, although they will not admit it—Ministers are experts and masters at launching, relaunching and re-relaunching their best initiatives, or at least what they want most of all to be in the public domain, and defence is no exception. The Government think that merely by the inclusion of the word "smart"—just like they use the word "modern"—they will avoid any further scrutiny because it sounds good, warm common sense, so everyone will go along with it.

I have talked to some of my former colleagues and right hon. Friends who were in the Ministry of Defence in the previous Government, and they maintain that many of these plans were already in place. We did not call it smart procurement, because we were not as good at dressing up our proposals as we were at delivering them. I am pleased that the Select Committee did not fall into the trap of accepting that when it says "smart" it really means that.

At the heart of that programme is a saving of at least £2 billion to be delivered over 10 years. If the Government are unable to deliver the total package or, almost as importantly, cannot deliver the saving in time spread over that 10-year period, the defence budget will come under greater and greater pressure.

Cash flow is important at this juncture because there are serious doubts about whether the Government will deliver on the agreed timings. General Burton's departure last summer highlighted that. The Government made little comment about his criticisms and concerns, which came to light in the press. He was seriously angry about the pressure that Ministers were putting him under to deliver ahead of what he recognised was possible because they had flagged this up as part of their major savings. They were able to spin the idea that they were having to save less by saying that they would deliver more earlier under the smart procurement programme.

Nothing in the White Paper allays General Burton's concerns. It does not even refer to them. As ever, it glosses over the whole issue, and gives us no figures for the Government's achievements against their targets—a point that the Select Committee spotted. Worse still, the industry is already indicating that it is coming under greater pressure from the Ministry of Defence to slow down the submission of invoices so that they fall in the next financial year. That is real short-termism, which I thought smart procurement was supposed to end. That will lead to more pressure the following year, and, although people may not realise it, more expensive contracts subsequently. In this area at least, we have moved from smart procurement to stupid procurement in two short years.

The Select Committee report underlined how crucial the sale of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency was to the Ministry of Defence's budgetary calculations. Apparently, the MOD stands to gain some £250 million from the agency's partial privatisation, but the Government are now fraught with arguments and problems, not least the antipathy of the United States Government to the plans.

The Secretary of State faces a stark choice. Either he proceeds with the mess that he has on his plate—admittedly he inherited it—thus alienating the Americans and damaging his relationship with the defence industry, which has expressed grave concerns about the unfair nature of what he may be about to propose, or he faces a hole in his spending plans. All that for £250 million. We may end up jeopardising a critical part of our relationship with the United States, which is very important to the special relationship, which delivers intelligence and technology and is unique to the United Kingdom.

On top of all that, most controversially, comes the three-year efficiency saving. The White Paper contains little of substance on that. The Select Committee report rightly questions whether the 3 per cent. efficiency saving will be anything more than a 3 per cent. cut. The Government produce no evidence to prove their claims, and we are left with the evidence of cancelled exercises, shorter flying hours for the RAF and other pilots and cuts in some of the medical programmes. If the efficiency saving is not delivered, that will punch a further £500 million hole in the Government's allowance for in-house savings.

In paragraph 159, the Select Committee said:

"There is, it seems to us, a fundamental implausibility in the total efficiency claimed by the MoD over the years . . . in other words that the MoD is simply doing less with less money".

That is the key. There has always been a suspicion that, as the budget came under pressure, greater savings would be justified as a more efficient way of doing things. If the savings are merely a cut, they will be deeply damaging to the overall ability of the armed forces, and to the doability—a horrible word—of the strategic defence review.

Part of the great saving envisaged in the strategic defence review was the change to the Territorial Army—I use the word "change" advisedly, because it was nothing more than a pretty savage cut. Some 18,000 men were slashed from the Territorial Army as part of the package of savings offered to the Treasury. Now the Government are sending contrary messages about the use of the TA, which the Secretary of State got bogged down in when he tried to describe how it may or may not be used in the future.

In the strategic defence review, the Government said that, although it would not normally be appropriate to call out formed units of the reserves at short notice, we should be prepared to do so if that were necessary to complete the build-up of a large military force in an international crisis, such as the Gulf war. However, the Government have not discussed that with members of the TA. The Government and those who operate on their behalf hardly know where many members work. They have little data on the nature of their work and how to call them up. They have no data worth talking about on the reserves. There has been a panicky change of policy, and there is little chance of delivering it in reality. It is more about window dressing than anything else.

Furthermore, the change to the TA has flown in the face of the experience of Kosovo. Something like 40 per cent. of the TA deployment in the Balkans is infantry—the very group that has been slashed.

There are still unanswered questions about equipment for the TA. I know from many of my conversations with TA soldiers that they are concerned about the fact that, when they try to train in the evenings or at weekends—especially the signals regiments—they find themselves without equipment, because much of it has been deployed and they are left with little to train with. As a result, their training has fallen short. Nothing in the White Paper explains how that problem will be resolved; there is a gaping hole.

The key element in the White Paper that we should try to understand is the effect of any failure in the areas that I have just described. What is important is not what the Government talk about: the key issue is what effect their policy has on the effectiveness of our armed forces.

The Secretary of State was keen to talk about exercises. The Select Committee said that two major UK exercises had been cancelled because of financial constraints. The first was the Marines' arctic warfare exercise in Norway. The Secretary of State wrote to me to explain that he had been incorrect when he originally said that it had been cancelled due to commitments: it was because of budgetary constraints. The second was HMS Westminster's participation in the Flotex exercise. In fact, HMS Westminster found itself sitting in the Thames, waiting for the much-hyped new Labour new millennium.

I suppose it was good to have something British sitting near the dome over the new year—or at least something that worked. I do not know whether the Secretary of State had much to do with that, but congratulations are in order, even if they are not directed to those who run the dome, to the Secretary of State or to the Minister responsible.

The Select Committee said:

"Given that so many exercises had to be cancelled because of over commitment it is deeply worrying that there was insufficient money to pay for some of even the residual exercises planned. Without regular exercises for high intensity conflict, standards in our Armed Forces will plummet, whatever the quality of the people and equipment."

The Committee also said that the pressures created by operations had led to the cancellation of some eight NATO exercises.

Mr. Hoon: So far, the hon. Gentleman has majored in allegations about defence cuts. He mentioned commitments. Can he say categorically which of the commitments into which British armed forces have entered since 1 May 1997 he, as a potential Defence Secretary, would not have entered into? He says that he is concerned about allegations of defence cuts. How much would he restore to the defence budget if he were elected to government—the amount as of 1 May 1997, or, for example, the amount that was in the budget before the Conservatives cut it by up to a third?

Mr. Duncan Smith: The Secretary of State shows just how panicky he really is. He sees Labour slipping behind the Conservatives in the polls on defence, and then the panic begins. All of a sudden, Labour is more worried about what we will do when we return to government than about what it is doing in government.

There is a simple answer to the Secretary of State. When in opposition, the Labour party had nothing to say about what it would do about any of those issues. Furthermore, under Labour the recommendations of the strategic defence review have been in operation for less than two years. Is the Secretary of State saying that he has no idea how to reduce the commitments, and no idea about whether to put in extra money or to cut the budget? If so, there is a simple solution: the right hon. Gentleman should vacate those Benches, and let us take over.

Mr. Hoon: In the unlikely event of it being necessary for us to vacate these Benches, I shall still want to know the answers to my questions. I gave a long list of the commitments that we have been able to reduce. What commitments would the hon. Gentleman have reduced had he been in my position? He is telling the country that he wants my position; he ought to be able to tell the country what he would do—and, moreover, how he would afford it, in the light of the tax guarantee given by the leader of his party.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I think the Secretary of State protests too much, although I understand why he is so worried. He is clearly very upset with his friends in the Treasury, and is trying to convey to them that he needs to know where to place his vote at the next election. He is saying, "I have to worry: if the Conservatives have a really good policy, Defence Ministers will have to vote for them."

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Spellar): Answer.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The Secretary of State will hear the answer in good time. He will hear it after we have convinced everyone, as we are in the process of doing, that he and his colleagues have damaged the defence forces by making such a serious cut when they came to office, and that their commitment is not deliverable in the context of the strategic defence review.

Mr. Spellar: Give us an answer.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Instead of bobbing up and down like a superannuated teddy bear with supercharged batteries, the Minister should get on with running his end of the Department, so that we do not end up with cancelled exercises, broken equipment and failure. I take no lessons from him. [Interruption.] Let me now talk about the policy for people, which the Minister will want to hear about. It is another instance of the Government's falling down.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): My hon. Friend mentions the policy for people. Perhaps we could make an early pledge to restore the so-called efficiency saving of the £1.5 million cut in the programme designed to return some of the 5,000 unfit service men requiring orthopaedic treatment to the front line

Mr. Duncan Smith: That, of course, was another Labour cut. My hon. Friend is right: what was in the budget to help to deal with those priority patients was cut. I know that the Minister had a view about those in the medical services, which is probably unrepeatable here, but there is a more positive way in which to proceed. I hope that, in making changes to the medical services, the Government will reinstate the money that they took away.

The Government's flagship policy for people was subjected to scrutiny by The Daily Telegraph on 21 November. The newspaper quoted from a briefing paper drawn up by Vice-Admiral Sir Jeremy Blackham, which stated:

"The ambitious plans in the SDR and its supporting essays are in danger of coming to grief for want of resources . . . unless more resources are forthcoming we must abandon any pretence that we are putting people at the heart of our policy . . . The money must be found or the policy will not be delivered."

The first of the report's valid concerns was married quarters, in which I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) is interested. Married quarters are the Cinderella of defence spending, and are most affected by short-termism. Although the Government have spoken of extra money—I believe that the Minister of State did so yesterday—they fail to explain why they have allowed refurbishment programmes to slide by at least two years from the dates originally proposed. The upgrades that are being put on hold amount to about what the Government trim in their attempts to find short-term savings. That is important, not just in terms of total money, but because it sends a message to families who feel undervalued as a result of the slippage. I think that the slippage also undermines service men and women when they go away from home, because they too worry about their homes.

Mr. Spellar rose—

Mr. Duncan Smith: Before I give way to the Minister, let me remind him of what my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) said at Question Time yesterday about the further trimming of about £1 million from some budgets.

Mr. Spellar: As the hon. Gentleman suggests, there is a danger that what is said today will become repetitious in terms of what was said yesterday. I rightly pointed out then that the move from 2003 to 2005 was due to the fact that, when a full study was made of how much would be needed to upgrade the properties to category 1, the previous Administration had underestimated the amount by some £112 million in their dash to get rid of the properties and balance the budget before the last general election.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I hear what the Minister says, but that concerns total money. My question was, why the delay? That is the key question, and he has not answered it. The truth is that good management would not have allowed the delay, although it might have affected the total involved. He stands condemned.

That element of delay creates the greatest problem for families to whom my colleagues and I have talked. [Interruption.] I also have personal experience of what happens when Government change programmes. I wish that the Minister would talk to married families more, and find out what they think.

Strategic lift is a key issue, which is at the heart of Government policy. The strategic defence review made some big statements about it, which are critical to its ability to meet its targets. As Secretary of State for Defence, Lord Robertson said:

"New transport aircraft and ships will move our people and equipment rapidly to trouble spots."

The Government clearly approved the short-term strategic lift programme in saying that the Ministry of Defence would meet

"our strategic airlift needs in the short term with four C-17 large aircraft or their equivalent."

That was in the strategic defence review. On the Treasury's insistence, however, the short-term strategic airlift competition has been bundled together with the Hercules rolling replacement programme—as far as I can see, in order to save money.

We understand that the decision on that programme is imminent. That is what the Secretary of State tells us. We have heard the word "imminent" so often in this context that we have a case of rolling imminence: one month after another, the decision is imminent. The Treasury, however, has delayed the in-service date, at least for our heavy-lift aircraft, by a year or, perhaps, even longer. I should be grateful if the Secretary of State—I will take his intervention—were to say exactly when he intends to take the decision and, perhaps, announce what it is. It is imminent, no doubt.

Mr. Hoon: The answer is soon.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I am pleased that the Secretary of State is able to shift his position slightly and move from imminent to soon. I am sure that those who study the small print will recognise a clear, major shift in policy.

I want to draw the Secretary of State's attention to an important part of strategic lift. It is not just the air side. There is the ability to move using ships. There is a clear question about the order. I gather that some of that capability in shipping was meant to be in place in October, but I should like to know at some point—I will take his intervention again—when the decision will be made; imminently soon, I dare say. He made the point that joint rapid reaction force capability requires that corresponding capability. Without that, his great statement, which I wholly applaud, that they will be able to work together and be deployed, which is exactly what should happen, will become near impossible to achieve, as we saw during the Kosovo exercise.

Again, the Select Committee shared our thoughts on the matter. It said:

"The SDR committed the UK to force projection strategy. If we lack the ability to 'project' force, many very expensive assets are wasted. We view the lack of adequate deployability, particularly with regard to strategic airlift, with grave concern".

Hear, hear.

The Secretary of State has touched on overstretch already. We have been around the houses. I will not belabour him on it.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Go on.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Well, all right, if my hon. Friend wants me to. Overstretch is simply about being committed to operations without the numbers necessary, or perhaps even the equipment levels to sustain them, not just in the short term, but in the medium and long terms. The Secretary of State talked about getting the level down. In fact, there was a clear statement about that in the SDR. The Government therefore have to be judged on that, just as any Government would be. It is not possible to avoid that judgment.

The problem is that the Government then and the Secretary of State just now said that the level was being brought down to below that of the previous Administration. In fact, as he admitted, it went up to nearly 50 per cent. under the Government and has now fallen, or will fall under the projection, to 28 per cent.; I think that that was the figure that he used. I have to correct the Secretary of State: 28 per cent. is the figure that he inherited. He said

"below the level that we inherited."

The real point is that, in a proper debate about the matter, we would be talking about the correct start point. We can perhaps discuss how that might come about, instead of playing games about whether the figure will be above or below. The reality is that the Secretary of State inherited a level of 28 per cent. It will not fall below that, which means, in essence, that the statement in the SDR is not being delivered.

The Secretary of State said that the Government were making progress on recruitment and retention. I am a little confused about the figure that he gave the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell). The Secretary of State said that, under present circumstances and conditions, it would take five years—I think that that is what he said—to reach the right manning levels, but the adjutant-general said that, at the current net inflow rate to the Army, it would take 31 years to meet its SDR target establishment of 105,000 men.

Will the Secretary of State perhaps clarify where those differences lie? It is not a marginal difference: 31 years and five years is quite a gap.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): Quite soon.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I hear what my hon. Friend says.

The point that I am making—I have tried to make it from the beginning—is that the Government must be judged on the targets that they set themselves. If they are to achieve that which they set themselves under the SDR, they will have to make certain that they have the correct amount of money, which is seriously in doubt, that they are able to deliver on the key programmes that allow them to deploy our forces, and that they have the right number of forces. In all those areas, we see no signs. There is nothing in the White Paper to answer the questions that the Select Committee asked. All that is staring at failure, rather than success.

I move to the bigger issue into which the whole SDR falls. The Secretary of State touched on it. It is worth going back to it: the strategic concept, the key issues that are likely to create, or at least to arise in the environment in which our forces may have to be deployed in the next few years.

I warned the Government some time ago that I thought—we have had exchanges about it and we will do so again—that they had taken the wrong decision over NATO and the European security and defence identity. I warned that, in late 1998, at St. Malo, the Prime Minister's rushed attempt to change policy, which then moved at an alarming pace in 1999, was a big mistake. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Sussex (Mr. Soames) is right about that.

The other day, I was checking through Hansard to find out what the Prime Minister had said on Amsterdam in the House. In response to some questions about defence and the European Union, he said:

"getting Europe's voice heard more clearly in the world will not be achieved through merging the European Union and the Western European Union or developing an unrealistic common defence policy. We therefore resisted unacceptable proposals from others."—[Official Report, 18 June 1997; Vol. 296, c. 314.]

He had just taken over as Prime Minister.

That was a pretty clear statement. If anything, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Sussex will remember, it ran very much in line with the policy of the previous Government, yet, by late 1998, the Prime Minister had executed an about-turn. At St. Malo, he started a process that opened the door to some of the most divisive French ambitions, while gaining us nothing concrete in return.

Instead, by the usual trick of saying one thing to one group and another to another, the Prime Minister succeeded in alarming the United States, while encouraging those who were so inclined to take that initiative even further. Now he and the Secretary of State are trying to pretend that the ESDI was always about improving capability for the European nations of NATO, but the Americans and others have spotted that the words in the series of agreements show up the ambitions to create a defence identity beyond NATO—outside NATO. Those are the lines and words that have been used from St. Malo to Helsinki. It is a reality. That is what the Government have signed up to.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Is it not the case that the process goes back to before St. Malo? Article B of the Amsterdam treaty specifically says that the European Union to assert its identity on the international scene, in particular through the implementation of a common foreign and security policy including the progressive framing of a common defence policy."

"shall set itself the following objectives:

That is what it is all about. It is about enabling the EU to assert its identity, not about defending this country.

Mr. Duncan Smith: My hon. Friend is right, which is why the Prime Minister was asked that specific question when he was in the House. There was grave concern about what the Amsterdam treaty contained. That was why he answered in the way in which he did, trying to allay the fears. Many hon. Members would have taken him at face value over that. On that basis, it is fair to assume that what he said in the House should have greater validity than anything else. The truth is that it turns out that it did not.

Mr. Spellar: When were those words negotiated and by which Government? How did that tie in with what was agreed at Maastricht?

Mr. Duncan Smith: As the Minister would know if he checked, the concerns at Amsterdam were that what the Prime Minister and others had agreed were further—

Mr. Hoon: Which Prime Minister?

Mr. Duncan Smith: The Prime Minister of this country. Does the Secretary of State remember who that is? I hope that the Whips are not confused about that. A startling new problem may emerge for the Secretary of State. We will see, but the Prime Minister and others, as the Dutch showed, had agreed to extend the process. That was the concern.

The Prime Minister rebutted that through those words and said that it was not the case. I remember asking him in the Chamber that very question. He said that it had not happened and that the Dutch essentially were not correct in their interpretation. My point is that they were. We saw later how he had snuck through another change. It is important that we check what others who were party to the agreements think about them.

On 17 November 1999, Hubert Védrine, the French Foreign Minister, said that, in the ESDI, France sought to create a more autonomous defence capacity that is "separate and apart from the NATO alliance".

At about the same time, the German Foreign Minister said:

"I can say, on behalf of the federal government, that we emphatically support this process and are glad about the St. Malo communiqué, because it means an important step"—

this is the important bit—

"for the development of the European security and defence identity, another pillar of the process of European unification."

There is nothing much there about NATO.

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I should like first to finish making this point.

Even the President of France, Jacques Chirac, said that the European Union

"could not fully exist until it possessed autonomous capacity for action in the area of defence . . . It's an essential contribution to the emergence of a multipolar world".

All those statements on justifying the process are very different from those made by the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister. To top them all, on 4 February 2000, the European Commission President, Romano Prodi—I remind the Secretary of State that he and other Labour Members were very keen to have Mr. Prodi in that position—told The Independent:

"When I was talking about the European army I was not joking. If you don't want to call it a European army, don't call it a European army. You can call it 'Margaret'"—

I would not do that if I were him; she would not approve—

"you can call it 'Mary-Ann', you can find any name".

I suppose that one could even call it Tony.

Although Mr. Prodi's statement expresses what he and many other people think will happen, the Secretary of State refuses to accept that prediction.

Did my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) wish to intervene?

Mr. Bercow: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, but he has already covered the point. Does he agree that it is extraordinary that the Prime Minister not only asserts his profound opposition to the idea of a common European defence policy, but enthusiastically supports for the presidency of the European Commission a man who is utterly committed to the realisation of the goal of a common European defence policy? How does the Prime Minister expect to be taken remotely seriously on this matter, as on others, when he is manifestly at loggerheads with himself?

Mr. Duncan Smith: It is a conundrum. I have spent many a sleepless night wondering about the Prime Minister's split personality—the way in which, at one and the same time, he can be both Opposition and Government. He makes a statement, but, stepping to the other Dispatch Box, challenges himself and disapproves of his previous statement. It depends on the audience. One day, perhaps in The Guardian, the Prime Minister will make one policy statement, whereas, on another day, he will go out of his way to make a different statement, perhaps in the Daily Mail or The Daily Telegraph.

Mr. Bercow: Jekyll and Hyde.

Mr. Duncan Smith: My hon. Friend can say that, but I would not be so unkind. On this key issue, however, we are considering not the Prime Minister's assurances, but the statements of other people.

It is no wonder that there are concerns in Washington and in NATO. The other day, some of my hon. Friends and I visited NATO. We certainly drew the conclusion that people there had serious concerns about the ESDI process, notwithstanding those people's determination to try to bind it to NATO.

There will be a problem whichever way the process goes. The process will either create a huge military structure that will operate as an alternative to NATO, or—perhaps this scenario is even more likely; it is even more dangerous—it will act as a smokescreen behind which the nations of Europe simply do not ante up in meeting their share of the NATO requirements.

Earlier, I quoted Lord Owen's comments disapproving of the process. I have also reminded the House that my former right hon. Friend—Malcolm Rifkind, who will return to the House at the next general election—has made it clear that he disapproves of the process. Like me, they believe that the European Union's involvement in the matter is part of the problem, not the solution. Everyone accepts that the European nations are not doing enough in the new millennium to keep with their obligations to NATO. They are not doing enough to provide the type of forces that are required.

The solutions to the problem lie within NATO, not outside NATO. It has always been Britain's traditional role—one that we have played very well, regardless of change of Government—to make certain that the alliance never divided into false competing halves, composed of Europe and of north America. The alliance drew its strength from the fact that it was united. Sure, there were disagreements. Equally, as we have discovered recently, there are times when not everyone will operate together. Nevertheless, by creating an artificial structural division, the Government have risked NATO's coherence. Not one country—certainly not the serious major countries—in NATO entertains increasing its defence budget significantly, if at all. I fear that, behind the screen of the proposed new structure, the defence budgets of many of those countries will decrease. We may, therefore, end up with the worst of all worlds.

As the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife said, signals from the European nations to the United States convey the message not only that the United States' involvement is ever less welcome, but that those countries are ever less capable of mounting a serious defence posture.

The process has already begun, which is why various American diplomats and politicians are warning the nations of Europe. The Secretary of State is always very keen to quote Strobe Talbott, and, when he does, I always ask him, please, to read on a bit, to get to the rest of Mr. Talbott's speech—the part in which he describes his fears. Here is such a section. Mr. Talbott said:

"We would not want to see an ESDI that comes into being first within NATO but then grows out of NATO and finally grows away from NATO, since that would lead to an ESDI that initially duplicates NATO but that could eventually compete with NATO. That's a long-term concern, obviously, but NATO, after all, is about the long term".

Those are genuine concerns. Although the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife and I may not agree on specific policy, I agree with him that the Americans are very worried about the process. It is no good simply saying, "These are the statements that they have made supporting the process", when the truth is that they have deep concerns about it.

It is also no good simply to claim that the process is an extension of the Americans' policy, or that it was initiated because of Kosovo. As I said, the process was started well before Kosovo.

The Government embarked on the process with such speed, in 1998, not because they felt that there was a military reason to do so, but because they were genuinely scared of being isolated in Europe. The single currency was about to start and Ministers found themselves outside of it. Their panic caused them to find a mechanism by which they would be able, in a big way, to reaffirm their European credentials. The Government therefore decided to play the defence card—giving us the best conceivable example of precisely what the Government are all about. They are about not serious policy making, but cynical gestures aimed at achieving their own cynical ambitions. Their position, however, is a foolish gamble that will divide NATO at a critical time.

Yesterday, the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife and I touched on the most critical issue in this debate—the reason why, now, more than at any time since the mid-1980s, NATO needs to act together. I have long believed that there is an increasingly serious threat from the proliferation of ballistic missiles and of weapons of mass destruction. I expressed that fear in the House in 1993, and I have remained convinced of the threat ever since.

What has changed the debate is that, in 1998, the Rumsfeld commission report on ballistic missile proliferation was presented to the United States Senate, making it clear that the assessment of the threat from rogue states armed with ballistic missiles was far greater than estimated previously. The report went on to say that, within approximately five years from the date of the report's publication, the United States would be within target range of missiles stationed in North Korea and Iran. The report drew on Central Intelligence Agency sources and on other intelligence sources, and it was considered to be authoritative.

Although the report obviously accepted that there was a margin of error in the judgments made, none the less, it made a very powerful point that dramatically changed thinking on the issue in the United States. It is sad that, with full knowledge of that report, little has changed in any respect in the United Kingdom or in the rest of western Europe.

Last year, I tried to point out that I thought that the British Government should now take a lead in persuading NATO to engage the United States about its proposals for a defensive shield, rather than allowing European nations to snipe at the proposals from the sidelines. The fact is that, whether the Government like it or not—this is the crucial point—the USA will proceed with development and deployment of that shield. It would be useful for the Government to make a clear statement of their position as there is nothing in the White Paper except a subtle shift of language.

The report states that

"no significant ballistic missile threat to the UK and its interests will exist for some years".

Even the Select Committee reminded us that they thought that the attention given to theatre defence was "inadequate".

At no stage has the Ministry of Defence given us an indication of the meaning of the term "some years". If it is different from that in the Rumsfeld report in the United States and estimates that there are many more years to prepare, can the Minister please tell us why? If it is the same, why are we not stepping up activity and taking action? More particularly, the inclusion of the word "significant" in relation to ballistic missile threat indicates that the Ministry of Defence may have shifted slightly. At least it recognises that there is a threat, but I wonder what is meant by the word "significant". I would say that one missile armed with a chemical or biological warhead is a significant enough threat. We need to see off that threat one way or another.

I have described proliferation as the chain which links nations around the globe, but right hon. and hon. Members may not realise the extent to which it has been taking place right under their noses with a degree of complacency. It all starts with China and North Korea and North Korea's missile programme—from the Taep'o-dong missile launched in 1998 that splashed down in the sea of Japan and gave us a clear indication of the ranges being achieved to the later No-dong 1 and 2 programmes. They have absolutely convinced anyone who knows anything at all about this that the North Koreans now have the technology to produce three-stage rockets, which is the real key to producing ballistic missiles.

Whether or not North Korea poses a threat, it has helped to develop the technology in Iran, Iraq and, I understand, in other countries such as Pakistan. The key question is what we will be able to do about it. The ranges of such missiles are increasing every week. People are working on them and every year there are new developments which produce greater capacity.

There are significant links between China and North Korea and only 18 months ago China produced a missile capable of a range of 12,000 km. It will not be long before the technology finds its way to North Korea and the other rogue states that we are justifiably worried about.

Another issue that is not addressed in the White Paper involves the changing situation in Russia—not just what has been happening in Chechnya, but Mr. Putin's strident language in respect of his rights over nuclear weapons, the use to which he sees them being put and his involvement with others who wish to receive that technology about which he made some interesting statements recently.

I am concerned because I think—and the Conservative party believes—that the British Government should be taking a lead in NATO. Instead of taking a lead and trying to create or negotiate a NATO programme, the Government seem to be trying to play both ends of the argument. On one hand, they are aware of, and worried about, their French counterparts in ESDI, who are implacably opposed to the US defensive shield, as well as any discussion about a NATO programme. On the other hand, the US is going ahead and the Government try to make some quiet and careful concessions, fearful of reawakening their own Back Benchers who seem implacably opposed to any change in the anti-ballistic missile treaty or the development of such a shield.

As a result, Britain, instead of leading the debate within NATO, as we have traditionally done at critical moments, has nothing constructive or positive to say and we watch complacently as the tension within NATO grows and the threat from outside gets ever closer.

What is the lesson for leaders such as Milosevic? Over the past 12 months they will have learned that in conventional terms they clearly have no hope of dealing with NATO so there is no point in a confrontation. However, they will also have learned that if they happen to have a ballistic missile or other mass destruction capability, there is a chance that NATO might think again or take a different view. That is the key question that we will have to answer. The Secretary of State knows that it is not just about the threat to the United Kingdom, but perhaps even more urgently, it is about the threat to our deployed forces in theatre, to which we seem to have no answer. If the Government could put one half of the energy that they have put into rushing the creation of the ESDI into ballistic missile defence, by now we might just have the beginning of a constructive NATO response to what the Americans are engaged in and to the development of the threats from elsewhere.

The Secretary of State said that the Conservatives had no policy. Let me tell him that last year we committed to that as a policy. I hope that the Government will recognise that it is a serious policy position and that they will move to it as rapidly as they possibly can. If they did so, I would not make childish remarks; I would simply welcome it as a constructive move for the British Isles and for NATO.

The Select Committee report is probably the most critical White Paper that I have seen of Government policy. Almost from the outset it makes it clear that the delivery of the SDR is seriously in question. It makes it clear that the wheels are wobbling dangerously, but not quite falling off. I thought that the most telling paragraph was paragraph 17, which states:

"The performance report in its present form tells us very little about how the Ministry of Defence has performed over the years in question. It measures resources and activity but hardly even begins to measure outputs . . . the performance report is inadequate for its stated purpose."

That is a damning indictment of Government policy. It is remarkable because it is from a Labour-dominated Committee.

As we approach the second anniversary of the SDR, the Opposition take the view that the Government's defence policy is under huge pressure internally with no real strategy externally for dealing with major threats. The Government are heading towards a crisis with breathtaking complacency. Our forces need more than fine words wrapped up in glossy documents, but I am afraid that that is all that they will get.

The White Paper is simply not good enough and the Government's performance so far shows how little thought they have given to dealing with the problems that confront them. They thought little about them before entering Government and they have tried to think as little as possible about them since. There needs to be a huge change in thinking if our defence forces are to succeed. Otherwise, as I fear and the Select Committee seems to indicate, we will lurch from crisis to crisis, with all that that entails.

3.8 pm

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): Let me start by saying that I am a member of the defence committee of the Western European Union and that other members of that committee are present in the Chamber. I should like to concentrate on chapter 2 of the White Paper under the heading, "The European Dimension", which deals with a matter that has been in the forefront of discussion at the major summit conferences that have taken place in recent months—the European security and defence identity—and, as we heard from the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), the future military role of the European Union.

Discussions on the role of the European Union go back some years. Suggestions that European nations should think more boldly and imaginatively about defence and be able to speak and act more effectively certainly have a great deal of merit. However, while the discussions have been taking place, the European defence identity, based on its role within the European Union, was supposed to have been in place this year. That most certainly will not happen. While the discussions continue, there are unanswered questions that concern many people and I shall concentrate on those questions during my short speech today.

As a member of the British delegation to the WEU, I want to know what role the WEU will have in any European defence identity. The WEU has 28 member states, many of which are not members of the European Union and will not be members for many years to come. Other countries are not NATO members. While NATO enlargement has taken place and will undoubtedly continue to take place, several countries that play a meaningful role in the WEU will not be members of the European Union or NATO for some, possibly many, years. However, they are European countries with a great concern for their security. Will their role be defined and, if so, when will that happen?

The overriding issue of the position of countries that are not members of the European Union or NATO comes up time and again in WEU meetings that I and other members of the British delegation attend. We have attended meetings in Oslo and Brussels in recent weeks and, at both, that issue figured highly in the discussions. Some of the WEU member states are deeply concerned, because they are not convinced that they will have a meaningful role in any changes that take place in European security and defence policy.

After the Oslo meeting, a statement was issued on 11 February, which read:

"The new security policy bodies of the EU should therefore function on the principles of inclusiveness and transparency as regards the contribution of the non-EU European Allies."

What will be the role, in any future European defence policy that may be developed, of countries such as Turkey, Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic, Romania and Bulgaria? Some of them—Turkey, for example—play a major role in European defence policy.

It has already been mentioned in today's debate that the recent conflicts in Europe mean that we will have to develop the two roles of crisis management and peacekeeping. Neither will be easy, as we have sadly found out. How will those roles be developed within the European defence identity? We already know that, within the existing European Union of 15 members, we have countries that do not wish to play a role in crisis management, but who participate in peacekeeping as part of the United Nations and other major organisations in various areas of the world. What policy does my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State envisage the European Union following as it develops its defence and security role? Will those countries that I mentioned, which do not wish to be involved in crisis management, be involved in discussions on the European Union defence and security role or will we have a system in which, on some issues, some member states will play one role on one issue and another on other issues? That question arises repeatedly at the meetings that I and other hon. Members attend.

Mr. Syd Rapson (Portsmouth, North): Crisex 2000, which will take place soon, is designed to test the different structures. The answers from that exercise will be made available if my hon. Friend is able to wait.

Mr. Cox: I welcome those comments and I shall certainly await the outcome of that exercise with interest. I am sure that my hon. Friend and I will discuss the issues again.

We do not hear much in the House or generally about the future role of elected Members of the European Parliament. I relate the European Parliament to the European Union. Will the elected Members have a decision-making role, or will the national Parliaments of the member states of the EU remain the sovereign decision makers? That question is often asked, but rarely answered.

I have three other points to make. The first centres on budgets. We know that many countries in the EU and the WEU face budget restraints. We know that the budgets of some countries mean that they could pay far more towards overall defence expenditure and their commitments as European countries. If we develop the European defence and security role, will the 15 member states of the EU be expected to increase their budgets for that purpose? I would be interested to know whether that suggestion has been made at the meetings that have already taken place.

Paragraph 17 of the White Paper states:

"Britain and the other nations of the EU also wish to play an appropriate part in the response by the wider international community to crises elsewhere. We need therefore to be able both to make a stronger and more coherent contribution to the Alliance and to improve our collective capability to undertake European crisis management operations where the Alliance as a whole is not engaged. Above all, this means strengthening European nations' armed forces. Too few have been modernised to meet today's requirements. Too few can be deployed to crises quickly, are flexible enough to meet the difficulties they will face, or are sustainable over long periods in difficult conditions."

Those comments emphasise the problems that already exist, and those of us who belong to this country's delegation to the WEU do not think that those issues are sufficiently recognised, discussed or answered.

The second issue is that of service personnel. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, we are overstretched, as are other countries, and I was pleased to hear his comments about the improvements that are being made in our forces. However, paragraph 19 of the White Paper talks of "up to 50,000 or 60,000 personnel, together with appropriate air and naval elements".

Will the policy be to obtain those highly trained service personnel from the existing 15 member countries of the European Union? If so, EU countries would have to allocate much greater financial resources for collective security than they have hitherto.

My final point has to do with assets—another matter that crops up repeatedly at the meetings that I and other hon. Members interested in this matter attend. To some extent, the debate has already touched on the question of NATO-US assets. Will my hon. Friend the Minister say how those assets will be allocated? Under what terms would they be allocated to us in a crisis management role? Although support would come from NATO and the United States, any actual involvement would be undertaken by Europe. We have heard little about how assets would be allocated, or about the conditions as to use that may be imposed on assets not owned by the European Union. Discussing the allocation of assets would require the US and NATO to co-operate with the European Union in a way that has not happened before. I should certainly welcome that.

All those who belong to the WEU accept that changes will take place in Europe under the proposed European security and defence identity. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State noted in his opening remarks, ESDI has been discussed for many years, but some major European countries in NATO or the WEU have no idea what their role in that might be. Sadly, the White Paper makes no reference to that problem.

Two matters need to be understood. First, the 15 members of the European Union must have equal rights and responsibility. There must be the fullest discussion and participation for WEU-associated members in the development of ESDI if the project is to succeed. It must be seen to be truly European, regardless of whether the countries involved are members of the EU, NATO, or the WEU.

Secondly, we must not allow a European Union caucus to develop, which might result in non-European Union countries being expected to play a limited role in European defence. I regularly meet representatives of those countries, and I can tell the House that they do not want such a caucus to develop. We should not allow countries that have been willing to associate with us and have been involved with us in difficult times to be frozen out of a future European defence policy.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North–East Fife): I am not the first Member in this debate to rely on passages from the excellent report from the Select Committee on Defence in response to the White Paper. Reference has been made already to paragraph 159, in which the Committee stated:

"There is, it seems to us, a fundamental implausibility in the total efficiency claimed by the MoD over the years."

Paragraph 160 states:

"A year-on-year programme of efficiency savings can have a debilitating effect at all levels of command, and can be destructive to the quality of life that will sustain retention in the Armed Forces."

Paragraph 161 states:

"Overall, we conclude that the condition of the defence budget is sufficiently poor to give rise to serious concern. The cumulative evidence of cancelled exercises, delayed equipment programmes and of resources apparently insufficient to reverse the problems of overstretch and undermanning suggest that, if the wheels have not yet come off the SDR, they are certainly beginning to wobble alarmingly."

That is colourful language, but all the more effective for that. The paragraph concludes:

"The Department's finances should be rebalanced in their current Spending Review. Commitments and resources have to be brought back into line or we risk finding ourselves stumbling from one crisis to the next."

That is the background to this debate on the White Paper, and it is based on the analysis revealed by the notes of evidence attached to the Select Committee's report. However, before turning to purely domestic issues, I want to say a few words about Kosovo. I am not interested only in the events at Mitrovica or the reports in national newspapers today. My right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) returned from a visit to Kosovo before Christmas with tales of the many things that had gone wrong. Those of us who supported military action in the region were deeply disturbed by what my right hon. Friend saw on his visit, and by current developments.

Neither NATO nor the United Nations can take any comfort from what is happening in Kosovo. Once again in the Balkans, we are paying the price for ambiguous political objectives supported by inadequate resources. It is frankly scandalous that fewer than half of the civilian police promised for the United Nations have been provided by UN members. Also, the conduct of some military units has been inept, provocative and lacking the necessary impartiality. We get mixed-ability teaching but—too often, it seems—we also get mixed-ability soldiering.

I believe that it was right to intervene in Kosovo, but nothing will damage the principle of intervention for humanitarian purposes more than an abject failure to invest in peace. Nothing will serve Milosevic better than a lack of will and resources to protect and promote the values of a multi-ethnic society in Kosovo. It does not strain the language—or the circumstances—to say that Kosovo may be on the brink of disaster. If that disaster happens, it may well impose additional burdens on our armed forces.

Mr. Dalyell: Before the right hon. and learned Gentleman leaves this very serious subject, will he tell the House what exactly he would do now, apart from pouring in more policemen and troops? I opposed the intervention, but it happened: what do we do now?

Mr. Campbell: We must insist on the deployment of the number of troops and civilian policemen that were considered necessary in the first instance; we should implement the so-called Balkan stability pact as hard and fast as possible; and we should ensure that the promises of economic assistance that were made are fully implemented.

The hon. Gentleman and I disagree about the legitimacy of the right of intervention, but I share with him a sense of frustration at what has happened after that intervention took place. As a national newspaper editorial put it, somewhat tritely, we might have won the war, but we may be about to lose the peace.

As I was saying, developments in Kosovo—and even in Montenegro—might, in due course, place additional strain on our armed services. We know from answers that have been obtained from Ministers that the Army is short of tanks, that the Royal Air Force is short of planes, and that the Navy is short of fuel and medical services. Evidence from so many sources is self-corroborating and even more compelling. The difficulties that have been reported must have a debilitating effect on morale and capability.

Ministers often criticise Opposition Members for being far too quick to raise concerns about capability or the availability of resources. They say that it is damaging to morale in the armed services. I should like to put the opposite point of view: if the people in the armed services thought that there was no opposition, and that no one was holding the Government to account, the damage to morale might be very much greater.

When we ask young men and, increasingly, young women to risk their lives on our behalf, we may talk about defence but they go out and implement it. When we ask them to put their lives at risk, surely we have an overwhelming duty to ensure that we give them the best possible equipment and resources that we can manage.

The problems include the fact that major procurement programmes are subject to delay and overspend. The National Audit Office report tells us that, almost annually. We know, because senior budget holders say so off the record, that their budgets are severely stretched by the burden of the so-called annual 3 per cent. efficiency savings. We know that the Army is undermanned. Even on the most optimistic forecast, it will be 2005 before that deficit is made up.

We know that serious questions have been raised about the reliability of the equipment used in Kosovo, in particular the SA80 rifle and Clansman radios. There is nothing new about that. In the course of the previous Parliament, the Defence Committee produced a vitriolic report about the nature of the procurement process for the SA80. Clansman radios were due to be replaced 15, even 20, years ago. There has already been considerable publicity about, and criticism of, the faults of that equipment.

I have voted with the Government in the past to support military action, but it is inexcusable for the Government and the House to make rigorous demands on the armed forces without ensuring that they are properly funded. I do not believe that we can contribute to the United Nations, play our part in NATO and influence European security—all at levels commensurate with the experience and skill of our armed services—under the present financial arrangements.

Between 1989 and 1998, United Kingdom defence spending as a percentage of gross domestic product has gone down by about 40 per cent. From 4.5 per cent. of gross domestic product in 1989, it had fallen in 1998 to 2.7 per cent. In the financial year 2001-02, it is set to drop to 2.4 per cent. Given the performance of the past 10 years, even that plateau may be difficult to hold on to. The fall in real terms between 1989 and 1998 was 22.6 per cent. We are all complicit in those reductions. When the Conservative party was on the Treasury Bench, proposing "Options for Change" and "Front Line First", I did not hear myself say, "That money should not be taken away." The hon. Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill) and the right hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) did not say to the then Government, "Do not reduce defence expenditure." Instead, their response was a blanket—a pretty effective blanket—proposal for a full-scale defence review. The truth is that all parties in the House are responsible for these large reductions.

In his Chicago speech a year ago, the Prime Minister argued forcefully for the recognition of a moral imperative for intervention where there is a systematic abuse of human rights. He was right to do so, but those words will have a hollow ring if the Government and the country are unable or unwilling to accept that moral imperatives do not come cheap, and that if we want to act, we have to arm.

The 3 per cent. efficiency saving seems to lie at the heart of many of the day-to-day stresses and strains in the budget. If the Government want to take steps to restore morale and reduce pressure, they should abandon that measure. The Chief of the Defence Staff, when asked about the 3 per cent. efficiency saving, said that it was challenging. We all know that that is Whitehall-speak for bloody difficult. It cannot be achieved without considerable stress and strain.

The strategic defence review has proposals for two aircraft carriers, approximately double the tonnage of the Invincible class, and for four C17s, or their equivalent. Heavy airlift and a new generation of aircraft carriers are the very underpinning of the expeditionary strategy upon which the strategic defence review was based. That is the essential prerequisite of intervention of the kind justified by the Prime Minister in Chicago. There is no logic in having an expeditionary strategy if we cannot project our forces where they are needed and cannot sustain them once they have got there.

Before the Chancellor embarks on this year's Budget—or, indeed, on the pre-election Budget of 2001, in which he is widely predicted to cut taxes—proper regard must be given to the resources, financial and military, that are necessary to meet the responsibilities inherent in the so-called Chicago declaration. On the second day of the debate, if my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) has the good fortune to be called to speak, he will develop at some length some of the significant procurement issues, not many of which have featured so far in this debate.

There are two important decisions, one of which may even have been taken yesterday, if we are to believe what we read in the newspapers. The first is that of the missile to be fitted to the Eurofighter, or the Typhoon, as we must now learn to call it. I believe that the European solution in that competition is the best. Although the undertakings of the United States Government on the American proposal are no doubt given in good faith, we would do well to remember that Congress has independent rights in relation to arms exports. The Pakistani Government discovered that to their cost when they not only ordered, but paid for, 24 F16 aircraft which they never received.

I believe that the C17s are the proper solution to heavy-lift procurement. That may cause disappointment among those who favour the British Aerospace and the Airbus variant. However, the C17s are available, they are proven and can be obtained at a good price, and the Airbus variant has not yet flown. On balance, the C17s seem the appropriate choice.

Mr. Colvin: On the Eurofighter, and its beyond visual range air-to-air missile, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will recall the day that he, the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) and I spent in the Bundestag with the German defence committee when it was throwing a wobbly over the future of Eurofighter. We found that once we had put a little resolve into the committee's members they wanted to discuss more than anything not Eurofighter, but the missile with which it was going to be equipped. They were determined that if the aircraft went ahead, which it did, it should be equipped with a European missile so that the Americans could not veto its sale to third countries, therefore jeopardising the aircraft's long-term export sales prospects.

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Gentleman and I are at one. I remember that occasion: we went to the Bundestag and while we were having lunch, the committee took a decision to support Eurofighter. It took a decision that we had gone there to argue for before we got round to doing so. That says something about our reputation or our lack of influence.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The right hon. and learned Gentleman talked about which decisions he thought were right and proper. I will not follow him down that road because I am happy to go along with whatever the Ministry of Defence decides in purely military terms. Will he accept that the key problem is slightly more than that which he describes? I refer to the delay in making decisions. We have been told by the industry that if the MOD does not make its decisions soon, whatever they are, it may go beyond the point of no return.

Mr. Campbell: Like others, I was deeply disappointed that the short-term competition for the leasing of C17s was cancelled, for reasons which have never been fully explained, but which most of us understand to have been because the contract could not be entered into at a price within the MOD's budget. However, there is some evidence that to persuade the United States Pentagon to buy C17s, the manufacturers were willing to offer them at a rather lower price than would have been the case even six or nine months ago. It is possible that out of delay some advantage has been achieved.

To return to my initial argument, let me say that, if our strategy is expeditionary, we have to have the means to take our troops to the place where we think they will have to fight. Indeed, one—among other—rather depressing feature of operations in Kosovo was the fact that Europe had to rely to such an extent on American heavy lift or on leasing an Antonov aircraft, which, for political or military reasons, might not necessarily be available in all circumstances.

On European security and defence policy, the main lesson of the Gulf war, which has been reinforced ever since, is that the United States is in a different capability league from all other nations. Bosnia reinforced the view that offensive air power could provide the necessary coercion to bring obstinate leaders to the negotiating table. Europe showed itself to be good at providing political support for operations, but we showed ourselves as, frankly, incompetent at contributing in sufficient quantity and quality to the air campaign. The figures are well known. Contributions from the European NATO nations in Kosovo amounted to only 4.3 per cent. of the total sorties flown. Difficulties in raising ground forces have since demonstrated that the armies of Europe are as poorly structured as some of their air forces.

NATO is, of course, vital to our security. In some respects, NATO is probably more secure after Kosovo. If it had not stuck together during the political period in advance of air operations and during those operations themselves, its future would have been gloomy indeed. Other tests of alliance cohesion are likely in the years ahead. A curious feature of the post-cold-war situation has been that the alliance has been tested in ways that it never was previously.

I was present with other members of the Defence Committee—as the hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) may remember, we were in the Pentagon—when former Secretary of State Perry said,

"NATO is more important than Bosnia."

That was a proposition of such self-evident validity that one asked oneself why he had felt it necessary to say it. The reason was that the stress and strain within NATO in the early days of Bosnia—in particular, when UNPROFOR was deployed—was such that people had begun to question whether it had the political cohesion to survive.

However, we still need to rebalance our partnership with the United States within NATO. Europe has to take far greater responsibility for its own defence. That should not be detrimental to our relationship with the US. As I said, that relationship is crucial, but we should remember that although our interests will invariably be similar to those of the US, the emphasis could be different in areas such as the middle east, for example in relation to Iran—I shall return to that so-called rogue state in due course.

We in Britain—perhaps we in this House more than anywhere else—have a responsibility to ourselves and to Europe to be willing to say so when we believe that our interests are not being properly served. European defence does not involve a European army nor, so far as I am concerned, will it ever involve the taking of majority decisions when hostilities are on the agenda. Those are the essential responsibilities of Parliaments and they should never be given up.

We must not think that insularity is sufficient to deal with the evolving political balance in NATO. The logic for Europe collectively making more effective use of the $160 billion or so that it spends annually on defence is overwhelming. We ought to get much better value for the money that we spend. However, the relationship with the United States needs to be rebalanced. I said that the presumption is that our interests will coincide, but I can list a number of areas in which the United States has taken a different position from us and our allies in Europe: on the chemical weapons convention, the comprehensive test ban treaty, the land mines treaty, the international criminal court and the anti-ballistic missile treaty. In those areas, the United States is acting unilaterally: its actions do not accord with the political judgments of the rest of its allies in Europe.

As I said when I intervened on the Secretary of State, those of us who were at the Munich conference a fortnight ago could not but have been conscious of the unease on the part of members of the Senate and the House of Representatives. Those of us who support the ESDP must persuade these legislators that it will not prejudice NATO. I was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman did not respond directly to my intervention. It is one reason why I think that NATO should have a right of formal first refusal when any military action is contemplated. That will deal with members of NATO who are not members of the European Union. We will require other arrangements for EU members who are not members of NATO.

Mr. Bercow: I note the significance of what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said about belief in the national veto on defence. Does he agree that, in those circumstances, it is—to put it mildly—unfortunate that the President of the European Commission has said that an attack an one member state of the EU should be regarded as an attack on all—apparently, deliberately seeking to ape NATO? Should he not be condemned for that?

Mr. Campbell: We should remember that the President of the Commission is not the Prime Minister of Europe, even though he may from time to time think that he is. Europe is a union of nation states, which have pooled their sovereignty in certain respects. Frankly, there is no such legal obligation. If the hon. Gentleman has followed American thinking on these matters, he will know that there was great apprehension in Washington about the notion of a security guarantee being given, as it were, by the back door. I do not support that view. If that is what Mr. Prodi said, he was wrong, and I hope that the former Secretary of State for Defence, who is now the Secretary-General of NATO, took an early opportunity to tell him just that.

Lord Hurd, the former Foreign Secretary, wrote in the Financial Times on 18 February:

> "A valid Atlantic partnership cannot safely depend on a unique superpower on one side of the Atlantic, with an array of Europeans on the other side, strong in rhetoric but chronically short of coherence and muscle. Neither coherence in foreign policy nor a muscular defence will be easy to come by."

Lord Hurd gave what I would certainly understand to be intelligent and cautious support for the notion of proceeding upon the initiatives that have been launched on European security and defence policy. In that sense, he is entirely in the main stream of thinking in the United Kingdom, even though he may be slightly out of the main stream in his own party.

Dr. Julian Lewis: As Lord Hurd is now the fount of mainstream opinion and the oracle on all things, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree with what he said at the time of the conflict in Bosnia—that we should not allow the Bosnian Muslims the arms to defend themselves for fear of creating a level killing field? Is that mainstream opinion, or should we consider these matters in their own terms and not according to who said them?

Mr. Campbell: At the time, Lord Hurd was the Foreign Secretary of the Conservative Government, whom the hon. Gentleman almost certainly supported.

Dr. Lewis: I did not.

Mr. Campbell: It would almost be worth having the Conservatives back in power to see on how many occasions the hon. Gentleman would disagree with them.

Lord Hurd's remarks were roundly condemned by Lady Thatcher and also by my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). I am not arguing that Lord Hurd is infallible, but on that matter he seems to be in rather more of the main stream. They were all in the main stream when the Maastricht treaty was being considered, with the exception of the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) who is now shadow Secretary of State for Defence.

Dr. Lewis: What about us?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot keep interrupting. I cannot hear what the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) is saying.

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) does not know what stream he was in, but whatever it was, I hope that it was a stream of consciousness.

Dr. Lewis rose—

Mr. Campbell: I will not give way because I want to give the hon. Gentleman a short reminder of history. The Maastricht treaty was whipped through the House—three-line Whips, night after night. Some hon. Members resisted the Whip; for example, the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green, who found that period of his political career rather uncomfortable. However, the treaty stated that the EU's external policy objective was to "assert its identity on the international scene, in particular, through the implementation of a common foreign and security policy, including the eventual framing of a common defence policy, which might in time lead to a common defence."

That is the fons et origo of the European security and defence policy.

My concluding remarks will be about the feasibility of a proposed national missile defence system—very much part of the political agenda in Washington. The first two tests of such a system have been inconclusive, but a third is expected before President Clinton makes a decision, in June, on whether to seek congressional funding to enable full-scale development and deployment to take place by 2005.

President Clinton intends to take account of four published criteria: the threat; feasibility; affordability; and the strategic environment—including arms control objectives. It is clear beyond question to anyone who spends time in Washington at present, or to anyone who was in Munich a fortnight ago, that the only test that matters is feasibility. If the system can be made to work, the United States—under the present Administration or the next—will deploy a form of national missile defence, in the face of the reservations of its European allies and even if it means breaching the anti-ballistic missile treaty.

Yesterday, the Secretary of State engaged in a certain amount of urbane dissembling when that reality was put to him. He did not really respond to the shadow Secretary of State's approach to the matter today. There will be a decision in June. The UK Government had better have a view as to their reaction to that decision. In the first instance, some effort will be made to obtain the use of Fylingdales as part of the system. That may not be entirely popular in some parts of Yorkshire.

There may well be consequences for the nuclear doctrine of minimum deterrence, or for the prospects of obtaining reductions in nuclear weapons—either through START 2 or, more optimistically, through a START 3 treaty. If the deployment of national missile defence provokes a lack of co-operation, the prospect of further multilateral nuclear disarmament may be much more remote than many of us hope.

Liberal Democrats oppose the proposal for national missile defence if it has the effect of breaching the anti-ballistic missile treaty. If some arrangement can be made—if the technology can be made available to Russia, which is currently under discussion in Washington—different considerations may apply. The ABM is important because it has been a keystone in the balance of power since 1972.

The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green talked about threat assessment; he referred to rogue states. Popularly, there are four of those: Iran, Libya, North Korea and Iraq. Perhaps we should look at Iran with rather more optimism after the events of the past week or so. We have just resumed diplomatic relations with Libya, and the two suspects in the Lockerbie bombing inquiry have been made available for trial. Former Secretary of State Perry is making a long, detailed effort to negotiate with North Korea. In Iraq, we are containing the situation on the basis that if there is any effort to use—or to threaten to use—weapons of mass destructions, there would almost certainly be a proportionate response, as I think that James Baker pointed out during his negotiations with Tariq Aziz before the Gulf war.

The risk of the proposal for national minimum missile defence is that it appears to undercut the whole principle of deterrence. There is an important question for all of us: supposing that the UK were to be involved in that proposal, what would be the cost? How certain could we be that the US would be willing to transfer all the technology to us?

Dr. Julian Lewis rose—

Mr. Duncan Smith rose—

Mr. Campbell: I am about to finish my speech. Other Members want to take part in the debate, and I have delayed the House as long as is prudent.

One disappointment of the White Paper is that only one sentence deals with nuclear weapons—in paragraph 128. That is profoundly disappointing as we approach the review conference for the non-proliferation treaty, which will be held within a few weeks. Under article 6 of that treaty, the UK has obligations to pursue nuclear disarmament in good faith, by negotiation. Nothing in the White Paper sets out what the UK proposes to do at the conference, or, indeed, in the future. That is a sad and unfortunate omission.

It is conventional in these debates to express support and congratulations to all those who serve in the armed forces. As I said earlier, we talk about defence, but they risk their lives to be our defence. On these occasions, we should never forget that.

3.56 pm

Mr. Syd Rapson (Portsmouth, North): It is always a privilege to be able to speak in this place. No doubt it is because so many Members are absent that I have been given that opportunity today. However, I am not sure whether it is an advantage to follow the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell), whose eloquence we try to emulate. It is a pity that his talents are wasted in the Liberal party.

I want to focus on more realistic issues, which touch me and my city, and also to talk about my experiences in the WEU. Those matters are wide ranging, but not rambling. I shall touch on four of them. The first is parochial and relates to Portsmouth and the Territorial Army. The second is the Defence Aviation Repair Agency, about which I have some worries. The third relates to Portsmouth's interests in defence contracting. Finally, I shall make some observations on the European issue.

Earlier, we heard an attack on the TA. I recently visited our TA centre in Portsmouth to find out the truth. The professionals running the TA were extremely complimentary about the restructuring, although the Royal Rifle Volunteers are still trying to establish an identity. They have moved location and are rather lost in the wilderness. They emphasised however that members of the TA are looking forward to playing a much more professional role, and, at times, to being reinjected in the proper services. They were buoyant. They were worried about employers giving TA members time off, and hope that the Government can reinforce the right of people to join the TA and to be released from work for service in it. When I was employed at the MOD, I spent a lot of time negotiating for time off for TA members. I hope that we can make things easier for them, because they play a vital role.

DARA, which was set up in April 1999, is mentioned briefly in the Select Committee report. I have sufficient experience of the agency to realise that the report's words do not clearly define its problems. I worked in the naval air repair organisation—NARO—for 39 years; it was a good experience. The organisation is mainly based in Gosport—I am sure that the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) will not mind my mentioning that—and many of my constituents work there.

I did not object when NARO became part of the new agency. That was the way to go and it was to be encouraged. However, the way the change was carried out leaves much to be desired. A new chief executive was parachuted in to take out the old style of management. He was bent on trying to modernise the organisation so as to integrate it with DARA—the new agency. In his clinical and surgical way, he ripped out the social fabric of the establishment and sorted out the management in short order—frightening everyone about the future. He made promises that jobs were secure and that the rationalisation, which we predicted, would not take place. The trade unions accepted his words and encouraged the work force to go with the plan rather than resist it. I was part of the team that did that, but the latest announcement is that 90 of the most highly qualified avionics craftspeople will be sacked. Our trust has been severely undermined.

I declare an interest, as a member of the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union. I have long been associated with the union, and its officers normally work well and try to get on with management. However, one full-time official of the union is so incensed that he has written to my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces. I know that my hon. Friend is capable of understanding the details, but the worrying point is that trade unions have to report that they have been misled. In fact, the official uses much stronger terms than that. That is no way to reorganise DARA.

There is a fear that the whole of the establishment in Gosport will collapse, leaving us short of 1,000 jobs. If that is so, it would be a sad reflection on the Government's well-intentioned idea of creating a defence repair agency for aviation that is second to none and of strengthening the establishments at St. Athan, Sea Land and Almondbank in Scotland, if not Fleetlands in Gosport. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister has listened and is well aware of the issues.

The underlying point is that we can evolve, modernise and carry the unions and the hearts and minds of the workers with us only if we are honest. If there is a suspicion that honesty is being taken advantage of, we shall destroy the process and cause a reaction. That will result in all the bad things that we saw many years ago. I have invested 39 years of my life in the industry and I do not want to see that wasted by a chief executive who is building an empire for himself.

I listened to Members who referred to the necessary missile systems, such as the beyond visual range air-to-air missile, and to the importance of reaching decisions on them. I am bored silly, as no doubt many are, by mention of the A400M heavy lifter. However, we had fun yesterday when my right hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) innovatively suggested that we might try to land it on aircraft carriers. I have been pressurised by companies to mention this heavy lifter, and I believe that it is the right solution. It is geared and designed specifically to the roles that it will play in the future. Whatever the interim arrangements, I hope that it will be the long-term solution.

A strategic air tanker is also necessary, as is SIFF—successor identification friend or foe—which is the advanced version of the current system. However, we must strike a balance. I represent Portsmouth, which is heavily dependent on defence, although more on the private contracting sector than on Government provision. My ears are therefore bent from all sides. I just hope that the jobs in the companies involved are secured and that the right decisions are ultimately taken. However, I prefer some solutions to others, because they are more of a British and a European answer than an American one.

I want to touch on the European defence initiative. As a member of the Western European Union, I attended the meeting that decided to nominate me as a rapporteur for the committee considering the European armed forces and the collective capability required for their deployment. Because I did not say no, I suddenly found that I had a new job. It has been quite an eye opener, and the research that I have seen strengthens my view that we are doing exactly the right thing. Although the White Paper deals with general issues and does not specify details, it goes hand in glove with that research.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) touched on the issues that worry the WEU. They include the roles of the European Union, the WEU and NATO. I was lucky that, as a member of the WEU's defence committee, I was able to visit Washington. We visited the Pentagon and spoke to senior military figures. We also spoke to the President's strategic defence adviser and we were flown to Florida to speak to General Zinny and his team, who make up America's rapid reaction force.

The people that we met expressed strong views and were committed to the Government's approach. At no time did anyone doubt it; in fact, they encouraged it. Many complimentary things were said about the strategic defence review, and it was said that we were ahead of the game. Many countries, including America, will have to go through that process and they congratulated my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Government on their role.

As I am a creep, may I say that the Government's Front-Bench team on defence are doing a great job? They have recently been enhanced by an extra Minister who will add more gravitas, if not gravity, to those on the Front Bench. Labour Members are extremely lucky to have such a powerful and secure team. That is enough creeping for now, and it will not get me any better answers. However, it is true that there is much sense and stability in that team. As a representative of a constituency with defence interests, I like and feel secure with its members.

I am writing a paper and have received information from many French sources regarding the new missions for European armed forces. That information leads me to believe that we are in an inevitable process that cannot be stopped. As a practical realist, I like to go with the flow and try to make things work rather to oppose for the sake of opposition and gain brownie points. [Interruption.] That is Tony. He says, "Syd, comb your head; you are on television."

I know that the best speeches are always the shortest speeches, and two minutes is long enough. I feel secure with the new way Europe is going. I do not have the hang-ups that I used to have in the old days. There is an inevitable process and a pride in what we have and in how we can lead Europe. The strategic defence review covers most of the things that we need to do, and I am sure that we shall have a safer future.

Mr. Bercow: My ears pricked up with alarm when the hon. Gentleman mentioned the word "inevitable" in the context of European integration. If, as part of the horse trading in the European Union, the sacrifice of the British national veto on defence becomes a precondition of British entry to the euro, will he confirm that that is a deal with which he is entirely content?

Mr. Rapson: I echo the words of the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife. The veto is secure. The organisation comes together for the benefit of defence in Europe. That does not mean giving up our sovereignty or handing over a veto, it means working together as a team to secure better defence in Europe.

Our experiences with NATO and in European crises show that there is much that we have to learn. There are shortfalls. For example, interoperability was shown up in such a way that we felt let down. We have not yet got interoperability to the extent that we want it; nor do we yet have the joint workings that we should have. There are several things for which we rely on America to an extent that we should not.

This country and Europe should have a heavy lift requirement and we should have the security surveillance that we need without having to rely on another nation. We should have such surveillance so that we can link in with America and NATO to make ourselves stronger. If we can put right the shortfalls in the European context, the whole system will become stronger.

I very much agree with earlier statements that we shall not give up our sovereignty. We are still a proud nation, but we are part of a team and we can work much better together. More bangs for bucks was mentioned earlier. The money that we spend on defence seems to be inefficiently used compared with what America does. If we can learn from that and become more efficient, we shall be better off all round.

I hope that the Minister has listened to my point about DARA. Although it is a parochial issue that affects me personally, it is also an issue to do with the way that we do things. I trust the actions that the Government have taken on agencies. They seem to be a lot better and are being run more realistically. Rationalisation is inevitable, but what is important is how we carry it out and how we treat people. If we are to lose many highly skilled people, that will be a sad waste for Gosport, and we will suffer. At the end of the day, however, our trade unions must be able to trust what the Government are doing.

4.10 pm

Sir Archie Hamilton (Epsom and Ewell): May I start by declaring my interests in defence? I am a consultant to Litton Industries and to GenCorp Aerojet, which are both American contractors, and to the consulting engineers W. S. Atkins, which play a serious role in the management of the defence of the state. I am also a director of Leafield Engineering Ltd., which is a small company involved in defence manufacture in Wiltshire.

My contacts in the Ministry of Defence tell me that they have never known a time when morale was so low and when the financial pressures were so great on everything that they are trying to do. Those problems are compounded by those of retaining our good, trained people and of meeting all our commitments.

I blame all that on the strategic defence review. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), the shadow Secretary of State, I do not think that there should ever have been a strategic defence review. What the Ministry of Defence needed after the election was a period of stability. We had already had two defence reviews: "Options for Change", which made a massive reduction in the number of our forces, including halving the Rhine Army, and the defence cost studies, which took an enormous amount out of the defence budget. After that, the Ministry needed a period of calm and time to get itself into order.

The strategic defence review had to happen because, foolishly, it was included in the Labour party's manifesto at the last election. The result is that further disruption has taken place. The Government say, "Ah, but this is different. This is foreign policy-led." To me, that is a pretty laughable claim. Presumably, this is the Foreign Office that did not tell us that the Falklands were going to be invaded, and at the time of the Gulf war, that Kuwait would be invaded by Saddam Hussein. I have great difficulty in understanding what expertise the Foreign Office has that enables it to tell us about our deployment of troops.

I wonder whether the Secretary of State realises that when he talks about modernisation, he fills many decent people with dread and apprehension. Modernisation for this Government has come to mean that whatever exists, and has done so for some time, should be thrown up in the air so that it can all be changed rapidly, but one has absolutely no idea where it will all land. I pity the Ministry of Defence if the Secretary of State's objective is to modernise it because it will almost certainly mean prolonged chaos from which it will take a long time to recover.

There is no doubt that the SDR has been driven by the Treasury because it wanted its pound of flesh, but it was important that when the SDR was launched, it should all be dressed up to suggest that the cuts would not be as dramatic as they were. The theory was that there were savings to be found, and the spin was that the 3 per cent. that was saved would be ploughed back into the defence budget. One talked not about cuts but about increases in expenditure from the savings that had been made. The trouble is that it has not worked out that way.

I commend the Select Committee on Defence on its excellent report on the SDR and defence generally. It is one of the best reports that we have seen for a long time, but it is also a damning report of the Government's running of the Ministry of Defence since the last election. It is claimed that the target of £505 million of savings in 1998-99 was exceeded; the Ministry claims that it achieved £594 million of savings. However, the Select Committee regards that figure as completely implausible.

[Sir Archie Hamilton]

What is an efficiency saving and what is a cut in expenditure? It is too easy to confuse the two, and we have all been subjected to a complete con trick with the 3 per cent. savings. There has really been a massive reduction in defence expenditure, which has resulted—as we have been hearing all afternoon—in training being cancelled and ships being told to go at low speeds so that they do not consume too much fuel. That, in the words of the Secretary of State, is keeping within the budget, but we know that there are serious restraints on the military in carrying out the training that is necessary if it is to produce the top-class troops that we have been used to having in the British armed forces.

Mr. Spellar: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us what was the cruising speed of ships when he was Minister for the Armed Forces?

Sir Archie Hamilton: It was certainly a lot higher than it is now.

Procurement is also a complete shambles. We have heard nothing about the delayed decisions on major procurement items and the massive cost overruns. The Government say that they are introducing smart procurement, which means that everything should come through faster, cheaper and better. I should be grateful if the Minister, when he winds up, would tell us what items of procurement have come through faster, cheaper or better. We want some examples before we accept that we are entering a new world.

The problem with smart procurement is that if it works, one must start procurement two years later than one normally would; otherwise, if it comes through faster, one finds that one has to pay for it earlier. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green said, in the Ministry of Defence cashflow is all, and if it is merely paying for things earlier, it is not solving any problems whatever; it is merely increasing pressure on the defence budget.

Perhaps the short-term strategic airlift is an example of smart procurement. We started off with five bids and they all proved unacceptable. Will the Minister confirm that we now seem to have a competition between the Antonov and the C17, but that the requirement for the C17 has now been reduced from four aircraft to two because that is what is likely to fit into the £500 million budget allocation for those aircraft? It strikes me that there are enormous problems with the short-term strategic airlift, and those need to be solved sooner rather than later.

Do we really need the C17, which is an all-singing, all-dancing aircraft, when in practice any lift of that sort would be escorted by other aircraft? Do we therefore need all the defensive aids on the transporting aircraft when there will be other aircraft around it to take it into any war zone?

The SDR also seemed to depend on certain lumps of capital sales, including the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, which will bring in the not insignificant sum of £250 million. However, I gather that the Government are abandoning the idea of a public-private partnership for DERA, so what will happen to that £250 million, which is an essential element in the MOD's budgeting?

The sale of the Duke of York's barracks was also supposed to raise more than £250 million. Is that sale going ahead? There is talk about negotiations taking place. Obviously, it is critical that the sale goes through, or there will be even greater pressures on the budget and the morale.

It is said that the cost of the Kosovo operation was some £400 million. Will all that money be funded out of the contingency reserve this year? Is that the total cost of the operation? Does it rebuild all our stocks of cruise missiles and the other weaponry that was used? If the answer to those questions is no, when will the money be produced to replenish the war stocks, which we might well need in the near future?

The strategic defence review claimed to be about matching resources to commitments; in fact, resources have been cut and commitments increased. The so-called savings have resulted from an overall reduction in available budget moneys, and Kosovo and East Timor have been added to our commitments.

The Secretary of State says that he has been able to reduce the number of troops in Northern Ireland to less than 16,000. That is extremely welcome news and we hope that that number can be maintained. The so-called ceasefire is not much of a ceasefire—49 terrorist murders have been committed since the agreement was signed and many people have been injured, mutilated and hospitalised as a result of the acts of terrorists—but let us pretend that there is a ceasefire. However, suppose that non-ceasefire broke down completely: more troops would have to be committed to Northern Ireland. It should be borne in mind that, when things are extremely difficult in Northern Ireland, we have more than 30,000 troops posted there. If things go badly wrong in Ulster, there will be a massive increase in our commitments there.

The one person I congratulate, even though he is no longer a Member of Parliament, is Lord Robertson, whose timing was brilliant—I commend him on it. Knowing when to go can be the best decision one ever takes in politics. The way in which the noble Lord managed to get out before the roof finally fell in was absolutely brilliant.

The reason why Lord Robertson was offered the job as Secretary-General of NATO was that he had been credited with having "a very good war" in Kosovo. Was it really a good war? Looking at it in the cold light of day, many people feel enormous reservations about the intervention in Kosovo. When it all began, the Prime Minister said that the objective was to stop the Serbs driving the Kosovan Albanians out of their homes. Yet, when the bombing began, what happened? There was a massive intensification of the ethnic cleansing of Kosovo, and people were driven from their homes at an even faster rate than they had been before the bombing began.

We were then told that the bombing was intended to hit military targets in Serbia. Soon, military targets started to mean bridges over the Danube and car factories that might have been making vehicles used by the military. Make-up artists were killed when television stations were bombed because they might have been broadcasting propaganda for Milosevic. In the bombing, many civilians, but few members of the Serbian military, were killed.

NATO claimed on our televisions every night that the Serb military was being degraded and its capabilities seriously reduced. However, when it was all over, we watched vast armoured columns emerge from shelters where they had hidden throughout the bombing. Ultimately, what really suffered was NATO's credibility. Will we ever again believe NATO spokesmen when they tell us how much the military capability of our opponent is being degraded, given that so much of what they told us during the Kosovan crisis turned out to be completely wrong? That is a serious problem that must be addressed. We always accuse our enemies of producing misleading propaganda; we do not expect such propaganda to emerge from NATO.

Now that the Kosovans have been liberated, they are free to persecute and kill the remaining Serbs in Kosovo. As the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife (Mr. Campbell) says, the whole area is on the brink of disaster. Whatever else happens, the region will become another Cyprus: 30 years from now, there will still be a massive United Nations contingent there, trying to keep the two sides apart.

I am worried, not only by what happened in Serbia, but by the whole question of what certain countries will do if they think that they might in future become victims of the sort of assault that was launched against Serbia. If we bring to bear on a small country the massive technology and military supremacy wielded by the United States specifically and by NATO generally, what message does that send to that country? There is no way countries can arm to defend themselves against that sort of capability; no country in the world could afford to do so, especially not small countries such as Serbia. What will such countries do? They will be inclined to resort to terrorism, as the Chechens allegedly did, blowing up blocks of flats in Moscow. They will be inclined to resort to hijacking, as in the recent hijacking in Afghanistan, in the face of which the Indians completely gave way, leading to who knows what—probably to many similar hijackings demanding the release of prisoners. Much more worrying is the possibility that such countries might turn to weapons of mass destruction.

I do not believe that any small country will get involved in the manufacture of nuclear weapons. Saddam Hussein wants to do that in Iraq, probably in an effort to gain some prestige in the region. However, it is much cheaper and easier to develop chemical and biological weapons. Perhaps such weapons will be loaded on rockets, the threat carried on interballistic missiles; but it would be far cheaper to put them into suitcases, so making them man-portable. I wonder what we started with our massive use of military power against a small errant nation. Where will it all lead in the longer run?

Dr. Julian Lewis: Throughout the crisis, my right hon. Friend and I completely disagreed on the question of intervening in Kosovo. Is not one of the messages sent by the Kosovo campaign to small Balkan dictators that they should not invade their neighbours, otherwise they will be get hammered?

Sir Archie Hamilton: Yes, but one has to ask whether that will be effective in Montenegro, where a serious crisis appears to be brewing. I am not at all certain that the Serbs have learned any lessons—they could well become involved there as well. I realise that that is the message we wanted to send, but will it be received by small errant nations? The Chechens did not appear to worry too much about their previous conflict with Russia; they came back for more. Countries will not necessarily adopt the rational response and bow to the will of the super-powers, as my hon. Friend appears to believe that they will. I wish that he were right, but I am not sure that he is.

We were told that the strategic defence review was based on certain foreign policy assumptions, but we have yet to hear what those assumptions were. Perhaps the fact that the Government now have an ethical foreign policy will give us a lead. Unfortunately, with their ethical foreign policy, the Government appear to have got into the same sort of muddle that my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) got into when he started to talk about "back to basics" and advocated the Government taking a moral view of people's personal behaviour. My right hon. Friend was roasted by the press every time anyone fell out of line.

Arms sales bring similar problems when the Government set themselves up as having an ethical policy. Let us face it, this country has an enormous and thriving defence industry, which, like other industries, depends heavily on exports to countries throughout the world. By being frightfully fussy, it is easy to find reasons not to sell arms to almost any nation—for example, one can decide that its human rights record is not as good as one might want it to be. There is no difficulty in finding reasons not to sell arms, but if the Government do that, a large number of people working in British Aerospace and other firms will be put out of work. That is the problem that confronts every Government. To embark on an ethical foreign policy was an extremely foolish step, because it invited criticism of any nation to which arms were sold. A balance must be struck.

It is interesting that Labour Members, who cry out for ethics in our foreign policy, a ban on the arms trade and so on, are the first to criticise the United Kingdom's shrinking industrial base. They constantly say what a disaster it is that our industrial base is shrinking while the service sector is growing, then they advocate policies that will lead to one of our most successful industries being cut because it cannot export abroad. There is no logic whatever in that.

"Ah," say Labour Members, "what about diversification?" No British Government can tell British industry about diversification. A company such as GEC was engaged in manufacturing washing machines, weighing machines and lifts, as well as in mass defence exports. It split off its defence business and sold it to British Aerospace, so there is no longer scope for diversification in that company.

What is the ethical foreign policy really about? We have an interesting attitude. We get involved in a civil war in Kosovo because, in the Prime Minister's words, it is on Europe's doorstep, but we studiously ignore other civil wars in places such as Rwanda, Sierra Leone and Angola. We do not seem to want to get involved in them, perhaps because those wars are taking place much further away and do not involve people with whom we readily identify. Moreover, there is no television coverage; we are not seeing what is happening there on our news programmes every night, leading everyone to say that something must be done.

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. Does he subscribe to the view that, because we cannot do everything, we should do nothing?

Sir Archie Hamilton: No, but it is illogical to claim that an ethical dimension forces us to become involved in one civil war, but not in others. I do not believe that we should get involved in any civil war. We should be very wary of becoming involved. It is an opportunity to make matters much worse, as we may have done in Kosovo.

An interesting aspect of the strategic defence review was the deal that the Royal Navy did. In return for getting rid of a large number of its surface ships, it is to be given two very large aircraft carriers at some time in the future. I have a slight problem with that, as I do not understand what the aircraft carriers are for.

We have been told that the regions in which we want to operate are the Balkans and places near Europe. As we know, aircraft carriers do not have a great role at present in the Balkans, because everyone can fly off 2,000 yd of concrete in Italy, which is infinitely preferable to trying to fly off a ship. If our areas of operation are to be in or near Europe, there does not seem to be a role for aircraft carriers.

If we are to be involved in the Gulf region, we would not have friendly countries nearby to provide landing areas for our aircraft. Perhaps the objective is that the aircraft carriers should operate much further away, as we have traditionally been used to doing.

I wondered where the idea came from, and it suddenly dawned on me that the Government must have dug up Alan Clark's defence review. I am sure that several hon. Members have read his memoirs. They are brilliant diaries, full of wonderful writing, presenting his unique view of what took place in government at the time. It is very sad that Alan has died, and I am sure that we all miss him in the House.

Alan and I were both Ministers at the Ministry of Defence at the time of "Options for Change". As he wrote in his memoirs, he produced his own defence review at the same time as a more orthodox review was being produced by the Ministry of Defence. As he tells us in his book, he succeeded in smuggling it through to the Prime Minister of the time, Margaret Thatcher, behind the back of the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King).

Alan never revealed in his diaries what was in his defence review, but he told me, because I was at the Ministry of Defence at the time. He saw no role at all for NATO. He envisaged the Soviet Union's rapid disintegration and thought that NATO had outlived all useful purpose. He saw no future, either, for high-intensity warfare, and thought that the quicker we wound down the Rhine Army, the better.

What Alan was really keen on was mobility. He wanted force projection, airborne troops, marines and aircraft carriers. When I asked him what he wanted those for, he said that it would be a good idea for us to get involved, rather like the French in Chad, in various African ventures where we could have a series of easy victories over small African countries. He thought that that would be extremely good for British morale.

Interestingly, the Government are following Alan Clark's defence review, almost to the letter. They are undermining NATO as fast as they can, by throwing the Atlantic Alliance into total confusion with the threat of Euro-armies and all that. The run-down of the Rhine Army continues apace. The only thing missing are the aircraft carriers, but the Government assure us that they are on order and that the procurement process is going ahead. Presumably, the force projection will take place at some stage and the Prime Minister, like some warrior king, will fight distant battles over the continent of Africa—an interesting neo-colonial approach to the future of defence.

Alan Clark is no longer with us, but he would relish the irony that his defence review, which was so substantially rejected by a Conservative Government, seems to be forming the basis of the present Labour Government's policy.

Mr. Thomas Graham (West Renfrewshire): Although I welcome part of the Government's plans, I am concerned about procurement. Other hon. Members have spoken about the defence industry, which obviously plays an important part in the country's defence.

Last week, constituents of mine were told that their jobs at Bishopton Royal Ordnance factory were finished and that the company would close within a year. Arguments have been put forward by workers, trade unions and many others, and I have tried time and again to arrange a meeting with the Secretary of State for Defence to discuss the job losses in a vital industry—the last propellant factory in Great Britain.

Lord Robertson was difficult; I would probably have found it easier to track down Lord Lucan. That is an indictment. I asked the new Secretary of State for a meeting weeks ago, and I am still waiting for a reply.

I stand here proud, arguing for the work force of Royal Ordnance Bishopton. I am proud of the fact that they are not lame ducks. They are a tried, tested, unique work force. They are highly skilled and can compete with the best, but it is difficult to compete with companies abroad whose Governments are subsidising them under the counter.

I believe that the Bishopton Royal Ordnance workers face redundancy because the British Government are not facing up to their responsibilities towards a defence industry.

Let me outline the situation to the House. The quality of the product manufactured by Royal Ordnance Bishopton is second to none. The quantity is there in this country's time of need. The work force meet all time targets. More important, the material that they produce is tried, tested and does not fail. When our forces use those materials in combat, they know that they can trust the products of Bishopton Royal Ordnance factory. They know that they are not flying duds. If anyone questions what I am saying, let me remind them that, in the Falklands, materials produced by other countries failed. Belgian companies produced duds. Our soldiers and sailors said that they knew when materials were going to work, and those did not.

The Royal Ordnance factory in Bishopton is the last propellant factory in Great Britain. It is unique and it should be retained for the defence of this country. It is as important as a front-line soldier. If a front-line soldier does not have a tried and trusted weapon that works, what does he have? All he has at his back is an empty balloon, by which I mean he becomes a target. I cannot understand why a Labour Government do not support the Royal Ordnance factory workers. Quality, price, everything is right.

In 1987, when I was in opposition, I argued against a Tory Government who wanted to close the Royal Ordnance factory in Bishopton. The Labour party, the Scottish National party, the Liberal Democrats and all other parties were unanimous against the closure. The arguments that applied then apply now. To their credit, the Tory Government eventually supported us and the factory remained open. No different arguments apply now.

I am holding leaked confidential documents, which were delivered to my house at midnight at the weekend. They contain details about companies that are applying for orders to do the business for our troops. They make worrying reading. I would be worried if I was a young soldier who was putting his life and limb at risk for this country. I shall not bore the House with enormous detail because the papers are technical. However, one company states that its experience with geometrics has proved difficult and therefore offers a maximum price. That company obviously finds the work difficult; it does not want to produce materials to the same standard as Bishopton. On the paste drying process, a company cannot guarantee the combustion. It is said that combustion is basically standard, and not the same as another formulation. A company also states that it does not understand the need to prove compatibility. Yet this is supposed to be an up-to-date, bang-on-the-button defence business.

A company claims that it will supply the materials in the near future; it should all be done. It claims that in its first offer, it assumed that it would be undertaking two-part assembly, but that it subsequently learned that the assembly consisted of five parts. It concludes that it will therefore have to raise the price. Another example is that final testing and acceptance of propellant will be conducted by Royal Ordnance at Royal Ordnance expense.

I am not an expert in the manufacture and production of propellant. I am not skilful enough to go through the documents in great detail without the help of an expert. As I said earlier, the documents were parachuted through my door late at night. However, I am sensible enough to appreciate that the person who put the documents through my door knows that the companies on which we will rely to produce the necessary propellant for our forces cannot produce it to Ministry of Defence standards and quality. I ask Labour Members to join me to fight to save the Bishopton Royal Ordnance factory. It is needed. If we sit on our backsides, we will be at the mercy of a foreign nation.

My father, who is dead, was a sailor. He fought a war that he reckoned needed fighting against Hitler. With hindsight, everyone agrees that we needed to beat Hitler. I do not know whether I necessarily agreed with the Falklands war, but we backed and supported our soldiers and sailors. I did not agree with the politics of the Falklands war, but I agreed with ensuring that our troops had the best equipment available at the time. Saddam Hussein is an evil man—I do not need to bore the House and the country with that. He created a conflict, and once again, our forces needed to go to war. They were supplied by Bishopton Royal Ordnance factory. The workers worked night and day during those conflicts. They worked at the beck and call of this country. They gave up everything that they could to produce the necessary gear.

The Government's arguments are flawed, fragile and fatal to the troops, whom we should look after. The defence industry is important. I have heard a lot of talk about the front-line troops today, but they need the backing of good quality products that work. Even at this stage, I press my arguments to the Minister, and ask him to do the decent thing and meet me so that I can explain at greater length the reasons why British Aerospace Systems should not be allowed to close the Royal Ordnance factory.

This country needs that propellant factory for its defence, which should not be left to private commerce. Through years of dedication, development, planning and skill, we have a work force who are second to none. They are fully trained and experienced. Once we put the key in the door, we must not believe that we can return to the Royal Ordnance workers and ask them to produce propellant if another Gulf happens. We cannot do that. Once the work force are disbanded, they are disbanded for good, and we must rely on duds. That is not the British defence that I want.

I support the Government on many of the defence industries or I would not be on this side of the House, but I do not support their proposal to stand back and allow British Aerospace to close the Bishopton Royal Ordnance factory. The work force there deserve better, but, more importantly, the British armed forces deserve better. They need their product and the MOD should get off its backside and make sure that it delivers that factory.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries): I apologise for arriving late. The hon. Gentleman has appealed to the Minister to meet him to discuss the future of Royal Ordnance Bishopton and I hear what he says. I believe that that is very important. He also commented on the Falklands war. Our front-line troops were dependent on ammunition not only from Royal Ordnance Bishopton, but from a site where I worked, which was the only small arms propellant manufacturing operation in the United Kingdom. It was quickly swept aside by the previous Government through the Royal Ordnance privatisation. I hope that his attempt to secure a meeting with the Minister is successful, but he must be sure that the arguments he would make are correct.

Mr. Graham: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, but my speech is concerned solely with the Bishopton Royal Ordnance factory. I know that ships were produced in shipyards and guns were produced in other factories and I agree that all those efforts were combined for our armed forces, but that is not the point. I do not want to be sidetracked. I believe that Royal Ordnance Bishopton is a strategic part of the defence of this country. It is the last remaining propellant factory in the country and the tried and tested tradesmen there can continue production. If the factory closes, we have had it. We will have to go for the duds, the fakes and the bullets that do not work. Once again, I ask the Minister to reconsider his decision to stand aside and allow British Aerospace to close the factory.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): The whole House will applaud the passion with which the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Mr. Graham) fights his corner on behalf of the Bishopton Royal Ordnance factory. I very much hope that the shots he has fired today find their target on the Treasury Bench and that he at least gets the meeting with the Minister that he wants so that the work force can put its case directly to him.

There is another important factor to bear in mind—security of supply. From the minute that we begin to take supplies from overseas for military purposes, there will be a danger that some suppliers may say no. Our forces experienced that during the Gulf war when Belgian suppliers refused to give us the shells that were required. Any international contract entered into by the Ministry of Defence for the supply of any military equipment must guarantee that that supply is secure. Otherwise, we shall endanger our troops, which is wrong. It is all very well the Treasury chasing value for money—it is taxpayers' money—but quality of product and security of supply are paramount. I wish the hon. Gentleman well in the battle that lies ahead.

The defence White Paper is the first since 1996 and the first for this Government. The strategic defence review, which was promised during Labour's last two years in opposition, appeared in July 1998. It took 14 months to produce and some of us wondered why it took so long. No doubt the Government, like the opposition parties, were still hunting for the so-called ethical foreign policy on which it was supposed to rest. At least it contained one good thing: henceforth, it promised that there would be an annual defence White Paper. It has taken some time for this one to arrive, but I hope that an annual White Paper will be the norm from now on.

Many other documents have been produced by the MOD and the Defence Committee has been able to make a judgment on them, but defence White Papers are easier to compare and so achieve a clear rolling picture of how the Ministry is performing in its primary task of the defence of the realm. The Defence Committee had to move extremely fast to produce its report on this occasion. It would be entirely out of character for me to say too much about what is good about the Committee and its report; I leave that to others. There have been many congratulations on that report this afternoon and it has been quoted extensively by most speakers. That does great credit to our Chairman, the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), who I am sure will be present on Monday to hear the praise directly.

A great deal of the credit must also go to the Clerks who serve our Committee—there are only five; Governments and Parliaments overseas are amazed that House of Commons Select Committees can produce work of such quality with such a small staff. If ever there was an example of quality rather than quantity, that is it. I put on the record my praise for David Natzler, Andrew Kennon—the Committee Clerk when I was Chairman—and Paul Evans, who is the current Committee Clerk. Their work has been second to none. I should also like to mention Mr. Simon Fiander, one of the five, who is a secondee from the National Audit Office. As much of our work involves considering how money is spent, particularly on projects, including those that are cancelled or delayed, the presence of a national audit officer within the ranks of the Committee is an enormous help.

The strength of the Defence Committee has been its broad view, its constructive criticism and its wide consensus. I think that on the first day it met there may have been a vote on some triviality, but throughout its 20-year life, the Committee has never had to resort to a vote. That says a great deal for the consensus that we have been able to reach.

I am sorry to have left the Committee, but I now wear another hat in the Western European Union, and I could not do both jobs properly. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), who took the larger part of my old seat of Romsey and Waterside, has now taken my entire seat on the Committee. If anyone were ever to query the breadth of political view on the Committee, and felt that there was a cosy consensus because we were all of the same persuasion, they should consider the vast party political gulf between my hon. Friend on the right of our party and the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen) on the left wing of the Labour party. For a Committee with such a broad spectrum to reach a consensus says a great deal for its deliberations and for the way in which it is led.

The words in the Defence Committee report on the White Paper are singularly tough, and the message is damning. The MOD is constantly bowing to Treasury diktat. The Committee still has a great deal on its agenda—the question of overstretch will not go away. I am glad that at last Ministers at least acknowledge that overstretch exists and are using that word. Up until a couple of years ago, they would not do so. I am glad to say that recruitment is now improving somewhat, but retention is not. The net effect on our armed forces is bad.

Related to recruitment and retention are questions of morale, families, married quarters, leave, pay and working conditions, particularly for those on active service. We must somehow get out of this vicious circle. To lop 18,000 off our reserve numbers by cutting TA units was not the right thing to do. The knock-on effect is that we are beginning to lose cadet units, so it is becoming more difficult to get recruits because previously many of them served as cadets.

The picture in the RAF is not as rosy as the one that Secretary of State painted. The RAF is 95 fast jet pilots short, which is 20 per cent. of total requirement. That is not a particularly good picture. The Royal Navy is short of 15 jet pilots out of 64. The manpower situation is bad right across the board.

We all realise that budgetary problems remain and that there is still a running battle with the Treasury. I am sure that the Defence Committee will continue to look into efficiency savings and cutting wastage. I am sure that there is still room for savings to be made. We critically examined the figures supplied to us, and we questioned whether the £500 million target for savings year on year were, in fact, savings or were disguised cuts in the budget.

The figures speak for themselves. The total budget for 1999-2000 was minus 0.2 per cent.; it is minus 0.2 per cent. in real terms in 2000-01; and minus 3.8 per cent. in real terms in 2001-02, which will be only—I say only, but it is still bad—a 2.8 per cent. cut if the proposed sale of Defence Evaluation and Research Agency goes ahead. The sale of DERA is another matter that I am sure that the Committee will return to: we looked into it twice, reported on it twice, and have said clearly that the proposed part privatisation of DERA is a fundamentally flawed plan. Many of my hon. Friends have explained why, so I shall not waste the House's time on that.

I hope that we shall continue to engage in our one-day debate on procurement. Many hon. Members will have specific points to make about procurement issues, and they ought to be dealt with in a special debate. Procurement now takes up 40 per cent. of the defence budget, and the percentage is constantly growing. The inflation rate as it affects defence equipment is much higher than the inflation rate outside, as equipment becomes more technical and advanced. Whether some of the difficulty can be overcome by means of smart procurement remains to be seen, but I suspect that in many cases "smart procurement" merely means pushing the product to the right and delaying delivery, but in the long run that merely increases the price.

As a farmer, I am experiencing a crisis. I have postponed the purchase of a new combine because I cannot afford it this year. Indeed, I may not be able to afford it next year. I can stomach that, but when the defence of the realm is involved, it is no use pushing things to the right because the Treasury says that the money is not available for procurement purposes.

A report has been produced by a quadripartite Select Committee consisting of those representing defence, foreign affairs, trade and industry and overseas development. The Committee studied the whole question of defence sales—exports. We look forward to debating its report here because it touches on the issue of security of supply; it also raises the matter of the free-for-all world market in which we now operate following the collapse of the iron curtain.

The market out there is much tougher than it used to be. Given the drop in defence budgets, it is now very difficult to maintain the viability of our defence industries without commercial links with overseas companies. Therein lies the danger: again, it is a question of security of supply. I am all in favour of cross-frontier mergers, many of which will take place—indeed, are already taking place—in Europe and across the Atlantic. In studying the overall question of the restructuring of our defence industries, we must not lose sight of the fact that our staunchest ally on the defence front is the United States. It always has been and always will be, and NATO must remain the basis of our security.

The Committee is almost bound to consider a number of projects. There are the delays in the Bowman contract—the successor to Clansman—the new generation frigate, the heavy airlift project mentioned by a number of hon. Members, and the aircraft carriers. Do we really need two Goliath aircraft carriers costing £1 billion each? So far, we have not even decided what sort of aircraft will fly from them. Furthermore, there is the question of anti-ballistic missile defence.

The subject of defence medical services will certainly be revisited. The last Government made a mess of that: they cut defence medical services far more than they cut the armed forces generally. "Defence Cost Studies" No. 33 was a failure. The Select Committee criticised the last Government, and has criticised the present Government. The present Government are not off the hook: defence medical services will certainly be considered again.

The one thing that I welcomed today was what the Secretary of State said about the IRA's decommissioning of arms. He said that there was no truth in the talk of a national day of reconciliation. The word "equivalence", which has been used in the press, is not on, and, according to the Secretary of State, there is no gun swap plan. I am sure that everyone will welcome that.

The fact is that there have already been substantial reductions in the military presence in Northern Ireland. They began in 1995, with the previous ceasefire under a Conservative Administration. Thirty Army bases have been closed and the troop presence is the lowest since 1970. Long may that continue—but there needs to be movement on the part of the IRA. So far it has just been "take, take, take"; there must be much more of a balance.

A number of hon. Members have referred to our alliances, both transatlantic and in Europe. Hon. Members who serve on the Western European Union with me have already put down markers for future debate, but there is already a hot debate in Europe. I was always rather disparaging about the WEU until I was in it, found out what it did and recognised the importance of the WEU members which are not full members of the EU and NATO.

One has to acknowledge that NATO, which incorporates WEU members, has preserved the peace in Europe for the past 50 years and more. The cold war was won without a shot by NATO members, but, freed from the glue of totalitarianism, many countries of central and eastern Europe face instability and strife. There is a growing number of regional conflicts. The southern flank of NATO—the north coastline of Africa, the so-called soft underbelly of Europe—is a potential flashpoint.

The peace dividend following the end of the cold war was taken by the previous Government under "Options for Change", but many people argue that the peace dividend has been taken twice, if not more times. At the same time, Europe has found itself in a much more fluid security environment. We lamentably failed as Europeans to cope with the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia. Success in Bosnia and Kosovo came about only once they had become NATO operations involving American military resources.

The restructuring of European national defence forces, which began in 1989, coincided with a world recession. National budgets, particularly defence, were then reduced in order for some countries to meet the convergence criteria for economic and monetary union. That cut budgets even further. Some countries, particularly Belgium and Italy, will find it increasingly difficult to maintain the convergence criteria for EMU. No one has yet laid down the rules and criteria for failure of the euro. Some of us would like to see what those might be.

I should like to put it on the record that the combined WEU countries have 60 per cent. of NATO's population and two thirds of the alliance's forces, but spend only 40 per cent. of NATO's total defence budget. The German Government have cut their defence budget in real terms and the Austrians, believe it or not, spend less on defence than on the opera.

Although the WEU needs the right to use NATO—and that means United States—assets, the Americans rightly complain about our failure to carry a fairer burden of the cost of collective security. WEU members combined spend $170 billion per annum. The United States spends $270 billion a year and Congress has just voted an increase of about 10 per cent. in the defence budget. Wherever we look on the European scene, we seem to be cutting our defence budgets. The United States defence capability has a global reach; it extends not just to Europe. It spends 3 to 4 per cent. of gross domestic product on defence, while the WEU average is only 2.2 per cent. and falling.

The Secretary of State made the point that the quality of the spend is important; it is not necessarily the quantity. To some extent he is right, so military credibility is the other related issue to defence budgets. For example, the United States provided 80 per cent. of the aircraft that were used in the recent Kosovo campaign. I was in Oslo the other day, and the Norwegians told me that they had sent six F16s to Kosovo for the campaign. Unfortunately, they were all grounded because they were inoperable—so the quality of the product is important.

The United States Defence Secretary described that fact as embarrassing. The Washington Post was even blunter, saying that it would take the Europeans two decades to catch up with the Americans in terms of credibility,

"even if they had the money—and the will to spend it".

Security and defence must remain the prime responsibility of national Governments, accountable to their own Parliaments, but in association with allies for collective strength. Although the treaty of Rome had its genesis in the desire to maintain security and peace in Europe through a common market, the 1992 Maastricht treaty was the first specifically to deal with security—in article 13, which has been quoted by many hon. Members.

Subsequently, however, in October 1997—after the Government had come to power—the Amsterdam treaty enabled the common foreign and security policy to develop by closer co-operation between the EU, WEU and NATO under the combined joint task forces concept, in which NATO-assigned assets were to be made available to the WEU for limited military operations consisting of humanitarian intervention, crisis management and peacekeeping—which are commonly known as the Petersberg tasks. It also introduced the principle of majority voting and proposed a central policy planning unit.

On 3-4 September 1998, the Anglo-French St. Malo declaration gave further impetus to the strengthening of a European defence identity. Subsequently, in April 1999, the NATO 50th anniversary summit in Washington gave still further support to a CFSP, essentially by moving the alliance to a new direct relationship with the EU that it currently holds with the WEU. After Washington, the likelihood of the WEU's role being absorbed into the EU increased significantly.

At the Cologne summit in June 1999, the CFSP took an even more tangible form with the appointment of Mr. Solana as the European Commission's first high representative for foreign and security policy. Cologne also reiterated the EU's commitment and determination to develop the capacity to undertake the Petersberg tasks, and concluded that, if progress was made, the WEU would have completed its purpose by the end of 2000. It was about then that the alarm signals really started ringing loud and we began to think not only about how that organisation could be preserved, but whether it should be preserved.

I think that there are five options for change for the WEU. The first is to reorganise and revitalise the WEU by creating a more distinct and capable European security and defence identity within NATO. The second is to merge the WEU with the EU as a fourth pillar. Giving the WEU a permanent mandate to act on behalf of the EU could enable Europe to act more efficiently.

The third option is to merge the WEU's political and security responsibilities with the EU, and its military responsibilities with NATO. The fourth is to merge the WEU with the EU, but without the article 5 mutual security obligations of the modified Brussels treaty.

The final option is to merge the WEU with the CFSP—which is the European Union's second pillar—thereby giving it defence as well as foreign policy responsibilities. The only option that is not open to us is to do absolutely nothing.

The first option seems to stand the greatest chance of success. It uses existing structures as the basis for European security and defence identity within NATO, and it is important that those structures should remain within NATO. It is also intergovernmental, so that no fourth pillar would be required. It retains the WEU Assembly, including the WEU family of 28 European non-NATO nations, bringing eastern and central European countries into a European defence institution for democratic scrutiny. As hon. Members have already said, the ability to retain within the WEU those countries that are not yet NATO members and not members of the European Union is absolutely vital. To lose that feature would be disaster.

Another feature of the first option, which I hope that the Government will follow, is that it retains article 5—the mutual security obligation—of the modified Brussels treaty. I believe that article 5 presents serious problems for those countries—Ireland, Austria, Sweden and Finland—that are EU members but not NATO members. If the WEU were absorbed completely within the EU, that mutual security obligation would apply to them. However, many of those countries have long histories of military neutrality and would not be able to fulfil that obligation.

There is a great deal of debate in this field and the jury is certainly out on a resolution. In addition, we are receiving very mixed signals from the Government. The previous Secretary of State for Defence, now Lord Robertson, said one thing from the Front Bench in answer to questions from me, but the Prime Minister said something different in St. Malo. The position is confused even further by the White Paper.

In conclusion, I remind the House that the defence of the realm is the paramount responsibility of any Government. Defence policy cannot be determined by Treasury diktat. The Secretary of State inherited a bad hand of cards from his predecessor, but he now has the opportunity to demonstrate whether he is a man or a mouse. Will he stand up to the Treasury and demonstrate Britain's lead in Europe by reversing the damaging cuts in the defence budget? We owe that to our armed forces, which remain the best in the world.

Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow): I start by paying tribute to British service men all over the world who deserve the praise of our citizens for their dedication, courage and professionalism. As conflicts throughout the world are now brought into people's front rooms, it must be horrific for the families of those serving in those arenas to see them almost at first hand. Having briefly taken part in operations in Spain and Norway as part of the armed forces parliamentary scheme, I stress how great that scheme is for right hon. and hon. Members who may have no military experience. It also gives us a great deal of confidence in the physical and mental capacity of our soldiers to participate in any conflict.

I also pay tribute to the workers who prepare the kit on which our armed forces rely so much in the field of battle or in any conflict. In the north-east there are a host of such industries, involved in the manufacture of everything from tanks to ammunition supplies.

Today I should like to refer specifically to the shipbuilding and ship repair sector that is based on the Tyne, as the White Paper holds so much hope for its future prosperity. The yards worked round the clock to prepare the task force that was sent to the Falklands. They also built the Cardiff, the Exeter and the York, which served so gallantly in the Gulf, and the Newcastle and the Coventry which are currently serving in Kosovo.

Chapter 3 of the White Paper, entitled "The Front Line—Maximising Capability", identifies key deployment weaknesses that limit our capability to get our forces quickly and effectively to areas of conflict. At present, we cannot deploy our forces to scenes of conflict quickly enough to accord with our new role in the changing world of defence and the requirements in the White Paper.

The White Paper also identifies the need for six roll on/roll off ships to satisfy the need for rapid deployment, in line with our role in the new world order. The MOD has accordingly decided to embark on a private finance initiative arrangement to finance those ships. As a result, tenders have been invited from yards in Europe and the far east as well as those in the UK. I have several points to make on that.

First, if it is not too late, will my hon. Friend the Minister reconsider embarking on a PFI arrangement in respect of the roll on/roll off vessels? I am not against PFIs in principle. If one is going into hospital on a stretcher, one does not ask whether it is funded under a PFI; one wants the best care available. However, in this case I believe that it would be more efficient for the UK economy if an order were placed with a UK yard and the ships were then leased to the private sector—in a similar, but not identical way to the Atlantic Conveyor.

Although the initial costs would be higher, they could be clawed back later through the leasing agreement with the private sector. In addition, the Treasury would benefit from the tax paid by the workers and by the company on its profit. The local economy would benefit from the buying power of the workers and the company and the Government would make savings on the benefit that would have to be paid to the workers if the contract went to a foreign yard.

If the PFI option is the route that Ministers choose, it is only right that they should ensure a level playing field, or as it is called now, an equal competitive environment. Several hon. Members have already voiced concerns about collusion between foreign Governments and firms at the expense of UK companies. To say the least, creative accounting is practised in Europe and the far east, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will bear that point in mind when he considers the results of the tendering process for the roll on/roll off vessels. We need an equal competitive environment to protect the interests of British companies and British workers.

My constituency contains the Cammell Laird shipyard, which is part of one of the consortiums bidding for the roll on/roll off order. If Cammell Laird is successful, the order will provide new employment for 1,500 workers. Wages alone from those workers would inject around £650,000 a week into the local economy, not to mention the knock-on effect of a further 1,500 jobs in local supporting businesses. Placing the order with Cammell Laird would not only make sound economic sense for the Ministry of Defence, but would ensure that a strategically important industry—the shipbuilding industry on Tyneside—was protected.

The White Paper specifies:

> "Central to our defence vision is that we should be able to transport the Armed Forces quickly and securely to where they are needed, when they are needed."

I understand that a decision is imminent to proceed on the alternative landing ships, which play a major role in the aims of the White Paper. Those ships are required to replace ships that are now 30 years old, and they are vital to the UK's defence and to the new humanitarian role we are expected to play.

Although Swan Hunter's shipyard is not in my constituency, it plays a vital role in the Tyneside and north-east economy. Significant numbers of my constituents work at Swan Hunter, which is about to submit a bid for the alternative landing ship work. If Swan Hunter is successful, up to 2,000 manufacturing jobs would be provided for the local economy, as well as at least another 500 knock-on jobs in the Tyneside area. Possibly even more important would be the opportunity to secure training for 100 apprentices. The average age of skilled workers on the Tyne is now 48, and the training of new workers is important for the economy, and strategically, to secure a future for the industry and the work force.

I welcome the White Paper, especially its procurement aspects, because it holds out hope for many UK workers who are working all over the world and want to work in home-based domestic industries to provide goods for the British defence industry. I ask the Minister to contemplate several points. First, shipbuilding and ship repair are vital to the UK economy and to the strategic defence of our country, as we have found out on several occasions in the past. Secondly, it is important that the MOD release the orders it is sitting on. Workers are waiting for work, companies are waiting to develop orders and the troops are waiting for the results to carry out their role effectively on the new defence world stage.

Thirdly, the Government need to create an equal competitive environment for our firms to compete against foreign competition. Fourthly, the orders need to be placed more consistently. At present, it is famine or feast. Either there is no work and people are laid off for their skills to get rusty, or work comes in and wages go up because skilled workers are not available in sufficient numbers. Finally, if shipbuilding is supposed to be a sunset industry, why are the sunrise economies in the far east so determined to protect their shipbuilding industries for defence purposes?

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn) ended his speech on the very important theme to which I shall devote most of my remarks. He spoke of the factors that sustain and maintain the United Kingdom's defence-industrial base. My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) also touched on that matter in his excellent speech. I have enjoyed listening to my hon. Friend speak on these matters on a number of occasions, and his knowledge shines through.

My hon. Friend pointed out that 40 per cent. of our defence budget now goes on procurement. As is right and proper, I pay tribute to the work of our fighting forces, but it is equally important to pay tribute, as the hon. Member for Jarrow did, to those working in our defence-industrial base. Without their ingenuity, inventiveness and outright skills we would not be able to talk in such glowing terms about the role of our defence forces, as they would not have equipment of the necessary quality. That equipment comes from United Kingdom, European and transatlantic sources, but essentially our forces depend on British expertise.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey spoke about sustaining and maintaining our alliances with the United States, but although the United States is our closest ally, in procurement terms it is one of our fiercest competitors. When developing a strategy that is right for the United Kingdom and European defence industry, we must ensure that we do not forget that our transatlantic partnership is not an antidote to American competition.

The words used in any defence White Paper are always intriguing, but so are the photographs. Opposite page 10 is a picture of the 50th NATO summit, which was held in Washington between 23 and 25 April last year. When I first looked at it I thought that the photograph was a perfect symbol of the alliance—until I noticed that it lacked a British Prime Minister. I looked very hard, but I could not find one. I began to wonder what symbolic significance the absence of our Prime Minister might have. Did it have something to do with an each-way bet between NATO and the European defence identity, about which there has been comment earlier in the debate?

However, the photograph must have passed through the scrutiny of Mr. Alastair Campbell and been sneaked into the White Paper. In any case, our Prime Minister—who represents a country that has always been at the heart of NATO—does not appear in the photograph. That is worth pondering.

The question of resources for our armed forces has been at the heart of this debate. Two telling tables appear in the Ministry of Defence's performance report for 1998-99, published in December. The first, on page 29, shows defence expenditure as a percentage of gross domestic product. United Kingdom defence expenditure in 1998 is recorded at 2.6 per cent. of GDP, compared with France's 2.8 per cent. and the United States' 3.2 per cent. I am worried that we are allowing our defence expenditure as a percentage of GDP to fall too low, given the job that our armed forces are asked to do.

Some people may say that it is easy to talk about spending more money, but the United Kingdom has never been backward about taking difficult defence decisions. Someone has to be resolute, and if the United Kingdom is going to play that role, it is as well to be well resourced.

Page 30 of the MOD performance report contains a graph showing per capita defence expenditure. Strangely, the table is expressed in terms of US dollars. It shows that the United Kingdom spent $617 per head in 1998. That total was exceeded by Norway, Sweden and—not surprisingly—by the United States, with Greece close behind with per capita expenditure of $571. Those figures illustrate that we are getting very near the bone when it comes to resources.

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): I am listening to the right hon. Gentleman's speech with great interest. For the purposes of discussion and clarity, could he identify where he would like United Kingdom defence expenditure to go in terms of its proportion of gross domestic product? Is it one tenth of 1 per cent. higher, is it in line with the French model; or if not, which country's example would he like to see us commit ourselves to?

Mr. Jack: It is important to consider the overall strategic demands on our forces and the equipment that we deem that we need, and then decide whether we can afford it. It depends on budgeting. Do we start with a cake of a given size and attempt to cut it into ever smaller portions, or do we recognise that the cake needs to be expanded? The purpose of a debate such as this is not to put Back-Bench Opposition Members on the spot to answer such detailed questions, but to determine in principle whether the cake is too big or too small. Much has rightly been said about the report by the Select Committee on Defence, which I think answers the hon. Gentleman's question very clearly. According to that, the cake is too small and it is being cut into ever smaller slices, which does not enable our forces to be properly equipped for the job that they have to do.

The central theme of the Secretary of State's remarks was modernisation. While he was speaking about that, I wrote down "but on an ever-reducing budget", something that he did not have the courage to say. At the same time as making ever-increasing demands on our forces, as typified by the word "overstretch", we must recognise that there is a resourcing issue to be addressed.

I should like to say, en passant, that I wish we could get back to talking in straightforward language about defence matters. In his speech, the Secretary of State mentioned the buzz phrases "security architecture" and "strategic landscapes". I do not think that they add a great deal and they do not clarify what is in the minds of Ministers.

When the Secretary of State talked about the smart procurement exercise, he mentioned the cost savings on Eurofighter, which is under construction by BAE Systems in my constituency. The United Kingdom has led the way in the project in making it affordable for Europe's air forces. I was intrigued to know whether the savings of £1.8 billion will be redeployed as net extra capital; or has that already been written into the Secretary of State's long-term expenditure plans, so that to sustain the present position, he must make savings of that order?

I was disappointed that the Secretary of State did not develop in a little more detail the rather sparse paragraphs at the start of the White Paper dealing with the strategic overview of the Government's policy on defence in relation to foreign policy. Some of my hon. Friends have touched on those points and I shall not elaborate on them at length. But the world changes; the threat changes. I had hoped to have a more detailed assessment of how that threat is seen and where the priorities are so that we could judge with greater clarity whether the Government have hit the button regarding defence expenditure, and discern their strategic view.

The other point that was missing in substance from the Secretary of State's speech was anything much about procurement. It is noteworthy that it has taken contributions from Back-Bench Members on both sides of the House to tease out from the Government some key procurement issues. My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey is right to say that he would welcome a further debate on this subject. However, as we do not have one, we must make best use of the time available to us today to discuss these matters. They are about sustaining, maintaining and developing the industrial base that is represented by companies such as BAE Systems. It employs 6,000 people in my constituency, and in the north-west some 40,000 jobs depend on the success of the aerospace industry, much of it driven by defence considerations.

Although there are proper discussions about the relationship between NATO, the European defence identity and the transatlantic alliance, an answer to a recent parliamentary question from the new Defence Minister shows that 44 collaborative projects involve European allies. They range from projects on missiles to aircraft and sea-based systems—it is almost an Aladdin's cave of projects, which illustrates clearly the crucial role of co-operation and co-operative ventures. Much as some people like to think that we can be totally self-sufficient, that answer gave a totally different view.

Some procurement projects have been touched on, but I support those who have called for—as the White Paper did—a swift resolution of what air system will be deployed for strategic lift. I am a supporter of the A400M. It seems to make eminent sense that Europe should not only develop that capability itself but should give itself the opportunity to take a share of the lucrative market that will present itself in years to come as Hercules aircraft come up for replacement. I was pleased that the Secretary of State used the word "soon" when he was talking about the decision on strategic lift.

I draw the Minister's attention to an item that appeared on the BAE Systems website with the heading, "Government doubles its money as Airbus loan repaid". That illustrates clearly that Airbus, as well as being good for Europe's technology base, is good for Government business. Giving it the contract to produce the A400M seems to play to that tune. In the Defence debate last year, I described how the A340 aircraft had been delivered on time as a design to build for delivery to airlines, which trusted Airbus's ability to produce what they wanted. The same arguments can be deployed in respect of the A400M.

We should not also have to justify the contract in terms of jobs, but about 62,000 would depend on it indirectly. The industry already provides those jobs and 10,000 United Kingdom jobs are directly attributed to that exercise.

The aircraft is eminently well specified. It meets the staff requirement for heavy lift and it would certainly give us independence with our own strategic capacity, as well as a real commercial opportunity. I hope that what the Secretary of State means by "soon" is in the next few weeks.

Labour Members have pointed out that we seem to go from feast to famine with procurement exercises, which is true. There has been no mention from the Government of equipment for the Eurofighter beyond the visual range air-to-air missiles. That is another crucial question on which a decision is needed. There is no mention of the matter in the White Paper. Given the technology involved, if we are to have a weapons system that is properly defined for Europe's own fighter and is not dependent on diktat from the United States, in the event that the Government go the US route they will not only buy an inferior product but will risk the strategic opportunity of sales of the Eurofighter Typhoon to nations other than Norway outside Europe—although I am delighted that that country has shown an interest in the aircraft.

I do not knock the United States deliberately because it is playing a key part in providing the airborne avionics and radar systems for the Nimrod project. However, I visited Congress and the Senate in July, when they were playing games with the F22. Even internally, they can switch key defence projects on and off, and they could do exactly the same with the external use of that technology. We must be wary of that when we consider that missile system.

I was disappointed that the Secretary of State chose to say nothing either about Britain's role in the joint strike fighter project or the future offensive air system. The joint strike fighter offers us a major opportunity to participate in future technologies that will replace the Harrier aircraft. It will give us a chance to develop relationships with our American partners and the American industrial base. It has the potential for orders for the aircraft in the UK, but the Minister and, indeed, the White Paper remain silent on the subject.

The White Paper devotes only a few lines to the future offensive air system. However, no more important project is under consideration. Within FOAS lies the development of the solutions, the technologies and, eventually, the products that will be the seed corn for our future technological independence in Europe.

When the Minister winds up, it would be nice if he could talk about how the Government view that project. It is being run on smart procurement lines. It is a pleasure to visit Warton, to see all those companies and countries—Germany, France, Sweden and others—working under the same roof. Government and enterprise are working together. It is a tremendous project which merited more than one line in the White Paper. That did not demonstrate the importance that I and, indeed BAE Systems, attach to it.

The project illustrates the nature of the defensive threat that we face. When I asked, "Why FOAS?", I was told that we live in a world of uncertainty, where the target may be unplanned. The targets may all be different—they could be mobile. We have seen the growth of nuclear and other missile technologies. The challenge to our future systems is great. FOAS will provide us with a technological deterrent that matches NATO's organisational deterrent. Other people must fear what will be inflicted on them if they take on the western alliance. FOAS is crucial to maintaining technological deterrence.

These subjects are all important to BAE Systems and to the UK defence industry; they reflect on the comment in the White Paper that we are increasingly likely to face new and often unexpected operational challenges. Only by sustaining and maintaining that technology base can we cope in a world that requires tremendous mobility and agility, and the ability to deal, on occasion, with an uncertain threat.

5.43 pm

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): I am delighted to participate in this important debate. Unlike other hon. Members, I have no particular military expertise, nor do I want to champion any specific spending project in the SDR or the White Paper.

My only experience of the armed forces was as the first graduate of the 1997 intake on the armed forces parliamentary scheme, through the Royal Navy. That gave me a limited understanding of the challenges that face our men and women in the Navy and in the other armed forces.

My other experience of military service was trying to avoid it. I grew up in South Africa during the apartheid years, when it was compulsory for all white, able-bodied men, at the age of 18, to join the South African army and to do their damnedest for that regime. That was not something to which I took kindly—hence my Scottish accent. I have the South African army to thank for that.

I shall concentrate on four matters. First, the need for defence policy not to be led by constituency demands—or rather, that it should not be led by anything other than our foreign policy. Secondly, I shall refer much more briefly to the need for mobile armed forces. Thirdly, I shall mention the importance of Europe and European co-operation and, finally, I shall make a brief comment about procurement issues.

It is essential that all decisions about our armed forces and defence are based on our foreign policy. Our foreign policy should not be determined primarily by our defence capability; it should be the other way round whenever possible. This country, as a former colonial power, will I hope—I do not think that this is overly naive—enter a period in which it has considerable influence in the world. Some people may wish to make churlish party political points about that, but Britain has an opportunity, with the correct leadership, to have an influence that is way beyond our size, population and, possibly, beyond our spend on military hardware.

That is partly as a result of our historical friendship and relationship with the United States of America, and largely because we shall, hopefully, play a positive role in the military and defence debates in the European Union. I also hope that it is because of our relationship, as a former colonial power, with our Commonwealth friends. Perhaps, unlike any other nation, we are able to exert such influence throughout the world.

The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) alluded to the speech that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made in Chicago about a year ago. My right hon. Friend said that, when dictatorships prevail, we have a moral imperative to become involved. He considered that that was important to the United Kingdom and to protect those who are vulnerable. The question for foreign policy is how we turn that moral imperative into reality. That means examining our structures, military kit and the people whom we put on the front line to see whether we can provide the correct framework and the correct decision making to put that moral imperative into action.

Many comments have been made about how our humanitarian support has worked in the past in Montserrat and elsewhere. We have also mounted peace support operations, such as that in East Timor, where HMS Glasgow and others have helped the Australian-led force, and we have engaged in conflict resolution in its widest possible sense. For example, the notes attached to the White Paper identify that a British team is helping with conflict resolution of a different sort in South Africa. It is trying to bring about national reconciliation in the armed forces by creating a national defence force that integrates the South African defence force of the apartheid era and the liberation army, Umkhonto we Sizwe, of the African National Congress. Such a defence force would represent the whole country and would remove the lack of faith towards the South African defence forces that was understandably and rightly felt by the majority of the population. I am pleased that a British defence training team is playing a role in that.

The more substantial issue about conflict resolution, however, is about our right, as members of the European Union, the Western European Union, the United Nations and NATO, to take the moral imperative and to turn it into action. I do not want to be deliberately controversial, but I wish to express a firm belief. In recent speeches, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Kofi Annan, has talked about the redefinition of state sovereignty and the globalisation of regional conflicts. The sovereignty of an individual state is not an excuse to protect a dictator or tyrant who oppresses an indigenous population. Increasingly, regional action—perhaps with a UN mandate—might be the means by which some regional conflicts can be overcome. I hope that the Minister will have time to deal with that in his wind-up.

There are conflicts throughout the world, and perhaps none is more bloody than the one in Angola. I have long argued for UN backing for a regional force, and I would be delighted if the Government used whatever weight they have to try to bring that about. The slaughter in Angola, which is almost unrestricted and is not spoken of, is a blight on that continent.

In his Ditchley speech of June 1998, the Secretary-General of the United Nations said:

"State frontiers should no longer be seen as watertight protection for war criminals or mass murderers".

That has to form part of the context in which we debate defence issues, because if we accept that there should be no hiding place for tyrants within national borders, that has an impact on our defence policy. We will have to build a defence structure, purchase and invest in the necessary kit, and train our brilliant armed forces personnel to deliver on that foreign policy objective.

Thankfully, in the main, conflicts will no longer come to our forces. They will have to travel, hopefully considerable distances, to the point of conflict or theatre. I say "hopefully" because if the trouble is not coming to our armed forces, equally it is not coming to our civilian population. The White Paper makes much of that point, but there is always more that can and should be done to increase the agility, adaptability and mobility of our armed forces.

Much is said in the White Paper about power projection and investment in the two new aircraft carriers, but I should like there to be an even greater emphasis, if possible, on rapid reaction. Once a decision is taken in an international forum, sometimes after consensus has laboriously been achieved, we find that the international military hardware is unable to be deployed and the process of delivering a threat and projecting power is delayed.

There must also be a projection of humanitarian support. I do not think that it is uncharitable of me to say that I was disappointed that, in his almost hour-long speech, the shadow Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green, made very little mention of the British armed forces' role in providing humanitarian aid. That is a fair criticism.

I am not a specialist on European issues. The hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) eloquently listed the different options for the methods and mechanics of achieving synergy between NATO, the EU and the WEU, and I listened to his comments with great interest. I believe that, as a matter of principle, it is absolutely Europe's responsibility to take control of more of its own destiny. There are no circumstances in which we should rely extensively on the United States. America is often criticised, sometimes with reason.

We should not underestimate the role that the US has played, but we should try where possible to achieve a European solution to problems that are European in the wider sense of the continent, and not rely on the US to the extent that we did in Kosovo and other conflicts. That means having a joint rapid reaction force and the political and military structures to back that up.

Finally, I turn to defence procurement. My hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn) talked about six roll on-roll off ferries, and I do not want to compete with him. He made a powerful case for the building to take place in or near his constituency. However, the River Clyde area contains excellent shipbuilding facilities and talented personnel; my own father has worked there for several years. The River Clyde has a proud history of shipbuilding and it could have a bright future if the contract for the six ro-ro ferries were awarded in the area.

With those comments, I broadly endorse the contents of the defence White Paper.

5.55 pm

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I shall pursue several of the points raised by the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy), but first I should like to put on the record my support for his congratulating our armed forces on their work in humanitarian aid projects throughout the world. The House and the country can rightly take a degree of pride in the quality of our armed forces' work, which is internationally recognised.

In a debate as important as this, about the national security of the United Kingdom, the starting point must be the threat assessment. The Secretary of State was relatively silent on that matter, but the White Paper is, for this Government, fairly clear. One of the first questions we must ask is whether Her Majesty's Government believe that the world is becoming safer or more dangerous. Paragraph 7 mentions the Government's attention focusing, as long as two years ago at the time of the strategic defence review, on "the consequences of the break-up of states, and on ethnic and religious conflict, population and environmental pressures, competition for scarce resources, on the effects of illegal drugs, terrorism and crime. Nothing in the past two years has changed that assessment."

The Government add that recent events have, if anything, "reinforced some of our concerns".

That would lead the House to the belief that the Government take the view that the world in which we live is becoming, if not more dangerous, at least no safer.

We then have to ask what that means in terms of the strength of our armed forces. The Government set out explicitly their views on what Europe as a whole should be doing. In paragraph 17 of the White Paper, they talk about the need for burden sharing in terms similar to those employed by the hon. Member for Eastwood, adding that

"Above all, this means strengthening European nations' armed forces."

Logically, one would conclude that we are debating a White Paper issued by a Government who are increasing defence spending in the light of their threat assessment and of the homily they have delivered to other European nations. However, that is not what the Government are doing. On the contrary, since they came to power in 1997, they have set in train a sequence of defence reductions. The details have been supplied by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) and I do not intend to repeat them.

There appears to be a degree of inconsistency in the Government's approach. There is something rather charming about the way in which the Prime Minister lectures our fellow members of the European Union on the need to reduce bureaucracy when he is increasing it at home, to cut taxes when he is putting those up, and to reduce trade union power when he is doing the opposite in the United Kingdom. Now, on defence matters, he is telling everyone else in Europe that they should strengthen their armed forces when he is weakening those of the UK. The best one can say of that strategy is that it is inconsistent.

We then focus our attention on the Government's assessment of some of the fundamental questions facing our country. It is notable that in the debate so far, not a single reference has been made to the independent British nuclear deterrent. That would appear curious to anyone whose memory stretches back to the 1980s, when that was a central issue. One wonders whether the reason for its absence from the debate is that Her Majesty's Government think that there are no nuclear issues to address. In paragraph 8 of the White Paper, they say that they conclude, as they did at the time of the strategic defence review, that

I imagine that some Labour Members will find that assessment exciting, because they believe that it means that an independent British nuclear deterrent is no longer needed. However, Her Majesty's Government—I give them credit for this—appear to believe that we should retain Trident, in case such a threat should emerge in the future.

However, the context of paragraph 8 is the debate about active defence against ballistic missiles. My hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), the shadow Secretary of State for Defence, spoke eloquently about that. He put to the Government—we await a response, and I hope that the Minister will respond in some detail—the assessment made to the United States Senate two years ago that proliferation of ballistic missile technology is likely to evolve by 2003 to the point where intercontinental ballistic missiles could threaten the continental United States.

If rogue states can threaten the continental United States, one does not have to be a master of geography to work out that probably at least by that date, if not earlier, some of those rogue states, which are geographically much closer to the United Kingdom than to the continental United States, could threaten the UK. We need to know the Government's view on ballistic missile defence. If it is the Government's policy—I very much hope that it is—to maintain an independent British nuclear deterrent, on the basis that although there may not be a ballistic missile threat to the UK now, one may evolve, what is their position on ballistic missile defence?

Will the Government take the same view as the United States that if that technology is available, it should be deployed? Will they take the view, which seems to be the majority view among our European partners, that for some reason such a ballistic missile defence would be undesirable? Will they take the worst of all positions, which was accurately described in an excellent speech by the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife (Mr. Campbell), and pretend that the issue simply will not arise, hoping that it will go away?

I can tell Ministers on the Treasury Bench that the problem will not go away. Anyone watching the presidential debates on either side of the political divide in the US will see that it is a live issue there. All four front-running presidential candidates, both Democrat and Republican, have made it clear that they must address the issue. It is highly likely to arise, whoever succeeds President Clinton and whichever party controls Congress after the November elections this year.

We need to hear the Government's view. Has it moved on in the past couple of months? When do they expect to announce their conclusions? When can we begin to hear the UK Government's view on the matter?

I refer again to the excellent speech from the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife. If I may say so in his absence, it was a speech of such fine quality that it underlines how fortunate all other parties are that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is not leader of his party, and instead it is the pale shadow of the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) who holds the leadership.

The right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife went through the list of rogue states and seemed to conclude that, because there had been some positive political developments in the case of some—he referred to the recent Iranian elections and the re-establishment of diplomatic relations with Libya, for example—we need not concern ourselves with the threat.

One of the central tenets of sensible strategic thinking is that capabilities may take years to build, but intentions can change overnight. A regime that is friendly at present may rapidly turn into one that is unfriendly. It is the duty of any Government of this country to put in place capabilities to deal not only with the expected, but with the unexpected threat.

Our fear is that the Government's defence policy is so constrained by the Treasury that they run the risk of repeating the fundamental mistake of the 1920s, when the Treasury imposed the so-called 10-year rule—

Mr. Spellar: Which party was in government?

Mr. Collins: A Labour Government were in power at various times during the 1920s. If the Minister wants to review history, may I point out that it was not the Conservative party whose conference celebrated the entry to power of Chancellor Adolf Hitler by passing a resolution calling for the unilateral abolition of the Royal Air Force? The Labour party did that. Perhaps the Minister would prefer not to go through history.

The mistake to which I referred was the assessment imposed by the Treasury on Governments of different political colours in the 1920s that there would be no conflict for 10 years. That rule was not abolished until 1934, only five years before conflict returned to Europe. We must guard against Treasury-driven defence policy. It is a recipe for disaster, and it would not be sensible to proceed down that road.

We must be clear about the Government's view of the European defence initiative. Paragraph 20 of the White Paper states:

"This is not a European Army."

That is a clear statement. Unfortunately, as we heard earlier in the debate, it is not endorsed by the President of the Commission, who makes it clear that we are considering a European army. It is also clear that other—although not all—member states support the concept of a European army. Will the Government make it clear that they will veto the establishment of a European army?

Some Labour Back Benchers claim that the Prime Minister has made that clear. The Prime Minister said many things on the subject. As we heard earlier, in 1997, he said that he opposed any integration of the Western European Union into the European Union. An assurance from the Prime Minister is therefore not good enough. The Government should make repeated, regular policy statements because they are likely to change their policies when the House's back is turned.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I entreat my hon. Friend not to forget that the Labour party is capable of simultaneously expressing one policy in Downing street and another in the House. That happened when the Prime Minister was briefing in Downing street while the former Secretary of State, Lord Robertson, said something completely different in the Chamber.

Mr. Collins: Absolutely. My hon. Friend reminds us of yet another instance of this Administration's unreliability. That is why we would welcome some clear assurances from the Minister.

We need to know whether the Government agree with the view of the President of France, whom my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green quoted earlier, that we are creating a multi-polar world and that the European dimension means creating such a world. We might as well be candid and explicit: NATO is founded on the assumption of United States strategic leadership, and on the basis that European nations benefit from active US involvement in their affairs. It is clear from the lessons of history that when the US, through its own impetus or being pushed out, is not active in European affairs, as happened in the 1920s and 1930s, we all suffer tremendously.

We cannot have a multi-polar world, with the clear implication that the US forms one pole and Europe another, and claim that we are simply considering the evolution of different forms of co-operation. We are considering moving towards a position in which the US is on the same footing as Russia, as a different pole, and possibly a future rival. At best, the US would be a strategic partner, but it would not be the ally and a strategic leader that it is in NATO.

A Labour Government created NATO; it was probably the finest creation of that Administration, who had an outstanding Foreign Secretary in Ernest Bevin. Labour Members should therefore not find it difficult to appreciate the importance of Ernest Bevin's achievement in bringing the US into Europe on a basis that gave it clear and unequivocal strategic leadership. The Americans will not be involved in Europe on any other basis, which is why they insist on providing the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe. We have a choice between American leadership or American rivalry. We must avoid the idea that we can reach a compromise. The French do not want to do that. Since 1966, the objective of the French has been to move themselves and much of the rest of Europe further away from America.

In 1998 and 1999, the Prime Minister may have believed that he would be the first British political leader in 33 years to bring the French closer into NATO. However, as matters have evolved, it is clear that the British are not driving the French into the welcoming arms of NATO, but that, if we are not careful, the French will drive the British from close partnership and American leadership in NATO to a different, far less reliable and less safe position.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend rightly points out that penetrating the darker recesses of the Prime Minister's mind is a difficult task. Does he agree that the nub of the problem is the Prime Minister's hubris in supposing that he can play along with the philosophy of common European defence in the hope and expectation that he will be able to avoid its worst excesses?

Mr. Collins: I bow to my hon. Friend in his knowledge of the Prime Minister's hubris, which I am sure is very great.

I have a final, constituency point to make. In response to my intervention, I was delighted to receive from the Secretary of State the categoric assurance that safety relating to low-flying aircraft over my constituency in Cumbria and elsewhere would not be compromised in any circumstances. I hope that all my parliamentary questions on the quantity and quality of spending on RAF maintenance of aircraft, which were tabled a few weeks ago, will be answered soon. Some have been, but others were dealt with by an undertaking to write to me. I have yet to receive a letter on that point and look forward to doing so.

I would like the Minister—either in correspondence or during the debate—to tackle the key points that my constituents have put to me. First, why do the Germans undertake a great deal of low-flying training in the United States, while British pilots train in their own country? Secondly, given that the RAF has tended to fly high in operational circumstances in recent military operations—particularly, but not exclusively, over Kosovo—is it necessary to undertake as much low-flying training? The amount seems to have been dictated by the assumptions of the 1980s and 1990s.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I shall make a truncated speech to the amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and my hon. Friends the Members for Islington, North (Mr Corbyn), for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. McDonnell), for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson), for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) and for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), which appears on the Order Paper. It represents a strand of opinion, at any rate. My request is that, before Monday, Madam Speaker seriously reflects on whether she can select an amendment that represents the views of many people, right or wrong.

My first point relates to Iraq. There is bombing day after day. Denis Halliday, Hans van Sponeck and now Jutta Burghardt—the United Nations representatives in Iraq—have resigned on matters of principle. I cannot help noticing that there is no Defence Minister on the Treasury Bench. It is extraordinary that the Secretary of State finds it more important to do other things than attend the House of Commons on the first day of the defence debate. When I was first elected, Peter Thorneycroft and others regarded it as their top priority, whatever Cabinet Committees they were involved in, to attend the House for the two-day defence debate. What has become of the importance of Parliament? One would have thought that Defence Ministers could be present.

I referred to Iraq. How are those continual flights meant to find chemical weapons, if the Iraqis have them? As the amendment says, there have been attacks on shepherd civilians. That is a matter of fact. It might be argued that the flights are being undertaken to protect the Marsh Arabs or the Shi'a, but I saw the marshes with my own eyes and they did not correspond with the aerial pictures produced by the Ministry of Defence.

Secondly, the amendment refers to Yugoslavia. The fact of the matter is that anyone who goes to Belgrade or Novi Sad, let alone Zastava, knows that people are determined to carry on fighting. That means that Bosnia, and certainly Kosovo, have become United Nations protectorates possibly for the lifetime not of the more senior of us, but of the youngest among us. That must be taken into account in any military deployment. I was against intervention in the first place, but now that we are there we cannot up and leave. There must also be the presence of heavy armour. I for one would not sit on green Benches and allow British troops to be in that position without heavy armour to protect them from becoming hostages of people who have certainly not forgotten the fight.

The third part of the amendment refers to the UN charter. Someone must answer Mark Littman QC, who argued powerfully that what was done was illegal.

The fourth point concerns the House of Commons. If there had been the usual parliamentary debate that was obligatory in yesteryear—I am no admirer of Mrs. Thatcher, but at least Parliament was reassembled to discuss the Falklands—there would not have been the mess that the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) described, and that the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) may well describe next Monday, having just returned from the area.

The amendment reads:

"declines to approve a defence policy which has been used to make war upon innocent civilians in Iraq and Yugoslavia under NATO command, contrary to the provisions of the United Nations Charter, without any explicit authorisation by the House of Commons elected to exercise democratic control over the Government of the day, which involves the use of cluster bombs, and which is based upon the possession of, and threat to use, nuclear weapons, which have been declared illegal by both the International Court of Justice and a Scottish court."

The Government rightly took great credit for banning land mines under the Montreal convention. What is the generic difference between cluster bombs and land mines?

My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces and I have had questions and many letters about depleted uranium. Anyone who heard Professor Douglas Rokke from the southern United States—an American patriot if ever there was one, who served in Vietnam and is suffering from the effects of depleted uranium—will know that this is a desperately important matter.

Finally—because I undertook to speak for five minutes and no more—I ask about Mitrovica. If we are to send any British regiments—let alone the regiment whose tie I wear and with which I did national service—into Mitrovica, there must be a clear idea of exactly what we are trying to achieve. If we are simply to keep Serbs and Albanians apart, that should be made explicit. The truth of the matter is that it is a cauldron, and the House of Commons should have a full report on what is involved.

I shall sit down with a plea to the Speaker that whether people agree with it or not, at least the view that is encapsulated in the amendment should be put to the test by vote.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): In his introduction to the Defence White Paper, the Secretary of State quotes Lord Robertson, his predecessor, praising the strategic defence review as "providing a structure to deal with tomorrow's threats not yesterday's enemies."

The Secretary of State evidently likes that turn of phrase. In opening today's debate, he referred to the need for what he called security architecture to meet the threats that will face us in what he called this century, not the last.

In the time available, I should like to focus on three issues: predictability, the strategic deterrent and the Government's attitude to it, and the European security and defence identity.

Attention has already been drawn to paragraph 8 of the White Paper, which states:

"Although we still conclude, as did the SDR, that no significant ballistic threat to the UK and its interests will exist for some years, the US are consulting closely with us on their plans to improve their defences against a projected limited inter-continental ballistic missile threat from proliferators, and on their discussions with the Russians on the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty."

In my maiden speech, and in the first speech that I ever made on a defence White Paper, in October 1997, I—like my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), whose brilliant speech touched on most of my main points, which makes my task much easier—mentioned the unpredictability of future crises, and the dreadful effects of the 10-year rule. This forecast that no war would begin for the decade ahead, and was rolled forward from 1919 until it was eventually abandoned in 1933. I also mentioned the fact that, throughout that period, each of the armed forces had entirely different countries in mind as its most likely potential enemy.

My hon. Friend rightly referred to the 10-year "no war" rule. Recently, while doing some historical research, I had occasion to look at the Cabinet Office's file on the rule. In it, I found the following quotation from a memorandum from Sir Maurice Hankey, dated 9 January 1931. He argued that the rule was crippling our defences. What he said is worth listening to all these years later:

"As a nation we have been prone in the past to assume that the international outlook is in accordance with our desires rather than with the facts of the situation . . . We are also apt to forget how suddenly war breaks out. In 1870, a fortnight before the event, we were not in the least expecting the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War. The same was true in 1914. A fortnight after the murder of the Austrian Archduke, a debate took place in the House of Commons on foreign affairs. The European situation was hardly referred to at all. More attention was given to the preparations for the next Peace Conference!.. There was no statement made on the subject of the European crisis in Parliament until July 27".

Sir Maurice concluded:

"We really had, at the outside, not more than ten days' warning of the outbreak of the first world war."

I am worried about the Government's view of the future of the strategic nuclear deterrent. I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale said about the strange omission of any mention of it in the White Paper. In a report that has been quoted several times today, the Select Committee, just before I joined it recently, referred to the eight defence missions mentioned in the strategic defence review. It is significant that the mission to protect Britain against a strategic attack on NATO is listed last. In paragraph 55, the Committee notes:

"Not all of these eight missions carry equal weight. The threat of a strategic attack on NATO is deemed at present to be remote and a lengthy warning period is assumed in which forces may be built up."

One might well say, "Here we go again."

I have been concerned about the Government's sliding away from their commitment to preserve the nuclear deterrent for as long as other countries have nuclear weapons. My concern was first prompted in January by a statement in Westminster Hall, when the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) said in an Adjournment debate:

"Work is in hand to develop expertise at Aldermaston in verifying the reduction and elimination of nuclear weapons and we have made it clear that, when we are satisfied with progress towards our goal of the global elimination of nuclear weapons, we will ensure that British nuclear weapons are included in those negotiations."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 18 January 2000; Vol. 342, c. 173WH.]

Because I was anxious about what the hon. Gentleman might be getting at in the long term, I tabled a written question to the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 20 January. I asked whether,

"pursuant to the oral statement made by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) on 18 January 2000 . . . it remains Her Majesty's Government's policy to retain a strategic nuclear deterrent as long as other countries possess nuclear weapons."

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz), replied:

"We pledged in our election manifesto to retain Trident as the ultimate guarantee of the United Kingdom's security while pressing for multilateral negotiations towards mutual, balanced and verifiable reductions in nuclear weapons."

However, he added:

"When we are satisfied with progress towards our goal of the global elimination of nuclear weapons, we will ensure that British nuclear weapons are included in negotiations."—[Official Report, 24 January 2000; Vol. 343, c. 36W.]

I was still not happy because it is one thing to say that we will keep a nuclear deterrent as long as other countries have some nuclear weapons with which they could attack us in unforeseen circumstances at some unspecified time in the future, and another to say that, when we are satisfied that other countries have made progress towards disarmament, we will put ours into the negotiations. As we all know, ours is a strategic minimum nuclear deterrent. If we ever negotiated any of it away, we would negotiate it all away.

Therefore, only yesterday, I raised the matter in Defence questions with the Secretary of State himself. He said again:

"When we are satisfied that sufficient progress has been made to allow us to include British nuclear weapons in negotiations without endangering our security interests, we shall do so."—[Official Report, 21 February 2000; Vol. 344, c. 1222.]

The weasel words

"without endangering our security interests"

are not worth the paper that they are now printed on. One can never know whether one will endanger one's security interests if one gives up a weapons system, unless one has infallibility in looking to the future. One manifestly does not have that.

We have been there before, as my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale pointed out. I quote from a famous American columnist and commentator, Walter Lippman, who in 1943 wrote the following about disarmament:

"In the interval between the two great wars the United States sought to promote peace by denouncing war, even by 'outlawing' it and by disarming itself, Great Britain, and France. The movement to limit armaments was, no doubt, inspired in considerable measure by sheer war-weariness and by the desire to save money. But the disinterested and idealistic theory of disarmament was that if everyone had less capacity to wage war, there would be a smaller likelihood of war. Big warships meant big wars. Smaller warships meant smaller wars. No warships might eventually mean no wars."

We know what dangerous nonsense that theory was. As Lippman noted:

"The net effect was to dissolve the alliance among the victors of the first World War, and to reduce them to almost disastrous impotence on the eve of the second World War."

Let us turn then to ESDI, which in its way may mirror the disastrous mistakes that were made then in undermining the potential security system that could have kept the peace. ESDI does not stand, as is commonly thought, for the European strategic defence initiative but for European security and defence identity. The word "identity" gives the game away, as I said in an earlier intervention. I drew attention to article B of the Amsterdam treaty, which states that the European Union

"shall set itself the following objectives".

Top of the list is the following:

"to assert its identity on the international scene, in particular through the implementation of a common foreign and security policy including the progressive framing of a common defence policy."

Asserting the identity of the EU is no sound basis for tampering with tried and tested military structures. ESDI is a retrograde step in the direction of the inadequate balance of power politics that existed prior to each of the two world wars.

Time has almost run out, so I shall move briefly to a warning and a conclusion. The warning is this: we ignore at our peril the words of those people who are trying to construct a politically unified Europe, just as we ignored at our peril the words of the dictators when they set out their stalls in the interwar years.

Last October, Romano Prodi was quoted—quite accurately, I am sure—in The Times as describing the European Commission as the "government of Europe". Asked by The Times to justify the term "government of Europe", Signor Prodi said:

"But what is the Commission? We are here to take binding decisions as an executive power. If you don't like the term government for this, what other term do you suggest? Consultative commission? I speak of a European Government because we take government decisions."

I hope that, in his reply, the Minister will deal with some of these matters. Will the United Kingdom continue to possess, and appropriately replace or upgrade, its strategic nuclear deterrent as long as other countries possess weapons of mass destruction?

Will the Government take to heart the lessons that disarmament and peace are not synonymous, that nuclear deterrence has played a key role in preserving the peace of Europe, and that a nuclear-free world will be a world made safe for conventional warfare for the largest powers, as it already is for the smaller ones?

Do the Government accept the unpredictability of future crises, and the risk that so-called crisis management—which is what the ESDI is supposed to be concerned with—could easily escalate into general war?

Above all, will the Government think again about the risks of creating alongside NATO another security system—one which lacks the deterrent effect of having American involvement right at the outset?

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): This has been a lively debate. Opposition Members were delighted when we realised that, unlike last Thursday, Government Whips were not forbidding their Back Benchers to speak in the debate. That has been a great improvement. I do hope that they will have learned their lesson on such restrictions, because we have had some very good speeches by Labour Members—as well as excellent speeches by Opposition Members.

I wonder how the story of the White Paper is being spun. The first aspect of that matter, of course, is that the White Paper is being completely overshadowed by the Government's defeat in the other place on the Greater London Authority order. I fear that that issue, rather than our debate, will be grabbing the headlines. Nevertheless, that is the Government's problem, not the Opposition's—[Interruption.] I do not think that the Minister likes the defeat in the House of Lord. However, it happened in the Government's reformed, Blairite House of Lords, which was supposed to be a legitimate House of Lords. Perhaps the defeat confirms that.

[Mr. Robert Key]

The story is being spun that this White Paper is a great one. It is supposed to be about reporting to Parliament on the activities of the Ministry of Defence. The hon. Member for Halesowen and Rowley Regis (Mrs. Heal)—who was in the Chamber for most of the debate, but has just left it—was spinning that line at about 3.15 this afternoon, when she, with her minder—I am not sure whether it was a Millbank minder or a Ministry of Defence press officer—appeared with me on television. However, this is not a great White Paper at all, but a complete cop-out. It is the first White Paper that the House has been asked to consider since 1996.

Earlier, the Secretary of State told us—[Interruption.] What good timing; he has just entered the Chamber so I can remind him in person. We are delighted to see him. Earlier, he told the House that there was no need for an annual statement of policy. However, as we know, in its report, the Select Committee on Defence disagreed with his assessment. Indeed, its report is rightly entitled "Ministry of Defence Annual Reporting Cycle". The Ministry should have a reporting cycle, and I hope that there will continue to be one. None the less, let us not mince our words about this document—it is a shabby little White Paper.

I noticed that the Secretary of State was unable to be with us for most of today's debate, as was remarked upon by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who reminded us how seriously defence used to be taken. I fear that it is part of the dumbing down of defence that we have seen since 1997.

Mr. Dalyell: It is not the dumbing down of defence, but the dumbing down of Parliament and the House of Commons.

Mr. Key: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who does not hesitate to speak his mind on these issues. We should not laugh at him for making those comments, any more than we should laugh at the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who reminds us what Parliament should be.

I have the honour and privilege to represent the constituency of Salisbury, which is one of the most military of constituencies. I shall not make a constituency speech, but put on the record the fact that I have not forgotten the military importance of my own constituency.

Her Majesty's forces deserve to know how we, both Government and Opposition, see their role in the country's overarching defence strategy. Many issues have been left out of the debate and the White Paper due to constraints on time, publication and printing. One cannot include everything when dealing with such a hugely complex matter as defence, but I want to flag up for future discussion the subject of NATO's southern flank.

The hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy) spoke of the need to discuss defence diplomacy and other important issues, including conflict resolution. We must return to that, but we have a problem in that northern European members of NATO tend to take an Atlanticist view or to concentrate on issues that affect the north of our continent, while southern Europeans concentrate on issues affecting them. Inevitably, the new eastern members concentrate on their particular perspective. It will be dangerous if we in the northern states do not take seriously the different threats that face the southern states of NATO.

Nor should we forget the eastern end of that great area of conflict and instability that starts at the western Sahara and goes right round to the Caucasus. I refer of course to Turkey and its pivotal importance to the security of Europe, which should never be forgotten. Our thanks should go to Turkey for its contribution to NATO, which we sometimes take too much for granted.

The Secretary of State talked about deploying forces with real punch anywhere in the world. We say hooray to that; of course it should be the objective. I only wish that the defence White Paper was all about that. Instead, it is much more about how on earth the Government are going to manage over the next hand-wringing few months to cobble together policies that can be sustained in the light of their budget cuts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) mentioned that Salisbury plain was being overrun with tanks. That is not the case as there is quite a lot else there too, not to mention AS90 guns—[Interruption.] As the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife (Mr. Campbell) points out, there are not enough tanks to overrun it anyway.

Let me point out, however, that the Ministry of Defence's stewardship of the Salisbury plain training area is remarkable and it should be complimented and congratulated on it. It has managed to take on board the tremendously conflicting aims of military efficiency and training as well as the environmental issues. The recreational use of MOD land has also improved dramatically in recent years despite the grossly misleading press reports of the past few months.

If we are talking about training, we need to mention Otterburn. As there is such pressure on the Salisbury plain training area and other training areas, the outcome of the Otterburn inquiry is crucial. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson), in whose constituency lies the Otterburn ranges, for his persistence in pursuing the interests of his constituents who want that range to continue to be used, just as I want Salisbury plain to continue to be used by the military. It is time that we knocked on the head the nonsense that the Petersberg tasks related to the Government's current mania for pursuing European dimensions at all costs. It was never envisaged that the Petersberg tasks would in any way decouple us from NATO. That is the great danger that was referred to by so many right hon. and hon. Members today.

I was glad that the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), who is in his place, raised the dangers of a European caucus in NATO. We recognise that. It is a bit of the argument that appears to be lost in the new architecture of European defence. The right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife made a remarkable speech, not least because he appeared to agree with us that it really will not do to play the old gramophone record that all the defence cuts were the fault of the wicked Tory Government and that all parties in the House agreed that the end of the cold war must result in a reduction in the defence budget. I was grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for that clear statement. As he sits on a Cabinet Committee, I hope that he will regularly remind the Government of that.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Rapson) made an excellent speech—and how well he represents Portsmouth. For 39 years he worked in the defence industry, and I have never heard him whine or carp. He has always given the House sound and solid advice. It is a pity that his party politics are so misguided and I look forward to the return of a Conservative Member of Parliament for Portsmouth, North—but not for a year or two, because the hon. Gentleman's contribution is valuable and his constituents in Portsmouth can be proud of him.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Sir A. Hamilton), in a remarkable speech, covered the gamut of defence issues. We are at one on the failure of the defence review, but perhaps we come at it from different directions. He is right that it was a Treasury-driven exercise and the defence debate should be about not money but capability. He raised the issue of whether it is worth spoiling the ship for a ha'p'orth of tar by trying to privatise the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency for the sake of £250 million in the grand scale of the defence budget, when there is so much to lose.

I was intrigued that my right hon. Friend talked about defence sales and I remind him of the extraordinary, but welcome, press release from the Department for International Development on 17 February, in which the Secretary of State for International Development was quoted as saying:

"military expenditure not only needs to be properly managed, thereby promoting transparency and accountability, but needs to take account of the 'legitimate security concerns' of developing countries.

In the early part of this decade, some of the debate around military expenditure appeared to ignore or deny this . . . Military expenditure was seen as bad per se—something to be cut ruthlessly without regard for the very real security threats that countries might face. This is wrong-headed and dangerous."

And so say all of us, but that is something of a conversion for the Secretary of State.

I wish to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey for all the work that he has done on the Defence Committee over the years. His contribution is much appreciated by those who, like me, served under his chairmanship on that excellent Committee, and by its staff.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) did not allow us to forget the aerospace industry in the north-west, especially at Wharton and Salmesbury, both of which I have visited on several occasions. The hon. Member for Eastwood raised some important issues in his thoughtful speech. I have already mentioned his reference to conflict resolution, and we will return to that point in the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) raised the issue of low flying and also helped us to appreciate the importance of the nuclear deterrent that this country possesses and of ballistic missile defence. I have already mentioned the hon. Member for Linlithgow, and my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) reminded us of the hon. Gentleman's expertise on nuclear issues. We look forward to the hon. Gentleman taking the place of my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey on the Defence Committee.

We shall shortly hear the views of the Minister of State when he winds up this debate. I am sure that he will have one or two messages for us and that he will manage to make one or two references to issues such as the defence cuts brought about by the Tory Government. However, if he is going to play that old record, why do the cuts continue? If he thinks we were wrong, he must reveal his plans to turn the situation around. We will listen carefully and patiently to what he says, but he is in danger of sounding like a scratchy, heavily worn, 78-rpm bakelite disc. He is also in danger of sounding too much like his master's voice in the Treasury.

This little White Paper is a tawdry affair. It is a pale shadow of its predecessors. I look forward to the second half of this debate next week, and I end by asking the Government not to arrange future debates when the House is going away for half-term and when they know that there will be hardly anybody around. I also ask them not to split the debate over two days nearly a week apart, because that does not do defence the honour it deserves in the House, as has been shown by the contributions from both sides today.

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Spellar): I thank the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) for his balanced response to the debate. It was so balanced that I fear for his future, but I hope that we see him when we resume the debate next Monday.

Other contributions were interesting, too. The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) revealed himself as a conspiracy theorist, and his careful examination of a photograph suggested an early flirtation with the communist party. He also revealed his previous incarnation as Financial Secretary to the Treasury when he skilfully evaded the direct question from my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy).

The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins)—or does he represent Epping Forest?—managed to avoid the fact that the vast majority of those who supported Chamberlain in that famous debate belonged to the Conservative party.

At one stage, the contribution from the right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Sir A. Hamilton) was making me extremely angry, but he started to expound on delivery mechanisms for weapons of mass destruction. I thought that that amounted to friendly fire that he was pouring on his colleagues on the Front Bench.

Many valuable points were made in the debate, and I shall deal with them later. First, however, I should like to look briefly at the achievements of our armed forces over the past year.

Mr. Duncan Smith: My question does not relate directly to the Minister's winding-up speech, but rather to something that the Secretary of State said earlier when he was asked about the arrangements for Northern Ireland that were discussed in today's press. Since he made his comments, I have heard that No. 10 Downing street is claiming that what the Secretary of State said did not absolutely rule out our armed forces being involved in a token disarmament.

Will the Minister for the Armed Forces, in consultation with the Secretary of State, rule out any token destruction of weapons—whether or not it is part of a special ceremony—by our armed forces in Northern Ireland? If he does not do so, the ambiguity will continue.

Mr. Spellar: Like the hon. Gentleman, I heard what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said. It seemed to me completely unambiguous. I have been in the Chamber listening to the debate, so I have not seen any press reports. I heard very clearly what my right hon. Friend said, and I think that the House did as well.

In Bosnia, we continue to make a major contribution as part of the NATO force helping to create the safe environment needed to rebuild the country.

In Sierra Leone, we have worked closely, and in a truly joined-up way, with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and with the Department for International Development to help bring peace and rebuild society after the bloody civil war in that country.

In East Timor, all three services were part of the Australian-led international forces that restored peace and order after violent militias had terrorised local people. Our forces did a splendid job. Indeed, our intervention in East Timor was a classic example of how our forces should be used—going in early and using their particular skills to make a real difference, but withdrawing when the situation stabilises and others are in a position to take over.

In the Gulf, the Royal Air Force continues to patrol the southern and northern no-fly zones to make it harder for Saddam Hussein to persecute the minorities who live there. Royal Navy Sea Harriers based on HMS Illustrious also take part in work that is important and dangerous. I should like to pay special tribute to the RAF crews who place themselves at risk every day to stop Saddam repressing people who cannot help themselves.

I regret that, on many occasions, we have had to take military action against the Iraqi forces that try to shoot down our aircraft conducting those humanitarian patrols. If Saddam stopped trying to kill our pilots, we would stop responding to his aggression—it is as simple as that. However, our response is always careful, precise and proportionate.

As the House knows, Northern Ireland remains our biggest operational deployment. Our armed forces remain ready to support the police for as long as they need to. I repeat to the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) that I thought that the answer given earlier by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was utterly unambiguous.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I have a simple request for the Minister, and I do not mind if he confers with the Secretary of State before he answers. It is clear that Downing street appears to be briefing that what is happening in Northern Ireland is different from what the Secretary of State claimed earlier. Will the Minister confirm that the Government rule out any token destruction of British Army weapons, whether or not a special ceremony is involved, in accordance with the discussions that have been going on?

Mr. Spellar: I repeat that the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was absolutely clear on that point, and I do not understand the hon. Gentleman's difficulty. I am sure that he will have a clear understanding of what was said earlier in the debate when he reads Hansard tomorrow.

Then there is Kosovo. We are still in the process of analysing the results of the crisis, and we will publish a report later this year. There are two key points to stress against the revisionist theory of history, as epitomised by the right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell. He commented on the credibility of NATO, but given his contribution, his credibility suffered more than NATO's.

First, let us not forget that our operation was successful. We achieved our objective of ridding Kosovo of Milosevic's brutality. Indeed, had we not done so, many of those who are carping would be damning us for inaction. Nevertheless, we accept that we have very hard work to do to make Kosovo a truly peaceful, tolerant and European land. That will take time.

The right hon. and learned Member for North–East Fife (Mr. Campbell) talked about being on the brink of disaster in Kosovo. I think that that is exaggerating the position somewhat, even looking at yesterday's pictures. Yes, there was civil disorder, but it was well short of a breakdown of order—thanks, in many cases, to the magnificent contribution of our troops.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: My judgment is based not on what happened yesterday, which appeared to be capable of being contained, but on the experience of my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who visited Kosovo before Christmas. I think that the Minister should have a conversation with my right hon. Friend; he may then modify his view.

Mr. Spellar: I am always pleased to have conversations with any Members who have been visiting our troops and getting first-hand experience. I went to Bosnia myself just a couple of weeks ago.

Our forces there and our forces throughout the campaign performed magnificently. The Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force played an important part in the air campaign that defeated Milosevic, and the British Army has been at the centre of the NATO force that entered Kosovo to restore peace last June, and has been keeping the peace with great professionalism ever since.

I should like to turn to some of the detailed points that have been raised during the debate, although I suspect that I will not cover them all tonight and may return to some others next week, or in correspondence. The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green spoke about smart procurement and tried to claim that it was part of a long-term plan in which the Conservatives had already been engaged. It is true that some elements of it had been in a number of reports over a number of years. The problem is that the previous Government did not implement them. We blew the dust off those reports; we took elements out of them and incorporated them. We worked with our advisers, with the Department and with industry in a constructive way that had not been possible under the previous Administration to achieve a smart procurement system. In both the Defence Procurement Agency and the Defence Logistics Organisation we are changing the way in which we obtain our equipment.

The right hon. Member for Fylde demonstrated this with regard to the future offensive air system, and I thank him for his comments. The integrated project teams are working together and hope, through their work, to reduce the time from the main gate to in-service date by up to five years. It is not just about money but about shortening the product cycle time. That is a key part of the changes in procurement in industry that we have now brought into government.

On frigates, the IPT has identified the type-23 support cost savings of more than £300 million. On Challenger 2, as mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, cost improvements were identified that could yield some £400 million over the life of the tank. They have already gone firm on half of those. On air-to-air refuelling, the IPT has increased VC10 availability, another key component of smart procurement, as well as the financial savings. There have also been cost gains of 20 per cent. That is due to working with industry, harnessing the skills and expertise aptly described by the right hon. Member for Fylde.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), a member of both the WEU and the AEEU, drew attention to the work in Europe, as did the hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin), particularly identifying the role for non-members of the European Union within NATO. We have made very clear our strong support for the principle of non-discrimination in that case.

We were also asked about the role of the European Parliament; we do not see a role for it in European defence. The hon. Member for Romsey rightly asked whether we see NATO as the cornerstone of our defence. Not only do we see it continuing as the cornerstone, but article 5 is, and will continue to be, the basis of our security.

With all the focus on the European security and defence identity, we should really be considering the defence capabilities initiative. That is the work instigated at Washington to ensure that we have not merely institutions and architectures but the capability to deliver, so that Europe does not spend two thirds of the sum that the United States spends on defence but get nowhere near the capability that it has; and equally, so that—as a number of hon. Members said—the US does not have to contribute 75 or 80 per cent. of the necessary air power, as it did during Kosovo.

That policy is not merely right from the European side: it is also critical to sustaining and maintaining the United States' engagement in NATO. Long term, we will not be able to persuade the US Congress to continue its substantial expenditure and commitment overseas, if it believes that Europe is not bearing its fair share of the burden. ESDI is not in contradiction to NATO; it is critical to the long-term sustainability of NATO and to maintaining political support for it.

On Europe, Lord Hurd now seems to be a non-person in the Conservative lexicon—joining a long list of distinguished suspects. I say to Conservative Members—in the firm expectation that they will take no notice—that I have observed that process before from the inside. I assure them that the mutual self-destruction of a party can take a long time and it guarantees a long period on the Opposition Benches. I complain not—I merely observe in the sure expectation that nothing will be done about it.

The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife mentioned equipment shortages. He should get away from questions put by his researcher and intended to dramatise a situation. They do not bear any resemblance to the reality. Many of the planes that he described as being not available were available at one or two hours' notice and with some minor work. The RAF's definition of planes that are ready is: those that are ready to go there and then.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman talked about tanks. Challenger 2 will be going out to the Balkans shortly and it is a magnificent tank. He also mentioned SA80 and Clansman. The report in question received such dramatic presentation, but the cameraman who filmed me when I described the situation said, "I see. There's no other news today then." In both cases, the report from Colonel Gibson of the Parachute Regiment stated that, overall, the operation was an outstanding success. The media chose to ignore that.

In the Balkans, the issue was not the SA80 rifle, but the light machine gun version. We recognise the difficulties. We also recognise that, in certain extreme temperatures, the SA80 has some difficulties, although it is a capable and accurate weapon. That is why we have been conducting tests and why I will receive a report shortly to show how we should advance.

We inherited Clansman. There was a six-year delay in the Bowman project, and we had an industrial system that would have been incapable of replacing it. We have had to direct the turn-round of that programme.

I stress that we were not taking any risks with the lives of our service men and women in any of those operations. People say that the Territorial Army did not have the signals equipment because it had gone to operations. Yes, operations are at the forefront; no, we do not take risks. General Jackson made that extremely clear in his media interviews at Christmas.

The hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Mr. Graham) requested a meeting on Bishopton. I understand that the Department of the Minister for Defence Procurement is dealing with that matter and that, as the Minister responsible, she will be glad to see him. Even with the order that he mentioned, jobs at Bishopton would have halved. He has to accept that there has been a reduction in munitions purchase throughout Europe. Rationalisation is taking place. Indeed, that is why we have entered a long-term partnership with Royal Ordnance plc to sustain its business for the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Rapson)—

It being Seven o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Monday.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): I am grateful for the opportunity to initiate this debate. The background comes from my constituent, who wants to remain anonymous, for obvious reasons. She wrote to me about her two sons, who had both become heroin addicts and who, through sheer strength of personality, have overcome their drug dependency. She wrote:

"In January I felt as if I had stepped on a land mine and my entire life was blown apart, I was left in such unspeakable pain that only another person who has endured it could understand the full horror of it. What made it unique was that there was no relief to the agony; no pain killer, operation or treatment could heal the wounds left by the knowledge that my 19 and 16 year old sons were both addicted to heroin!"

My constituent went on to point out that Gloucestershire

"isn't an area of social deprivation on an inner city housing estate in Manchester, Bristol or Glasgow. This isn't a single parent family with no positive role model to give guidance to these boys in their formative years. These are not bored disaffected youngsters with no hope and nothing to do, left to wander the streets from an early age. And yet, they became entangled in the pernicious web of evil that surrounds heroin and those who profit from it."

When I met her, she informed me how easy it is for youngsters to slip into addiction. The pernicious dealers offer free fixes to start with, until the youngsters become well and truly hooked.

After I met my constituent, I started to research the problem in detail. I found an alarming growth in the number of registered drug addicts in rural areas. In Cirencester and the east Cotswolds area which includes Cheltenham and Tewkesbury, there are more than eight new cases a week. In west Gloucestershire, there are more than 12 new cases a week. That is a staggering 1,000 new cases a year in Gloucestershire alone. The Cheltenham drugs clinic currently has 400 cases on its books.

The official statistics show that the number of registered addicts in rural areas has trebled over the past three years. I welcome the Minister of State, Cabinet Office to the debate. On 28 January, he sent me some regional drug misuse data, which showed that the figures for registered new users in Gloucestershire were 28 a year in 1997 and 63 in 1998. In the first six months of 1999, there were 96 cases. That is a huge and tragic increase.

Those figures demonstrate, in the most graphic possible way, that although the drug problem in the urban areas is well known, the mushrooming problem in rural areas is not. There is no room for complacency among the Government, the police or any of the agencies involved.

I wholly applaud the many initiatives taken by the Gloucestershire police to tackle the problem, although there is a long way to go. After all, they are the lowest funded force of any shire county. I welcome their education initiative. They have seconded four officers to liaise with the local education authority to teach citizenship, including the dangers of drug addiction.

Education is the key to alerting our children and parents in rural areas, who may not be as aware as their urban counterparts of the real danger of hard drugs. We need to demonstrate graphically that there is an enormous difference between so-called soft drugs and addiction to hard drugs, such as opiate derivatives like heroin and crack cocaine. They cause real physical damage and are far more addictive than soft drugs. However, such education must be correctly undertaken by trained teachers and officers. My constituent told me that she had recently been told by a teacher that nicotine was more addictive than heroin.

The link between drugs and crime has been well documented. It is estimated that a half of all crime is drugs related and that a third of the proceeds of crime goes to fund the drugs habit. As I have said, my constituent described the horrific experience that she went through with her sons. She had to have locks fitted on the windows and the doors to keep her own sons in while they were being treated in the withdrawal stage and to keep other addicts out who were desperate to get into her house to share needles and other facilities with her sons. Her sons stole her credit cards, stereo, cash and anything else that they could lay their hands on to fund further raps, as they are known.

At one point, there was even the possibility that my constituent would have to go to court to testify against her own son for theft, and the police were also going to charge him with possession. Fortunately, common sense prevailed and a private arrangement was made with her son to repay the money and a course of drug replacement therapy was agreed on rather than charges being pursued.

My constituent says that credit card fraud was among the worst sources of money for her son. Within an hour of stealing her credit card, he went to four local supermarkets and obtained £50 cash back from each. She therefore has some useful suggestions to make in that respect. She suggests that the banks should insist on photographs on all credit cards and on the use of personal PIN numbers when the cards are used in the shops.

Each case of drug addiction not only wrecks individual lives, but those of families, communities and the rest of us, because of the crime that is generated as a result. Gloucestershire police are involved in excellent initiatives, some of which are pilots for the rest of the country. They include a drugs arrest referral scheme with funding of £30,000 to make a trainer available to advise all those arrested. Gloucestershire police issued 92 drug treatment testing orders in 1999 and claimed a 25 per cent. success rate. They have a drugs referral scheme to ensure that those who are under arrest, on bail or probation or in custody are properly surveilled and can be counselled in the correct manner. Finally, a drugs and alcohol team will bring together all the agencies.

As the anti-drugs tsar, Keith Hellawell, recently said at a conference in Gloucestershire:

"Drugs misuse is a complex issue which can only be tackled by a partnership approach between statutory and voluntary agencies, at both local and Government levels."

I wholeheartedly agree with that, and I am sure that everyone in the House, including the Minister, will also agree.

As I have already said, Gloucestershire's police force is the lowest-funded shire police force in any county. Our schools, through the standard spending assessment system, are among the lowest-funded primary and secondary schools in the country. If we are to tackle the problem, we must have proper funding.

Gloucestershire police have informed me today that in the Stroud and Cotswold division in the past six months, there have been 46 warrants for seizure of drugs and 37 for the supply of controlled drugs, while 226 arrests for possession have been made. Although that is excellent news, it shows that the police are prioritising the addicts, who are easy targets, rather than the dealers who are much better organised and altogether more difficult to catch.

Addicts must be encouraged to seek treatment. It is estimated that for every £1 spent on treatment, £3 is saved on crime. My constituent told me that the drug replacement therapy was extremely effective for her two sons. The drug Naltrexone costs £5 per tablet and the course involves one tablet a day for three to six months. Although the initial dose can be funded by the Gloucestershire drugs clinic in Cheltenham, it can fund only that. The rest of the course has to be funded by general practitioners. Again, we come up against the funding problem, because Gloucestershire GPs, particularly in the Cotswolds, have had their budgets hit harder than almost anywhere in the country and we are losing GPs as a result. It would be a tragedy and a scandal if the funding were not always available for such drugs replacement therapy.

A far greater effort needs to be applied on a national basis by all the agencies involved, including Customs and Excise, the police and the armed forces, to stop pernicious hard drugs entering the country.

I propose a four-point plan to help stem the huge, increasing tide of drugs in rural areas. First, we need improved co-ordination to produce better education in schools, colleges and the media in rural areas. Secondly, we should re-target police priorities towards pursuing the drug dealers rather than the soft drug addicts. Thirdly, there should be an increased effort by all the agencies involved, so preventing many hard drugs from entering the country. Fourthly, there must be better funding for the treatment of hard drug addicts.

This is a huge and increasing problem in rural areas. If we do not nip it in the bud now, it will become so big that it will be much more difficult to treat later. I know that this is the second Adjournment debate on drugs that the Minister has had to attend today, but if he and the Government's drugs co-ordinator, Keith Hellawell, can bring together all Departments and agencies so that the biggest threat faced by society in rural areas can be tackled head-on and effectively reduced, this debate will have been worth while. I look forward with interest to his reply.

The Minister of State, Cabinet Office (Mr. Ian McCartney): I thank the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) both for what he said and for the manner in which he said it. I can honestly say that this is the first time that I shall have been able to have a dialogue on this issue across the Dispatch Box with someone who has been non-partisan and who has put forward proposals—which I hope, as I respond, the hon. Gentleman will realise are part of the central Government strategy.

First, let me make the hon. Gentleman an offer. I know what his constituent's family are going through. Every day, and certainly after every speech that I make in the House, I get significant numbers of letters from desperate people whose children have died or who fear that their children will die or that they are involved in drugs, and who do not know how to cope with the problem. If the hon. Gentleman would like to come and see me, along with his constituents, in confidence and in private, he is welcome to do so. I also invite the hon. Gentleman to meet me and the drugs team at the Department, and let me go through the points that he has made to satisfy him that we are already dealing with them in our strategy. I genuinely want an all-party consensus on this issue. Everybody in this country, irrespective of their political views, is in danger of this evil touching them, their family or their community. We desperately need a consensus about the way forward.

I hope that the Government's 10-year strategy is a consensus about the way forward on a whole range of issues. We need to create a healthy, confident society, increasingly free from the harm caused by the misuse of drugs. We will best achieve that by encouraging young people to resist taking drugs in the first place so that they can realise their full potential; by helping communities to protect themselves from drug-related, anti-social and criminal behaviour; and by providing treatment to help everyone involved to overcome their drug addiction.

That is a difficult process because addiction is a recurring, chronic illness. Many people go forward and reach the second or third phase, but some just cannot make it despite their efforts. Love is not always enough. We need to try to ensure that we have a co-ordinated approach in each and every community where people are suffering. They should be able to come forward with confidence, and we should ensure that when they do, services are available to assist them and meet their individual needs.

The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to talk about stifling the availability of drugs in Britain. One in 12 12-year-olds, one in three 14-year olds and nearly half of all 16-year-olds have tried drugs at least once. That is the age group into which the hon. Gentleman's constituents' children fall. It is estimated that a third of all property crime is related to drugs. In some areas, a quarter of all offenders arrested have tested positive for heroin, and one in 10 have tested positive for crack cocaine. More than half of the homeless are regular drug users.

The problems that we face are therefore extremely difficult, and we must face them as a society together. No single organisation, party, person or view has the answer. We need to co-operate with each other. That is why I am pleased that, up till now, all the political parties have given their support to the Government's strategy, along with the voluntary sector, the business community, community groups throughout the country and the police. I hope that we can return to that position of consensus.

We have allocated to Gloucestershire £105,000 under the arrest referral scheme, to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. That will help the police to identify and help drug misusers to gain access to treatment. It is vital to deliver new treatment services and to support schemes to reduce drugs-related offending; drugs education schemes; and preventive strategies. We must also put money into research to find solutions that work—there are many ideas, but we need ones that work and that relate to the individuals and the communities concerned. That is why I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman mentioned drug action teams and the drug treatment and testing order pilots that the Government have introduced.

[Mr. Ian McCartney]

We need to have a drugs education strategy in schools and throughout communities. Every child has to develop an awareness of drugs and acquire the skills needed to handle a drugs-ridden society. Children must develop a sense of their own self-worth to be able to deal with peer pressure. They should know where to go if there is a problem in their family or their community, or among their friends. Teachers, educationists, parents, students and children must all acquire that awareness and understanding.

The Government's strategy contains many measures—I could speak for 20 minutes if you would allow me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, it is more useful if I write to the hon. Gentleman and send a copy to those hon. Members who have stayed for this debate. Then, in discussions with the hon. Gentleman, we can go though each point of the strategy, so that he can satisfy himself as to whether we are getting it right. I believe that we are getting it right by working with people.

It is important that the Government set themselves tough targets. Targets are not set for their own sake, but to enable us to judge whether our strategy is achieving what we intend it to achieve. Setting targets on tackling drugs misuse is difficult, but we should not shy away from the task. We have set ourselves targets such as reducing the number of young people using heroin and cocaine by a quarter by 2005, and by 50 per cent. by 2008; and reducing the rate of reoffending by drugs-misusing offenders by 50 per cent. by 2008.

We want to increase the number of people accessing treatment services by two thirds by 2005 and by 100 per cent. by 2008, thereby building up the capacity and the professional knowledge and skills of those who work in the community, taking referrals for drugs treatment. We want to reduce the availability of heroin and cocaine among young people by one quarter by 2005, and by 50 per cent. by 2008. We want to achieve all that against the background of addiction being a chronic, recurring illness.

The hon. Gentleman raised the question of seizing assets. I am the sponsor of a performance and innovation unit project dealing with the pursuit and seizure of criminals' assets. I shall report to the Prime Minister in the spring. We are absolutely determined to ensure that crime does not pay, to reduce crime and the fear of crime, and to raise morale among the public and law enforcement agencies.

We are also absolutely determined to equip ourselves to do irreparable damage to criminals' business activities and their businesses. Catching and jailing them is not enough; we have to damage the whole network, or it will continue after we put them in jail. We have to get to the heart of the structure. We can make our message clear to dealers by targeting both big-time and small-time dealers. We must catch, prosecute and jail the big dealers in particular, but we must also ensure that we have the weapons at our disposal to smash their business empires. If we do not, the machine will continue with others at its head.

All of those vital measures are interrelated in the overall strategy. The strategy has been running for only two years; we have another eight years to go. There is no complacency—absolutely none. We must make sure that each year significant improvements are made, step by step.

Drug education in schools is a crucial element. That is why it is so important that in the national curriculum, at key stage 1, five to seven-year-olds know about the role of drugs as medicines. At key stage 2, seven to 11-year-olds are taught that tobacco, alcohol and other drugs have harmful effects. At key stage 3, 11 to 14-year-olds learn that the abuse of alcohol, solvents, tobacco and other drugs affects health, that the body's natural defence may be enhanced by immunisation and medicines, and how smoking affects lung structure and gas exchange. At key stage 4, youngsters of 14 to 16—the age of the hon. Gentleman's constituents' children—learn about the effects of solvents, tobacco, alcohol and other drugs on their body's functions.

Throughout the long-term strategy and at each stage in the development of our children, we must give them the knowledge and skills necessary to cope with drug-related issues in their society.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. His response has been positive and helpful, and I welcome the invitation that he extended to me.

I read the education initiative that the right hon. Gentleman has just outlined, and I was slightly concerned, as it seems to equate heroin addiction with alcohol, smoking and solvents, which are in an entirely different league of addiction and physical damage. That is not helpful. Will he examine the education programme, speak to his colleagues in the Department for Education and Employment and see whether it can be modified?

Mr. McCartney: For 10 years as a volunteer, I went into schools to do classroom work with young people on self-esteem and issues related to abuse. It is crucial that they have an understanding of all the factors that can cause them harm. Young people must understand the dangers, be able to assess the risks, and have the knowledge to make a choice not to become involved. Simply saying to them, "Don't do it" does not work. We must provide them with skills, knowledge and access to information. As a volunteer involved in such issues over a long period, I can say that the results are positive.

The Government are embarking on a major research programme in schools. I will send the hon. Gentleman a note about the programme and what we hope to achieve. He is right to say that education must play a major part in tackling the drugs problem. Drugs misuse is as much an education issue as it is a social evil. At each stage of the curriculum, we must get right the content and the training of teachers, so that those who are responsible for the delivery of the curriculum have a clear understanding.

A few years ago we did a survey among primary schoolchildren in my area, in Wigan. It was amazing that nine and 10-year-olds had more knowledge than the adults in the school about the drugs that were available on the streets. That is because of peers talking to brothers, sisters and cousins, and listening to the networks in the communities where they live. In one sense, that is frightening, but strategies can be put in place to deal with it.

Young people are aware, but sometimes they are not sufficiently aware of the dangers. It is therefore important that the curriculum presents a balanced approach to all the dangers that children and young people face in their development.

In trying to defend communities against the activities of drug barons, we must encourage the community to become involved with the police and others. In that way we will help the community to rid itself of the scourge of drugs. I was pleased to attend a meeting a few days ago with the Prime Minister, Mr. Keith Hellawell and the Metropolitan police, who have started the "Rat on a Rat" campaign.

During the first two weeks of the campaign, the hotline took 2,000 calls and more than 700 drug dealers and users have been arrested. A single anonymous call from an elderly lady led to a bust taking place and the discovery of a £1 million drugs factory. That was the result of one woman watching and thinking, "Something isn't right. I'll use the 'Rat on a Rat' hotline." the consequence was a massive victory for the police and the community. It is important to involve the community, empower people and show them that they are not alone in a community where drugs have become a normal part of life. It does not have to be that way; it should not be that way. People should not be isolated in their communities. We owe each community the support of getting drug dealers off people's backs and away from their families.

We are also discussing with Childline the management of a potential schools hotline. We appreciate that that needs sensitive handling, but the possibility exists of providing an additional boost to schoolchildren's understanding about the issues that surround drugs.

We are currently recruiting 300 new drug treatment workers. That will help to expand the capacity of the treatment sector. I do not have the figures for Gloucestershire tonight, but when we talk, I shall tell the hon. Member for Cotswold whether any of the new recruits will work in his area. Gloucestershire is part of the programme, and it is receiving resources.

Early evidence from the pilot drug treatment and testing orders showed that the average number of crimes committed by offenders had fallen by 90 per cent. Getting offenders tested and into treatment has a significant effect. We must maintain the effect so that they do not go backwards. They must have support mechanisms in their communities. Housing, jobs and social care can all present problems. Sometimes those young people have split from their families; sometimes they are isolated and have lost their friends through their habit. We are considering complex issues and complicated young people, who have difficult problems. However, getting them into treatment assists matters greatly. It helps their self-esteem and reduces the harmful activities of taking drugs and committing crimes to feed their habit.

We are the first Government to have an agreed comprehensive strategy. There are good signs, but we are in a war. Three thousand young people die a year; each death is a personal family loss.

Five months ago today, I had to go to Glasgow city mortuary to identify my son. When I did that, I knew that all hope was lost. During all the years of problems in the family when we tried to support my son, there was always hope while he was alive. While young people are alive, there is always a chance that the support can help them. I believe that that is wonderful, and I hope that the constituents of the hon. Member for Cotswold can sustain the progress and they have made and see their children mature into adults and fulfil their dreams and aspirations.

Hugh left us some words, which I would like to read:

"From someone who knows:

The damage the needle does
It wrecks lives and Families, so think
Before you stick it
Into that vein of Yours, just think."

Tragically, we cannot relive or save Hugh's life, but we can save many other victims in this dirty, sordid drugs war.

It is up to all of us to unite and win this war. I hope that the discussion tonight contributes to achieving that. We owe it to the families whose lives have been blighted and will never be put together again. There is no way of putting lives together when that happens. We owe it to the children who are no longer with them. We must sometimes think of every one of them—their faces and voices, their hopes and aspirations. In the end, the drugs war is about protecting children, and letting all of them have the opportunity to grow up in a society that respects, supports, loves and protects them, and where they can grow into adulthood and see their dreams and aspirations come true.

There is nothing more difficult to deal with than a child dying, and dying in the circumstances that we have discussed. I hope that our debate will convince people that the Government are absolutely committed to trying to ensure that we can, over time, overcome the difficulties and win the battle. If we do not, many other young people's lives will be destroyed. We must not allow that to happen.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Seven o'clock.

[MR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

Students (Financial Support)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned—[Mr. Clelland.]

10 am

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I have been moved to secure this debate not as someone who has a particular interest in or detailed knowledge of higher education support, but as a citizen of the United Kingdom who is alarmed by the disparity of treatment of my fellow citizens—a disparity that is based on place of residence in the UK. I am concerned by the threat that such disparities—and such unjustified discrimination—pose to the consensus that underpins the survival of the United Kingdom in the face of challenges posed by devolved government.

From the enactment of the Education Act 1962 until 1997, students in higher education throughout the United Kingdom were treated broadly equally in the matter of financial support. One uninstructed in the ways of the new Labour Government could be forgiven for expecting that to continue. Indeed, only three weeks before the general election, the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), then the Leader of the Opposition, told the electorate that "Labour has no plans to introduce tuition fees for higher education", and the right hon. Member for Livingstone (Mr. Cook) said:

"We are quite clear that tuition fees must be met by the state."

The rules of parliamentary language make it difficult for me accurately to characterise such statements, because, three months later, those who made them were respectively the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary in a Government who had announced the introduction of tuition fees for students in higher education. Mountains of material are available to any hon. Member who wishes to hold an Adjournment debate on that U-turn.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): Would it not be simpler and more tactful, especially as there are overtones of the auld alliance, to describe such statements in the words of our late colleague, Alan Clark, as being economical with the actualité?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend puts it very nicely; he has considerably more experience than I of skating across the thin ice of parliamentary language barriers.

It is not my purpose in this debate to revisit the rights and wrongs of the Government's butchery of the Dearing report recommendations, despite the fact that the Government claimed that they were implementing them. That was one of the earliest examples of the Government saying one thing while doing quite another. My purpose is to consider discrimination and inequality in the educational context and in the wider setting of our constitutional settlement. The Government have used the language of one nation and social inclusion, but have introduced a series of policies that are divisive and exclusive. Those policies are driven by short-term political considerations, without regard for the long-term damage that they will do to our United Kingdom.

As soon as the tuition fee proposals were scrutinised, it was apparent that fees for the fourth year of four-year Scottish degree courses would be a problem. The legitimate question was not about Scottish students, but about Scottish universities and the cherished four-year degree course. The Unionist response to that would have been clear and simple: to implement a fee structure that imposed an equal burden on all students, regardless of the length of their courses or where in the United Kingdom they undertook them, thus maintaining equality of treatment and access throughout the United Kingdom.

Tellingly, instead of such a simple and pragmatic response, the Labour Government chose to play to a narrow Scottish audience by exempting Scottish students—but not English, Welsh and Northern Irish students—from fourth-year tuition fees when attending Scottish universities. That was a radical departure from the 1962 settlement, which had effectively created a single market in higher education throughout the United Kingdom, and resulted in English, Welsh and Northern Irish students comprising as much as 45 per cent. of the student body in leading Scottish universities.

Such a decision in itself was shockingly divisive from a Government who claimed to be committed to preserving the Union, but insult was added to injury when they were forced to admit that, because of the rigours of European Union law, foreign students from EU countries would have to be accorded the privileged treatment that the Scots enjoyed if attending Scottish universities. We therefore faced the absurdity of relegating English, Welsh and Northern Irish students to second-class citizens in their own homeland—forced to pay fourth-year fees while studying alongside not only non-paying Scottish students, but non-paying EU students, whose parents had not contributed to the United Kingdom tax base over the years and who, in the great majority of cases, would not be likely so to contribute after their graduation. Such EU students are treated better than those whose families have worked and contributed all their lives in the United Kingdom.

It would have cost the Government a mere £2 million to remedy this shameful discimination, but such vas—and is—their arrogance that they refused to acknowledge that they had made a mistake, and created circumstances that, for the sake of a tiny amount of money, were bound to engender bitterness and resentment among non-Scottish UK students and their families.

The matter does not end with that grotesque act of discimination by the United Kingdom Government. With the help of its fellow travellers, the Liberal Democrats, the Labour party determined to make matters worse through the medium of Scottish legislation. It was clearly inconvenient for the Government in London and the Labour pary in Scotland that all parties except Labour fought the Scottish election principally on the abolition of tuition fees.

[Mr. Hammond:]

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): Before the hon. Gentleman moves on to discuss Scotland, I should like to ask him about his use of the term "fellow travellers". Does he accept that the Liberal Democrats stood four square against the Labour Government's introduction of tuition fees in 1997, even in our manifesto, while his party prevaricated over whether to support tuition fees and did not rule them out in its manifesto?

Mr. Hammond: My party made it absolutely clear that it supported the Dearing proposal to maintain the maintenance support system for students, which had served generations of students and, indeed, many hon. Members, extremely well. I am surprised by the hon. Gentleman's intervention, because, as I shall show, his party's record on the matter north of the border has been rather less than honourable.

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): If the hon. Gentleman's support for the student maintenance grant was so emphatic, why was he happy for the Government whom he supported to cut it by 50 per cent. before the last election?

Mr. Hammond: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the previous Government introduced arrangements for student maintenance that depended on a mix of loans and grants. We have never supported the proposals that this Government have implemented to abolish the maintenance grant. As I shall discuss later, it is clear from the recent panicked actions of the Secretary of State for Education and Employment that the Government have realised that, exactly as we suggested in 1997, the total abolition of the maintenance grant would work greatly to the disadvantage of the poorest students in England and Wales.

Mr. Boswell: Before my hon. Friend moves from that subject, will he recall that the number of students virtually trebled under the mix of loans and maintenance grants implemented by the previous Administration? That suggests some success of the policy.

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend is right. We were rightly proud of the great flourishing of higher education in this country under the previous Administration. However, I should like to make some progress in dealing with the situation that has developed north of the border since the Scottish elections.

Labour's failure to achieve control in the Edinburgh Parliament forced it to treat with the Liberal Democrats, who had campaigned unambiguously on the abolition of tuition fees as the "non-negotiable" centrepiece of their manifesto. Both parties faced a dilemma: Scottish Labour was anxious not to embarrass the Government in Westminster by conceding outright abolition of tuition fees, while the Liberal Democrats were greedy for the spoils of office for the first time in many decades but were hampered by the inconvenience of their non-negotiable policy on tuition fees. The response of putting the issue into deep freeze for a few months by ordering an inquiry is a tried and tested fallback for this new Labour Administration. For the Liberal Democrats, the abandonment of "non-negotiable" pledges is simply another twist in the wind.

The publication of the Cubie report and the Scottish Executive's response to it has been the immediate stimulus for my seeking the debate. Far from dealing with the issue, the proposed solution would deepen the discrimination against English, Welsh and Northern Irish students and institutions.

The proposed ending of up-front tuition fees for Scottish and foreign European Union students in Scottish universities—but not for English, Welsh and Northern Irish EU students alongside them, or for Scottish students who have the temerity to want to broaden their horizons by studying south of the border—represents blatant discrimination against institutions and individuals in the UK and the EU. Not only do some EU citizens seem more equal than others in Labour's new order, but the EU seems able to intervene to protect some of its citizens from discrimination yet cannot protect those who happen to be citizens of both the EU and of England, Wales or Northern Ireland.

Apparently, the UK Government have an unfettered right to discriminate against their own citizens, notwithstanding their seeming embrace of the non-discriminatory principles of the European convention on human rights. However, they cannot prevent the EU from intervening to demand privileged treatment for everyone else in the EU who wants to take advantage of the UK's generous system.

Let us be clear. A student from Birmingham or London whose parents have worked in the UK and paid taxes to the UK Treasury all their lives would pay fees if he sought to study at Edinburgh university. A Scot studying alongside that student would pay no up-front fees, and nor would a Belgian, a Spaniard, an Italian or a Finn. A student from Newry in Northern Ireland could expect to pay £4,100 in tuition fees during a four-year Scottish degree, but his neighbour a couple of miles across the border in Dundalk would pay nothing. Surely even this Government, with their arrogant disdain for our traditions and rights, must see that such a situation is not sustainable.

If it were not for the intervention of the European Union, Scottish students would have been studying alongside English and Welsh students at English and Welsh universities but, unlike their fellow students, paying no fees. As it is, Scottish students are effectively to be frozen out of United Kingdom universities, with serious implications for the diversity of those institutions and the potential insularity of future generations of Scots, who are now much more likely to be educated in Scotland.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): Is the hon. Gentleman not missing the fundamental concern of the Government and, to some degree, to give them their due, of the Liberal Democrats in Scotland, that those who come from less well-off homes are given priority? In the examples that he has given, those from lower-income homes and 37 per cent. of Scottish students studying in English, Welsh and Northern Irish universities will not pay fees.

Mr. Hammond: That is right, as far as it goes. I am happy to concede the wisdom of a system that is biased in favour of the poorest students, whom we know need to be encouraged to access our higher education system. The discrimination that I am addressing is one based on the country of origin within the United Kingdom—a discrimination that works against the interests of English, Welsh and Northern Irish citizens in a way that, as I shall detail, may have serious consequences.

It is proposed that a Scottish student studying in Scotland will pay no tuition fees but will be expected to pay a contingent £2,000 tuition tax at some point. A Scottish student studying in England on a three-year course can, at current rates, expect to pay £3,075 in tuition fees, while a student from England, Wales or Ulster studying in Scotland will pay £4,100 in tuition fees. Inevitably, decisions on place of study will be made partly on financial, not academic, grounds. That cannot be good for our higher education system, on either side of the border, or for the free exchange of ideas and the development of a sense of unity in the United Kingdom. It will surely foster insularity among the Scots and among other UK citizens, at a most important and formative time of their lives.

Most importantly, having different financing systems is extremely bad for the United Kingdom. It is perhaps the first test of the devolution settlement—and it has failed. Labour said that devolution would strengthen, not weaken, the Union, but this sort of farce will, beyond any doubt, weaken the United Kingdom.

Dr. Harris: Surely the hon. Gentleman's point is that, if electors in a devolved Scotland cannot vote for something that they deem an improvement on the prevailing system in the rest of the UK—which may act as an incentive for people to invest, study, get hospital treatment or be tried in Scotland, since our criminal justice system has always been different—then nothing, even at county council level, can be done on a devolved basis because it will seem to create insularity.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point. He and I have debated such issues in the context of health matters, where there seems to be a tension between the Government's expressed desire for local determination of issues and for uniform national standards. If he will be patient for a moment, I will come to the issue of diversity, as opposed to discrimination.

The package of changes in maintenance arrangements for Scottish students were announced in the Executive's response to the Cubie report. The Department for Education and Employment subsequently made a panic response in announcing a range of initiatives in England and Wales, including the reinvention of the maintenance grant that the Government had just killed off, having realised what we told them at the time: the demise of the maintenance grant would have a damaging effect on the poorest students. Those changes created a raft of variations in the treatment of students north and south of the border. The unfairness of the evolving system will not be lost on the people of England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

I say to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) that, of course, there is room for diversity. That is part of the point of devolving government, whether to local institutions in England and Wales or to a devolved Parliament in Scotland. However, let us consider what happens when diversity becomes code for blatant discrimination against groups of United Kingdom citizens who have paid the same taxes and met the same obligations to their country, and when it becomes code for the relegation of some United Kingdom citizens to second-class status, while other European Union citizens, who have made no contribution to this country, are given privileged treatment. The hon. Gentleman must accept that, when diversity becomes code for such a raw deal, it is dangerous for the consensus that underpins the survival and strength of the Union. When the favoured treatment of Scottish citizens over English citizens is supported by a system that levies taxes throughout the United Kingdom, but distributes them unevenly between the countries of the United Kingdom, such consensus becomes more delicate.

Although we pay into the United Kingdom tax pot together, it has been a matter of consensus for years that public spending per capita is higher in Scotland. However, if English taxpayers are to have their noses rubbed into the difference between public funding north and south of the border by such blatant and unjustifiable discrimination in higher education funding support for students, that consensus may not prove to be durable.

Dr. Harris: I am conscious that the hon. Gentleman wants to make progress, but how does he justify the discrimination of one beleaguered species, the English Conservative, against an even more beleaguered species, the Scottish Conservative, given that the Tories in England support Dearing, who wants flat-rate tuition fees for everyone, but the Tory manifesto in Scotland called for an end to tuition fees? That is diversity. I do not condemn it; he seems to be condemning a split in his own party.

Mr. Hammond: There is not a split in our party. The hon. Gentleman knows very well that the Conservatives in Scotland campaigned on a package of measures, which would have kept a mixed model of maintenance support for students in Scotland. As for endangered species, the hon. Gentleman might look to his own party north of the border following its blatant volte face.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend concede that one of the most unacceptable parts of this shambles is the discrimination between Scottish students studying in Scotland and Scottish students studying in England, where the fees regime is different? We are talking not about unity of treatment in the constituent parts of the United Kingdom, but about clear disparities and anomalies—even within the Administration.

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend is right. Discrimination against English universities will result in far fewer Scottish students attending them for financial reasons. That will be damaging not only to English institutions, but to the Scottish young people who may have attended them.

[Mr. Hammond]

Last week, on the Floor of the House, I apparently upset the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), who took issue with what I said about health funding in Scotland, England and Wales. He considered that my comments were unhelpful in drawing attention to the difference between national health service funding of £900 per capita in Scotland and of £746 per capita in England and Wales. That difference translates into a significantly larger number of consultants, GPs and nurses per 100,000 population in Scotland.

Despite the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of my comments, I was not attacking Scottish health care; my comments were an attempt to draw attention to the problems of health care in England. This debate is not an attack on Scottish higher education or Scottish students; it is an attempt to draw attention to the disparities between and unfairness in the treatment of English, Welsh and Northern Irish students. It is an attack on an unprincipled Government who say one thing and do another—a Government who say that they will strengthen the United Kingdom but who, by their actions and those of their client Government in Edinburgh, weaken it. The Government claim to be inclusive, but set out policies that drive wedges between different parts of the country and between different groups of its citizens.

We are trying to defend the principle of equality for all citizens of the United Kingdom in the United Kingdom. Whatever gloss the Government try to put on it, the blatant—almost farcical—discrimination between citizens of the United Kingdom and outsiders from other European Union countries, whose rights are protected by law, will only highlight for the average Englishman, Welshman and Ulsterman the damage that the Government's ill-thought-through devolution policies threatens to inflict on the integrity of the United Kingdom. It is a grotesque and absurd affront to common sense that those who work and pay taxes here should find themselves reduced to the status of second-class citizens, less well supported by the state than visitors from foreign lands whose families have never paid a penny in income tax to support this country's public spending.

We said that devolution would undermine the United Kingdom; the Labour party said that it would strengthen it. This is perhaps the first practical test on that question, and it is clear that the Government have failed it. We said that a changed electoral system would lead to weak coalitions and shabby deals, and that is what we are seeing in Edinburgh—unprincipled short-termism that will create rifts between the constituent parts of the United Kingdom, and back-room deals between Labour and its Liberal Democrat fellow-travellers, who are busily negotiating away the fundamentals of their "non-negotiable" election pledge in an attempt to cling on to the spoils of office on the coat-tails of their Labour masters. Back-room deals, broken Labour promises on tuition fees, broken Liberal Democrat pledges on tuition fees, empty Government pledges on strengthening the Union through devolution, nine tenths of the population of the United Kingdom reduced to the status of second-class citizens in their own land—such is the legacy of three years of the Government's policies on support for students in higher education.

Devolution is the Government's creature, but they cannot control it. Events in Cardiff and Edinburgh are overtaking the Government and threatening to undermine their policies in England—the creature has bitten its creator. The Government have no choice but to admit what is obvious to everyone else: the Scottish electorate has called their bluff on tuition fees. The price that the Government will pay for this shabby compromise to save the coalition in Edinburgh will be either a wholesale retreat on student support in England and Wales or a long-term and fundamental undermining of the Union, as the Government abandon the principle of equality of access to public services and support throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): I shall respond briefly to the comments of the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). There have always been differences in public services and access between Scotland on one hand and England and Wales on the other. If we want to talk about discrimination, why not point out the discrimination for many years under Conservative Governments, whereby students in Scotland had access to four-year degree courses, but those in the rest of the United Kingdom had access only to three-year degree courses? I do not recall a single example of a Conservative Member challenging or criticising that differential.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman is surely not suggesting that only Scottish students had access to the four-year degree courses at Scottish universities. Indeed—if my memory serves me correctly—20,000 English students are currently enrolled at universities in Scotland.

Mr. Rammell: Yes, but by dint of the cap on access, only a proportion of students had access to those courses in Scotland. There was a differential in the university system, the health service and the legal system between the provisions in Scotland and those in the rest of the United Kingdom. I am interested in all the arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge, but I am still not clear whether he prefers the system chosen by the Scottish Parliament or the system that applies in the rest of the United Kingdom. That leads me to think that his concerns are not universities, students and student finance; rather, he is attempting to use the issue to revisit an argument that the Conservative party lost at the general election and during the referendum on Scottish devolution.

Mr. Hammond: I was completely clear and open when I said initially that the focus of my interest was the disparity between different parts of the United Kingdom and the threat that they pose to the future of the Union. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) will speak in more detail about the education aspects of the issue later.

Mr. Rammell: The hon. Gentleman still has not answered the question from the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon, who speaks for the Liberal Democrats: if his concern is about different provisions in Scotland and Wales, why did the Conservatives in Scotland campaign on a manifesto and a set of commitments on university provision and student financial support different from those that they used in the rest of the United Kingdom? If we still had a Conservative Government, or if the election result for the Scottish Parliament had been different, the same differential and discrimination would still exist. It is nothing new. The differences are perfectly logical and permissible in a system of devolved Government. The Conservative party lost that argument at the general election and in the referendum on Scottish devolution. If it now wants to revisit the issue, it will not make substantive progress.

Part of the reason why the Conservative party—including the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge—is raising the issue is not because of the merits of the argument, but to try to create an impression among the public, especially students, that the Conservative party is on the side of students, when nothing could be further from the truth.

Mr. Hammond: Will the hon. Gentleman concede that the Labour party fought the general election and the subsequent referendum on the argument that devolution would strengthen the United Kingdom? That argument remains to be proven. The point of my speech was that a policy that was so divisive between diffferent parts of the United Kingdom would weaken, not strengthen, the institutions of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Rammell: Of course the argument remains to be proven in the long run, as it will be a long time before that judgment is reached. However, I am confident on one issue: had the Conservative party been re-elected at the last general election, when it emphatically refused to consider any change in the overall constitutional settlement, that would have led to a split in the Union much sooner. There would have been no Scottish Parliament, and people would have felt that their views could not be heard through the national Parliament.

The hon. Gentleman and the Conservative party have not addressed in any way the fact that we had no alternative but to introduce a new system of student finance and student funding after the general election. To put right all the problems in the system, such as the cap on student access, student poverty and the reduction in per capita student finance that had taken place over a 10 to 15-year period, would have cost the equivalent of 3p on the standard rate of income tax. The idea that any Government would levy such a charge and then use all the proceeds on universities and students simply does not reflect the politics of government in the real world. I hope that the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon will face the fact in the debate. The Government are dealing with such issues. They are removing the cap on access and beginning to restore university funding.

My final point is threefold. First, the argument that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge advanced is partly driven by the usual Conservative party obsession with all matters European. It is clear that his real animus is against the fact that European students will have access to a new system in Scotland, whereas those in England and Wales will not. We take the view that students in this country will have access to European systems. If Conservative Members have a problem with the fact that the law as it applies throughout the European Union necessitates the kind of access arrangements that are being put into place in Scotland, they should argue for a change in those arrangements instead of using the debate, as usual, to make a case against the European Union in support of eventual withdrawal—which is what more honest members of the Conservative party have in mind.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman's argument reflected the repugnance on the part of many Conservative Members for any form of partnership politics. I wholly reject that view. Where political parties agree with each other and can reach a sensible accommodation, they should do so. The British public are fed up with the kind of yah-boo sucks politics in this country, which takes the view that "Everything you do is wrong, and everything we do is right." That issue is now being resolved in the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Hammond: Would the hon. Gentleman's views extend to parties that fight elections with a manifesto centrepiece that is described as "non-negotiable", and then negotiate it away in the immediate aftermath of the election?

Mr. Rammell: Negotiations and compromises occur in politics under all electoral systems. Under the first-past-the-post system, they are made before the election. Under a devolved system of government, with a different electoral system, positions are taken and, if one party does not achieve an overall majority, a sensible and open discussion then takes place about how a compromise, and a way forward, can be achieved. That is how people operate in the real world in other walks of life. It is a pity that for too long our system of government and politics in this country has not done so.

Thirdly, the Conservative party's real problem is its failure to come to terms with the new system and style of politics that is represented by the devolved settlement. It has repeatedly lost the argument on that, and has failed to come to terms with the fact that partnership and government by consent is not only possible, but desirable. Although it sometimes results in what may appear to be messy compromises, that is far preferable to the non-compromising certainty of years gone by. For example, the poll tax was a clear manifesto commitment, on which there was no fudging or compromise, but ultimately the British people lost out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): I will now call Valerie Davey.

Valerie Davey indicated dissent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In that case, I call Dr. Evan Harris.

10.38 am

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): I come to this debate in the good position of not needing to defend the proposals of the Scottish Executive, because Liberal Democrat Members have a settled view that Liberal Democrats in Scotland, in using their devolved powers in the Scottish Parliament, can have different opinions from those of Liberal Democrats in the rest of the United Kingdom, in Westminster or the Welsh Assembly. Conservative Members have clearly taken that view on board, because they have different policies north and south of the border. Their position at the general election was different from their current position south of the border, and very different from their position north of the border at the time of the Scottish Parliament elections.

I do not need to defend the proposals of the Scottish Executive, but, having read them and considered their effect, I am happy to do so—although, in the context of the debate so far, that does not seem to be necessary. In his speech, the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) did not attack the proposals and their effects, but concentrated purely on artificial arguments about disparities between students from Scotland and those from the rest of the United Kingdom studying at Scottish universities.

The core of the hon. Gentleman's argument is that those disparities are unfair and constitute unjustified discrimination. However, the only unfairness and discrimination is that students and others in this country with a vested interest in good higher education do not benefit from Liberal Democrats in government. In Scotland, Liberal Democrats have provided a package for students that is fair, promotes access and delivers on offers made at the general and Scottish Parliament elections.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge must understand that it is the electoral system that is not fair. A party can get elected on a minority vote and implement a policy that was not included in its manifesto, which is what the Labour Government did in 1997. Students must rely on policies promulgated by that minority Government, and suffer the imposition of tuition fees, which have curtailed access and damaged student welfare.

Mr. Hammond: Does it not trouble the hon. Gentleman even a little that a student from Northern Ireland who attends a Scottish university will pay full tuition fees, but his close relative, who lives a couple of miles across the border in the Republic of Ireland, will pay none?

Dr. Harris: No, that is the nature of diversity in the European Union. The hon. Gentleman should be troubled that students from England do not benefit from the enlightened policy that the Scottish Executive coalition has agreed. Under the policy that the Westminster Labour Government have introduced, students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland who study at Scottish universities will pay exactly the same fees as before.

The hon. Gentleman is arguing that those disparities are unfair. However, the root cause of that unfairness was not the democratic decision of the majority of Scottish people to vote for parties that supported the proposed abolition of fees by the Scottish Executive, but the electoral system in the rest of the United Kingdom that cannot deliver changes to policies that are rightly anathema to the majority of people. Labour Members will remember that the poll tax, with which we had to put up for far too long, was imposed by another minority Government who did not command majority support even within their own party. Tuition fees, which the Labour party imposed through a tightly whipped vote, were opposed by its own members in the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge made a fair point about the anomaly of fourth-year tuition fees for UK students of Scottish universities who are not resident in Scotland. That decision, which was taken by Parliament before devolution, discriminates against some of our own constituents, and the hon. Gentleman will know that Liberal Democrats led the rebellion in the House of Lords against it. Now that devolution has given Scottish people their say, we must recognise that circumstances are very different.

Mr. Boswell: To some extent, the hon. Gentleman may have just anticipated my question, but will he explain the difference between discrimination in respect of fourth-year fees for English students in Scotland and discrimination in respect of recent Scottish Parliament proposals on the repayment of fees and charging tuition fees? As a lay person, both would seem to me to constitute discrimination, yet the hon. Gentleman finds one form acceptable.

Dr. Harris: What the hon. Gentleman calls discrimination is a diversity of policies that have been voted for not only by an outright majority of voters in Scotland, but by a majority of Members of the Scottish Parliament, who were democratically, fairly and proportionately elected, when they voted for the Scottish Executive's proposals following the Cubie report. That is different from the situation in Westminster. The intervention of democracy in political decisions may be of little or no consequence to the hon. Gentleman, but I assure him that, according to my postbag, and, indeed, the postbags of my colleagues north of the border, the electorate applaud the way in which democracy can—sometimes inconveniently for the Conservatives—intervene in decision making.

Mr. Hammond: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that it would be right for the electorate at the next general election to regard any non-negotiable manifesto pledges that the Liberal Democrats make as negotiable in the event of their seeking to form a coalition with the Labour party?

Dr. Harris: Our position was clear: at the Scottish parliamentary election, we stood on a platform of abolishing tuition fees. Labour party policy in Scotland and in the UK was to maintain such fees. Tuition fees are to be abolished in Scotland; even Labour members of the Scottish Executive say that tuition fees have been abolished. Andrew Cubie says clearly in his report—most of which, particularly on the abolition of up-front tuition fees, has been accepted by the Scottish Executive—that tuition fees are seen to be discredited. The Executive's proposals will abolish them. Therefore, it is a figment of the hon. Gentleman's imagination to suggest that our pledge to abolish tuition fees has not been carried out in Scotland.

Mr. Hammond: It is not only my imagination. The hon. Gentleman may have seen the article in The Independent on 25 January, which quoted a Liberal Democrat Back Bencher in the Scottish Parliament as saying:

"We have not got everything we were looking for but it is enough to prevent us losing face in front of the people who voted us in."

Is that not a cynical approach to democratic politics?

Dr. Harris: Absolutely not. If we had had everything that we wanted, we would have expected to be a majority in the coalition. That is how coalitions work. The hon. Gentleman is experienced enough to know that in local politics Conservative parties are engaged in joint administration with the Labour party—and with the Liberal Democrats, where we can bear it. He will find that, under a negotiated settlement, not every Conservative policy for those areas is, thank goodness, implemented. The same applies in any coalition agreement.

If the hon. Gentleman is against coalitions at all costs, even though a first-past-the-post election can deliver no party a majority—as happened for much of the time under previous Conservative Governments—that is a major new policy statement from the Conservative party. It implies that it will always want instability and minority rule in an attempt to get every part of its policy through.

We realised that we would not be able to achieve all our proposals unless we were elected in a majority, but in Scotland we said that the abolition of tuition fees was our No. 1 aim in this area.

Mr. Hammond: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way one more time. Does he recognise that to set out in a manifesto certain areas of policy as non-negotiable would precisely define for the electorate the areas that would not be vulnerable to compromise in the event of coalition negotiations?

Dr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman is providing me with no problems. If he looks at the manifesto, he will see a list of significant proposals for education, many of which have been carried out, including the doubling of hardship grants and more help for mature students and those in further education. We said clearly in the election campaign that our fundamental objective was to get rid of tuition fees. We have achieved that even by the admission of the independent chairman of the Cubie inquiry and the Labour Members of the Scottish Executive who have courageously performed a U-turn on their policy.

Valerie Davey: Although I accept the hon. Gentleman's tortuous argument, does he agree that the endowment fee is a fee by any other name?

Dr. Harris: I do not believe that the graduation contribution is such a fee: it is not up front and many students are exempt from it. I am happy to defend it, even though I do not have to do so, because it is not Liberal Democrat policy in this Parliament. The hon. Lady must understand that the funds raised by the graduate contribution will be payable only on graduation rather than up front.

Students who drop out—sadly, many do—will not be worse off. The total debt will be less than currently, and the repayment will be at the same level as current loans, and, in most cases, at a lower level. Those funds will be used to provide much needed maintenance bursaries for less advantaged students entering higher education. On that basis, it is a sensible and ingenious approach, which the Liberal Democrats in Scotland have little problem defending.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge cannot have it both ways. He cannot claim, as he did, that the Labour party in Scotland has made a U-turn on keeping tuition fees, while claiming that the Liberal Democrats in Scotland have made a U-turn on abolishing tuition fees. That is not worthy of the hon. Gentleman's ability. I know, from previous encounters, that he has a precise mind, and he will recognise the inconsistency of his argument.

The Labour party recognised correctly that it was important to increase access in the UK, especially for the least well-off students. However, its proposals to do so were crazy. Those policies included introducing fees, abolishing the grant, continuing to deny poor students access to benefits, introducing means testing and continuing parental contributions, which resulted in many students assessing that they would have to drop out. That has had an impact on access, as shown by the figures, especially for the first year after the introduction of tuition fees for mature students. That was especially sad because the Government commissioned research on whether mature students would be deterred by the imposition of tuition fees. That research found that they would be deterred, although the Government's objective was to improve access for less well-off people and encourage lifelong learning. The Government initially refused to publish the research, and it took many months before it was dragged out of them and placed in the Library.

The Government's policies have damaged access and increased student poverty—as shown by high drop-out-rates, whether because of parental contributions not being received or higher and higher debt. Students who cannot access sufficient, or any, hardship funds, are forced to drop out. Indeed, some students have to work to support themselves through university, and may fail their exams as a result.

Despite policies designed to raise money for higher education, even at the expense of damaging access, increasing student poverty and promulgating student drop-out, the unit of funding in higher education has dropped under this Government. It is projected to continue to drop, even with the continuation of tuition fees. For all those reasons, voters in Scotland decided that they wanted no more of such a policy. On mature reflection, Labour Members of the Scottish Executive recognised that that policy could not continue.

Mr. Rammell: The hon. Gentleman is delivering a critique with which I do not agree. He called for substantial public funding increases to abolish tuition fees and restore the student grant. Unless he says where that money would come from, his argument is less than coherent, and less than credible. Given that the extra penny for education has already been spent many times over in other areas of Liberal Democrat manifesto policies, will he explain clearly where that money will come from?

Dr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not our policy. He creates a false scenario and challenges me to fund it. Our policy at the previous election was clear and costed—we did not propose the reintroduction of grants. Our policy was to treat those aged 18 as independent. We argued that it was wrong for students to be means-tested on parental income. Failure of parents to make contributions is one of the leading causes of student drop-out and the high drop-out rate.

Our manifesto did not have to say how we would fund the introduction of grants, because that was not a commitment. I recommended that the hon. Gentleman read that manifesto and our costing supplement—we were the only political party to provide one—which explains how we would use the income that would be raised from an extra penny in the pound on education. We estimated that about £2 billion would be raised, and our policy did not involve the introduction of tuition fees. The Government's introduction of tuition fees meant that the money that we would have raised by adding an extra penny on income tax—we called for that in Budget debates—could have been used to offset tuition fee costs. The hon. Gentleman should study our costings, which are available in the Library, and which show how we would fund the abolition of tuition fees.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge, who initiated this debate, is a Conservative Member, and I want to discuss the Conservative party's record. Its policy at the previous election was to wait for the Dearing report. In his charming but rather disingenuous way, the hon. Gentleman said that his party's policy at the previous election was back to Dearing—but Dearing had not reported at that date. There was a conspiracy between the then Government and Opposition to ensure that the Dearing report appeared only after the general election. That allowed the then Government to avoid having to explain how they proposed to introduce tuition fees, which was Conservative party policy.

We learned what Conservative party policy was only when the Dearing report came out. However, Hansard makes it clear that Conservative policy was all over the place. The line that was adopted from the Back Benches by the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who is a former Minister, was completely different from that adopted by his colleagues on the Front Bench. The Conservative party's national policy was to retain tuition fees, but the Scottish Tories proposed their abolition, at a cost of £37 million. To be fair, the Scottish Tories explained how they would raise the money: they would use not a fair means of taxation, by which people would contribute according to their ability to pay, but an approach that involved recouping the money from poorer students by doubling the interest rate on loans to commercial levels. That may be the most regressive policy that has ever been dreamed up. It takes a particular species of beleaguered creature—the Scottish Tory—to come up with such a regressive approach.

Mr. Boswell: To make the point in the round, the hon. Gentleman should mention that my Scottish colleagues also proposed making Saltire scholarships available to meet the needs of students in Scotland.

Dr. Harris: The proposals of Scottish Conservatives have become lost in the mists of time. The hon. Gentleman, who I hope will speak presently, should explain the confusion. Is he happy for Scottish Conservatives to campaign for a policy that would introduce diversity—the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge may call it discrimination—into the United Kingdom and for Conservatives in the rest of the country to campaign for a different policy? The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge has not established that democratically approved diversity is undesirable.

Thanks to the intervention of Liberal Democrats, the Scottish Executive proposed a scheme that will have huge benefits, as the Scottish people recognise. A speech by a Member of the Scottish Parliament, George Lyon, made it clear that mature students will no longer have to pay tuition fees. They will benefit from additional free support worth £10 million, which will be worth an average of £2,000 or more to many students. Those students will be exempted from the graduate contribution—I hope that that reassures the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey)—and they will retain their entitlement to full loan support. That means that students will receive extra cash to the value of £2,000 and that they will not incur a penny extra in debt.

Students with a family income of less than £10,000, whom we need to encourage to enter into higher education both north and south of the border, will not have to pay tuition fees. They will benefit from £8,000 in free maintenance grants and they will receive in cash £2,000 more to live on than they would have received under the current loan scheme. Their debts when they graduate will be £4,000 lower.

I could continue to preach the virtues of the proposals—

Mr. Hammond: As the hon. Gentleman is preaching the virtues of those proposals, is he urging his friends in the Labour party to implement such proposals not only in Scotland but in England, Wales and Northern Ireland?

Dr. Harris: That is a reasonable point. The Liberal Democrats will look at that policy at a federal level. We have a democratic way of making policy, and it is not for me to change our party's democratically agreed policy on the strength of a seductive intervention.

There are clearly enormous benefits to be gained from the Scottish Executive's proposals. At the next election, we may well change our policy from the good one that we now espouse to the one proposed in Scotland. The Conservatives will have to address that issue. Indeed, the Labour Government will also have to decide whether they can go into the next election continuing to propose an unfair tuition fee system that damages access, creates student poverty and does not provide the expansion of funding on a per-student basis that is much needed in this country.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): This has been an interesting debate and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) on introducing it with characteristic clarity, elegance and moderation.

It is right to draw attention to the disparities in student support throughout the United Kingdom. I found the two intervening contributions highly revealing—and I have a soft spot for both contributors. The hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) resembles a stock medium-pace bowler who flings a few balls down the wicket in the hope that, somehow, an incautious batsman will get an edge. The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) reminds me of an extremely slow left-arm bowler, who, by guile and confusion, seeks to winkle the batsmen out.

To stay with the metaphor of the game, both hon. Gentlemen are batting on a sticky wicket in trying to defend the indefensible—as, I suspect, will be the Minister, when he replies to the debate. Although one might promulgate a degree of partnership, or even consensus, in politics—towards which purpose this Chamber is to some extent directed—it is unacceptable to defend the indefensible under these slogans. The hon. Gentlemen have sought to do so today.

The simple approach to these matters is the biblical one. Despite all the tergiversations and excuses, the system is unsatisfactory. By their fruits ye shall know them. This is not right. In raising these matters, we should not stray beyond our narrow remit into debating the principle—or refighting the battle—of devolution, let alone, according to the wilder assertions of the hon. Member for Harlow, the principle of our membership of the European Union, to which I, and, more significantly, the Leader of the Opposition, are firmly committed.

We are concerned here with the little local difficulties experienced by Labour and the Liberal Democrats in Scotland, where both parties have had to reinterpret election pledges in a way that no reasonable voter could have anticipated from their manifestos. Also at issue is the interaction with European law that has created and added to those anomalies. In practice, the result is a shambles across the United Kingdom. That shambles was defended by Scotland's First Minister, the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (Mr. Dewar), on the "Today" programme on 4 February. He described the proposals as "An imaginative, a brave and a very Scottish solution."

I accept one of those observations. It is a Scottish solution for a Scottish problem.

I also note that—in a parody of the self-restraint that we have sometimes wished on Scottish Members, post-devolution—no Scottish member of either the Labour party or the Liberal Democrats has attended this short debate to justify or explain the decisions of the Scottish Parliament. That has been left to English Members. It is a Scottish solution, but is it imaginative and brave, as the First Minister said? If so, I should like to see what he would consider a cynical and timid compromise, which is what I believe it to be. Let us not be mealy-mouthed about it. When discussing whether tuition fees and graduate contributions are the same thing, I am reminded of nothing more than the children's joke, which asks, "When is a door not a door?" The answer, of course, is, "When it is ajar." The answer to the question, "When is a graduate contribution not a tuition fee?" is "When it is deferred for long enough to provide a tissue of excuses for not so describing it." A graduate contribution is effectively a tuition fee, even if it is deferred—assuming that it is practical to collect it.

Our criticism of this hotch-potch is threefold. Unusually—and, remembering how the French tend to put their arguments, in the spirit of the auld alliance—I shall move from the general, and the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge on education, to my particular worries. I start with what I believe to be the greatest real-world problem, which is the threat that those ramshackle arrangements pose to the integrity of the British higher education system.

I shall not be precise about dates, but when the Minister for School Standards and I graduated, there was a simple, integrated system with a common support mechanism, although it was delivered in rather different administrative ways. For example, the Scots centralised the payment of student maintenance, perhaps sensibly so, long before the English considered doing so. When I graduated, universities throughout the United Kingdom were expanding. Friends of mine became lecturers in various universities in the UK, irrespective of the nation; one went to Coleraine in Northern Ireland and is still there, and others went to Scotland. Until his recent retirement, a cousin of mine, who is a Scot, worked for the whole of that time at Glasgow university, but he has always considered it to be part of a United Kingdom system.

Valerie Davey: The hon. Gentleman waxes eloquent about the past perfect, but before he continues, he should recognise the vast discrepancies that existed when he and I and other hon. Members were at university, which depended on whether one went to Oxbridge or Keele, or took a four-year course in Scotland. Few of us had any concept of being part of a European system of higher education. However, we are now part of Europe, and there is a mix and match of youngsters going between European and UK universities.

Unfortunately, in the earlier part of the debate, we did not develop the analogy of the inadequacies of provision for post-16 students with the better provision that is now being made in Scotland and England for 16-year-olds. The concept of being part of further and higher education—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a very long intervention. I had sought to call the hon. Lady to speak, but it appears that she is making a speech and not seeking to intervene. Would the hon. Lady bring her intervention quickly to an end?

Valerie Davey: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I simply challenge the hon. Gentleman's concept that we do not have a better, more integrated system in Europe than we had then.

Mr. Boswell: I have some sympathy with the hon. Lady's comments. It was a Conservative Government who dramatically expanded student numbers. It was also a Conservative Minister—myself—who negotiated the last Erasmus programme, which hugely expanded British participation in European higher education. I was about to make that point, but first, to avoid doubt and to save time after that intervention, I may refer, as if in shorthand, to English students. It may be assumed that I include Welsh students—my wife is Welsh—and Northern Ireland students, to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge has referred. The anomalies lie between England, Wales and Northern Ireland on one hand and Scotland on the other.

Although I would not claim that the situation in the 1960s was ideal—we have evolved since then—the integrity of the system is now under real threat. Moving into a European structure under the umbrella of European law—the Gravier judgment bears particularly on those issues—we find, as a matter of course, that our student children now want to go to Europe. It is odd that they find themselves discriminated against not when they move from England to Belgium, for example, but when they move from England to Scotland. That is a retrograde step and it has wider implications, because if we create barriers to the natural movement across the border into Scotland, there will be repercussions for academics, courses and the integrity of the British higher education system.

There are concerns, on which I shall not expand now, about research selectivity, which has a different principle and rigour in Scotland. That may damage the Scottish research universities. All that is gradually prising apart what has always been an integrated system. There is nothing wrong with an English student wishing to study Gaelic, for example; he or she would have to go to Inverness or to Glasgow to do that. I looked at the UCAS website the other day and saw what subjects were available, from A to Z: there is authoring, or communication, authoring and design, at Coventry university and, under "zone", coastal zone and marine environment studies at the university of Glamorgan. A Scottish student wishing to study those subjects has to face a new hurdle. There is differentiation between English and Scottish students in Scotland and a whole raft of subordinate discriminations. However it may be justified, such discrimination is sheer injustice.

Such discimination is not all one way: some of the rules under the modified version of Cubie that has been adoped in Scotland require repayment at £10,000 a year of income, which is more rigorous than the British system. The Minister's announcement on hardship funds in England, which has not yet been fully analysed, may well mean that some individual English students do better than their Scottish equivalents. However, there is substantive discrimination against English students going to Scotland. There is also discrimination against Scottish students moving to England, paid for out of their block grant. European students are discriminated against according to whether they go to England or Scotland and European students in Scotland may well benefit from the fact that the tuition fees—now renamed graduate contribution—cannot be collected from them if they move outside the jurisdiction.

There is therefore an overall threat to the British higher education system, which has successfully functioned as a whole for many years. The anomalies, which cannot be justified under any terms, are a threat to the decisions and the welfare of individual students.

Finally, there is the threat of legal challenge. The Mininster and his officials will know that the Department for Education and Employment has in certain respects taken the lead in the matter of judicial review. A senior legal adviser there, who has now moved elsewhere, wrote an admirable book, "The Judge Over Your Shoulder", to which all senior officials and Ministers should have regular recourse. I am not a lawyer but, partly fired by that document, I take an interest in those matters. So, clearly, do the Government because the original intention of the Scottish Executive was to rebate the fees for all Scots, wherever they were studying, including the 6,000 Scots studying at English, Welsh or Northern Irish universities. However, the Commission's legal services put a spanner in the works by pointing out that that would discriminate against European students studying in England, of whom there are perhaps 90,000, and that the privilege would have to be extended, under the best treatment or the no-detriment rule, to all those students. So the Government backed down and produced their compromise, which is more favourable to Scottish students in Scotland than in England, even if they cannot find in Scotland the courses that they want to study. Having tacked in that direction, perhaps the Government will succeed in avoiding European Union law, although my colleague from the east midlands, Mr. Chris Heaton-Harris, a Member of the European Parliament, is in active communication with Commissioner Reding as to whether the discrimination is acceptable.

The only way in which EU law can be avoided is by a solution that the European Commission's legal spokesman described as being "discrimination internal to a member state".

That would concede the point that such a solution would be discriminatory. If it is, I suggest that Ministers ought to consider the fact that they have signed up to the European convention on human rights. It already has force in Scotland and will shortly do so throughout the rest of the United Kingdom, so Ministers should consider long and hard whether their obligations under it are being adequately discharged through such ramshackle arrangements.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge said, the plain fact is that the solution is wrong and will be seen as wrong by students and universities throughout the United Kingdom. I predict that the matter will end in tears.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Malcolm Wicks): We have had a useful debate, and I thank the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) for choosing the subject. I also thank the hon. Members for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) and for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), who made use contributions, as did my hon. Friends the Members for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) and for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey).

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge used an extravagant vocabulary in his introduction. I make no complaint about that. It is early in the parliamentary day, but his speech included the words "grotesque", "fellow travellers", "arrogance", "panicked" and "back-room deals", and made much mention of second-class citizens. I hope that he will excuse me if I approach the issue in a calmer manner. In part, the debate has been about the public policy implications, as illustrated by the important case of higher education, that result from our United Kingdom's devolution and changing nature.

While listening to the hon. Gentleman, I could not quite remember whether his party had done a U-turn on the issue of the Scottish Parliament and Scottish devolution. I think that I am right in saying that the Conservative party now accepts the logic of a Scottish Parliament. If it does, it must recognise that, on some important matters, devolution can lead to diversity and differentiation. To judge from the hon. Gentleman's contribution, the Conservative party is clearly having problems with that.

I have checked my sources to confirm that the U-turn on devolution took place. The hon. Gentleman might find it useful if I quote from the Scottish Conservative party's schools pack, which seeks to explain the party's position on devolution. It states:

"The Scottish Conservative and Unionist Party has had to travel a difficult constitutional road in the course of the last year. We have had to evolve our policy of staunch opposition to the creation of a devolved Scottish Parliament in both last year's General Election and the devolution referendum, to being one of persuaders for the Union through the medium of the Scottish Parliament.

We now wish to see the Scottish Parliament succeed and we shall be working constructively in a wide range of ways to ensure that it does."

Rather tellingly, it concludes:

"To an uninformed observer, these standpoints may seem to be logically inconsistent and incompatible. That is an entirely understandable reaction."

In travelling the road, the hon. Gentleman is taking only his first steps. He clearly does not accept the logic of devolution and the Scottish Parliament: from time to time, it will lead to differences between our two systems, which we must accept.

Mr. Hammond: The key phrase that the Minister quoted was "persuaders for the Union" in the new settlement. We accept the new settlement, but does he accept that there is tension in the Government between the desire for matters to be settled locally, for reasons of democratic accountability, and the desire to impose national standards? In England, the Government have increasingly tried to tackle the problem by ring-fencing grants to local authorities and controlling what local authorities can do. They do not have that power over Scotland simply because they do not control the Scottish Executive.

Mr. Wicks: The balance to be struck between national policies and strategies and local diversities is a feature of democratic politics, which we are now witnessing on a grander constitutional scale in the United Kingdom. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow pointed out, there have always been evident differences between the Scottish university system and the English and Welsh system. Indeed, even before higher education, England and Wales have A-levels, while Scotland has highers. The four-year degree is more a feature of the Scottish system than of the English and Welsh system. We must accept diversity.

Mr. Boswell: Does the Minister agree that the record of their evolution shows that the British education system and student support were designed to minimise such differences for the student and to enable students easily to move around the system, rather than creating barriers to such movement, which is the substance of our anxiety?

Mr. Wicks: The hon. Gentleman, like his party, is in difficulty: he cannot say that he supports a Scottish Parliament but he always become angry when it proposes a different system from that of England and Wales. If no differences were involved, a Scottish Parliament would not have been necessary. As one of my hon. Friends pointed out, the system also gives British students the right to study in universities elsewhere in Europe and to benefit from national arrangements in other countries. Students' rights in Europe consitute one of the exciting aspects of education in the 21st century.

We had to tackle the system that we inherited. The hon. Member for Daventry did not mention the fact that, between 1989 and 1997, unit—or per student—funding for higher education decreased significantly, by 36 per cent. In expanding higher education, we shall not take the cheap option of allowing standards to decline. We want quantity and quality to march hand in hand. Under the previous Administration, quality declined.

We had to tackle the student funding system because, inevitably, at the moment, it tends to be people from higher socio-economic groups who benefit from higher education. Under the old system, which did not involve tuition fees, we essentially asked most of the population, who had not benefited from university education—including some rather poor employees—to pay for the tuition fees of the minority. It was time to introduce some fairness into the system, and that is what we are doing.

As we all know, people who gain a degree are, on average, financially far better off than those who do not. By their early thirties, graduates earn about 20 per cent. more than people with A-levels, and far more than people with even fewer qualifications. It is not unreasonable to ask that group to make a contribution—only a small proportion—to the cost of their teaching at university. We introduced the loans system to enable people to maintain themselves. It is a fair system, given the funding implications for students, parents and universities.

I should emphasise that, because of the nature of the income test, those from low-income backgrounds do not have to pay tuition fees. By 2001-02, about 50 per cent. of students will not have to pay fees and only 30 per cent. will pay the full contributions. It is important to highlight that repayments will start only when salaries reach about £10,000 a year. Below that threshold, no repayments are required. For example, someone on an income of £12,000 will pay back £180 in one year. That is fair, and it will become a major way in which to fund the university sector. Indeed, income from student contributions to tuition fees alone will reach £460 million a year in 2001-02.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister's argument is interesting, but does he believe that it is right that, with all the new opportunities to which he refers, a student from England, Wales or Northern Ireland can go to any other country in the European Union, except Scotland, and be treated in the same way as a resident of that country, but if he goes to Scotland, he will be discriminated against?

Mr. Wicks: The hon. Gentleman is struggling to understand the logic of devolution and of enabling the people of Scotland to elect their own Parliament and have their own Scottish Government. In Scotland, such choices are made and, inevitably, there will be differences and diversities. If he has not understood the logic of his own party's U-turn on devolution, he should discuss it with the Leader of the Opposition.

There is evidence that student numbers are holding up well; they are increasing. Concern has been expresed about the decline in the number of mature students entering the system. That may have something to do with the buoyant labour market, but we are encouraged by the fact that the number of part-time students is increasing.

We have a new student support package, designed mainly to help mature students, many of whom, we recognised, were in difficulty. We have listened to them. Some are lone parents and have particular problems with child care. That is one of the reasons why we are introducing at some cost a new bursary of £1,000 a year for mature students, dependent on income. We are also doing more to help with child care costs and to assist mature students who have children with the costs of school meals. We are also trying to ease access.

We asked Sir George Quigley to look into four-year fees for students, in accordance with the Teaching and Higher Education Act 1998. Sir George has delayed his report to take account of the Scottish Executive's response to Cubie, but his findings will be with us by April. The system that we have arrived at for England and Wales is right. Where it needs modification, we will listen—hence our package for mature students and for students from poorer areas. If we are to expand the university system, it must be fair to students, taxpayers and parents, as it is to universities.

Hundreds of millions of pounds are now coming in under the system. By 2001–02, income from tuition fees and loan payments will total £710 million. Are Opposition Members really saying that we should find from other resources the hundreds of millions of pounds that it will cost to move towards the Scottish system? Would it be raised by cutting nursery education or funding for the national health service or primary schools? I am not sure whether the Conservatives are making a pledge. If we are serious about the quality of higher education, we must be rigorous about the funding element. We believe that the student support system is fair and efficient: student numbers are increasing, the number of our young people going to university is increasing and quality standards are being maintained. Opposition Members must understand the logic of devolution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now move to the next debate.

Iraq

11.30 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): In December 1998, when I went to Baghdad with the former Taoiseach, Albert Reynolds, who is really the father of the peace process in Northern Ireland and a deeply serious man, we were invited by Tariq Aziz to his house for supper. I think that we were the first people to be invited to his home since the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) all those years ago. One of the things he said to us was, "You may think that Saddam Hussein, the revolutionary council and I are extremists. This is a general view in the west. If sanctions go on and there is continued military action, we will be succeeded by people who are far more extreme than us." I have to say that I believed him. There is a real crisis.

I know that there are those in the Foreign Office who suspect that I am sympathetic to the Iraqi regime, but on the contrary, it is a very brutal regime. So are others. The middle east is a very brutal place and others are now beginning to take the same view. Toby Dodge, writing with the authority of Chatham house, said:

"The rapid and externally driven decline in living standards and social structures since 1991 could produce an alternative scenario—the rise of militant nationalism. The widespread state inspired credo of Arab nationalism has historically found support amongst a population convinced that their country is unjustly treated by the West and wider international society."

One has to go to Iraq to understand the intense feeling. They ask why this is being done to those who were the west's shields during the Iran-Iraq war. Dodge goes on:

"The present situation heightens such perceptions. There has also been a dangerous polarisation of society between those reduced to poverty and those elevated to the ranks of the super rich. Sanctions, whilst impoverishing the majority, have helped create a small group of nouveau riche profiteers associated with the inner circle of the ruling elite. Their wealth is a conspicuous target for resentment."

From observation, I do not believe that that applies to all the ruling elite. Dodge continues:

"These two factors may coalesce in demands for a militant, active nationalism focused on re-establishing Iraq as a regional power. The potency of such a movement—comparable in some ways to post Soviet Russia or Weimar Germany—would be enhanced by fondly re-imagined memories of when Iraq was strong and could take care of its population."

Incidentally, in the 1970s Baghdad got a prize for being the cleanest city in the middle east. Dodge goes on:

"If this took hold, a populous government in Baghdad would find it relatively easy to mobilise a population already angry and alienated from the international community. The widespread dislike of the post Gulf War border settlement with Kuwait could serve as a potent rallying call with which to reassert power within the region."

The Chatham house paper goes on:

"Just what will emerge from a post Saddam or post sanctions era is a crucial issue of geostrategic significance that goes far beyond the Gulf and the wider Middle East. Since 1991, United States and British policy has been focused on the more immediate goal of removing, or at least containing, Saddam Hussein. But after ten years of coercive diplomacy, the regime in Baghdad appears to be as strong or indeed stronger than at any time.

Pre-occupied with more pressing issues, policy makers in the five permanent United Nations Security Council member states appear to have paid scant attention to the very problem of what type of Iraqi state and society will emerge in the medium to long term. The post 1991 stalemate has enforced dramatic and widespread suffering on the population through no fault of its own. Inside Iraq, if not elsewhere, the blame for this has been placed on the governments of the United States and Britain.

The danger that seems to have escaped serious consideration among western policymakers is that of an angry population, mobilised by ten years of suffering, venting its ire either on the institutions of the Iraqi state itself and attempting to destroy it, or turning its frustration onto the external forces the regime has blamed for their dire situation. Either way, on the anniversary of the beginning of the Gulf war, surely it is time to think about the possible future of Iraq, for the sake of the Iraqi population, the stability of the wider Gulf and the West's relations with the Middle East."

That is exactly the situation that Albert Reynolds and I saw in 1998, even more clearly than when I went in 1994 with John Smith's retrospective approval.

I talked over the weekend by phone, when preparing this debate, to the former UN co-ordinator, Dennis Halliday, in Ireland. He talks now about "intellectual genocide".

Halliday is a heavyweight. He was not even seen by Foreign Office Ministers when he was here, though he went to the Prime Minister, President and Foreign Minister of France. I gather that it is also the considered view of Hans von Sponeck, who is being rubbished. I was very impressed by von Sponeck. His evidence to the Select Committee has still not been published, heaven knows why. These are very serious people, who have the gravest of doubts.

Perhaps the most recent visitor was the journalist Felicity Arbuthnot, who I know is not popular in the Foreign Office. She was in Edinburgh on Saturday at the Quakers. She talks about the devastation that she sees, of the pre-industrial age, of women too malnourished to breast feed—chronically malnourished. The calorific value in whole areas of Iraq is now lower than in Mali. One third of the children are suffering. When asked whether it was worth the death of 500,000 children—those are the UN figures—to get rid of Saddam Hussein, Madeleine Albright replied yes. If I may say so without being personal, those are simply not the values that my hon. Friend the Minister of State had for so many years of his active political life.

The radiation in Basra is 10 times higher than it should be. We went to the presentation by Doug Rokke, whose views are known to the Foreign Office. He was a medic in Vietnam, and is a patriotic American from the southern states. However, one can see in his person the effects of depleted uranium. He is a leading expert on the matter. His reaction in Basra was simply, "Oh my God."

Felicity Arbuthnot, who recently returned, describes a society that is breaking down. People are selling all their possessions—even their marriage presents. There is no work for all the talented engineers. The trauma caused by the bombing is felt every single day. Iraqi children are the most traumatised on earth. Those should not be the effects of a Labour Government's policy. What is the point of bombing flocks of sheep? All we succeeded in doing was letting loose rockets and killing a few shepherd boys. What is the long-term object of it all?

The article by Robert Corzine in yesterday's Financial Times states:

"UN officials say Iraq has received less than $300m (£180m) in oilfield equipment out of a theoretical $1.5bn".

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

How can they achieve anything without the supply of what is necessary for the oilfields?

Finally, I want to touch on what is possibly the most serious question of all—the water in the dam. I received two separate briefings: one from Balfour Beatty—a firm with which I have had good relations in the past in constituency matters—and the other from those who predict up to a 45 per cent. reduction in the flow of the Tigris over three years. When I was in Baghdad, I was told that the Tigris was lower than it had ever been in recorded history, and in 1994 I saw that the Euphrates had become little more than a trickle. Balfour Beatty argues that the dams are just for hydro-electricity, and that the flow will be unaffected, but I am not sure. I do know, however, that a proposal exists for another dam at Cizre, in the south. That could take off a great deal of water, which, apparently, is to be used for irrigation.

There are real problems, and many people will be extremely interested in the Government's comments.

11.43 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Peter Hain): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for the opportunity to debate the important subject of Iraq. He has taken an expert and informed interest in Iraq over a number of years, and I have never questioned the integrity of his views or his genuine humanitarian concerns about the plight of the Iraqi people. I share those concerns.

First, we should remind ourselves why the United Nations Security Council imposed sanctions on Iraq in the first place. They were imposed following Iraq's brutal and unprovoked invasion of Kuwait in 1990. At the end of the Gulf war, in 1991, Iraq accepted the terms of United Nations Security Council resolution 687—the so-called ceasefire resolution. That resolution, and others implementing it, imposed a series of obligations on Iraq, including accepting the destruction of its weapons of mass destruction under international supervision, submitting full details of locations, amounts and types of weaponry, undertaking not to use, develop, construct or acquire weapons of mass destruction in the future, and co-operating with UNSCOM in carrying out those obligations.

Resolution 687 also set out the circumstances in which the Security Council would lift the sanctions imposed on Iraq. The resolution provides that sanctions will be lifted following compliance by Iraq with its weapons of mass destruction obligations, and following a review by the Security Council of Iraq's policies and practices, including its implementation of all relevant resolutions. By persistently avoiding compliance with its undertakings under resolution 687, Iraq, not the international community, has prolonged the sanctions regime—which was originally envisaged as lasting for only a period of months—for over nine years. Iraq is responsible for the fact that the sanctions are still in place.

I shall give some examples of Iraq's poor record on compliance. More than 600 Kuwaitis detained by Iraq during the Gulf war are still completely unaccounted for. That represents about 0.1 per cent. of the Kuwaiti population, which would be the equivalent of 50,000 British citizens. Eighty-seven per cent. of the Kuwaiti missing are civilians, some of whom are elderly. To date, Iraq has provided sufficient information to close just three of those 600-plus cases. Meanwhile, the families of those who remain unaccounted for continue to live under a cloud of uncertainty over the fate of their loved ones.

On weapons of mass destruction, because of Iraq's persistent evasion, obstruction and mendacity, the obligations under resolution 687—which could have been completed within just a few months if Iraq had co-operated fully with the weapons inspectors—have still not been met. That is not just our judgment; it is the judgment of an independent United Nations panel which met last year. Until those obligations are met, Iraq will remain a threat to regional peace and stability.

Let us not forget that Saddam Hussein has used his weapons of mass destruction before, with devastating results. We remember in particular the Kurdish town of Halabja, where Saddam ordered the use of chemical weapons, including nerve agents, killing 4,000 to 5,000 civilians and injuring perhaps 10,000 more. Saddam also used chemical weapons against Iran during the Iran-Iraq war. We are not prepared to run the risk again that he will use those weapons.

Mr. Dalyell: This is part of the difficulty. When I went to Iran on holiday, I saw the war memorials, which are like our first world war memorials. Although the Iranian people suffered terribly during that war, the Iranian Government's official view—as expressed by the Foreign Affairs Minister when he visited this country—was that sanctions should be lifted, because they strengthen, rather than weaken, Saddam Hussein's regime. That is the view of people who have suffered from it.

Mr. Hain: What I find interesting about the deployment of that argument is that nobody—including my hon. Friend—has suggested an alternative policy to the lifting of sanctions.

Mr. Dalyell rose—

Mr. Hain: Perhaps I could just finish this point. We all share the concern about the humanitarian situation in Iraq. However, it is not right to blame sanctions for that suffering; nor would the situation necessarily improve if sanctions were lifted.

Mr. Dalyell: I suggest that as a first step the Foreign Office should talk to some of the former distinguished ambassadors, such as Sir Stephen Egerton, Sir John Moberly and Sir Harold Walker. There is a good case for starting to talk to the Iraqis.

Mr. Hain: I am happy to talk to former ambassadors; indeed, we talk to them and to others. The suffering of the Iraqi people is caused by the policies of Saddam Hussein's regime. The evidence is there for all to see, and I am surprised that my hon. Friend does not take account of that. The latest report by the Secretary-General on the implementation of the oil for food programme notes that a quarter of all medical goods delivered to Iraq since the programme began have not been distributed. In the meantime, basic items such as antibiotics remain in short supply. That is the Iraqi regime's responsibility.

Iraq claims that the problem is caused by lack of vehicles, but thousands of vehicles have been authorised by the sanctions committee since the start of the oil for food programme. The real problem is the Iraqi regime's lack of commitment.

In February 1998, the United Nations Secretary-General recommended a daily food ration of 2,463 calories. Iraq responded not by accepting that, but by setting a lower ration of 2,200 calories and failing to order sufficient food to make up even that reduced level. The Secretary-General's latest report on the oil for food programme notes that Iraq is ordering insufficient quantities of pulses and dairy products and not including sufficient protein. At present, the average daily food ration is just 1,993 calories, which is significantly less than the ration that was set.

The Secretary-General also recommended targeted feeding programmes aimed at a population of just under 2 million. After considerable arm-twisting on the UN's part, Iraq allocated only $9 million—a fraction of the sum available—to those programmes. The Secretary-General called on Iraq to increase funding for targeted nutrition, so that children's nutritional status could be expeditiously improved.

Iraq's distribution plan for the oil for food programme allocates insufficient funds to key areas such as food and medicine, but allocates $10 million for the purchase of bank note counting machines. How will that assist humanitarian relief? The Secretary-General has refused to approve that allocation.

Iraq is also exporting humanitarian goods. We know that it has sold food to Syria and tried to sell food to Jordan. If it had any concern for the humanitarian plight of its people, it would not do so. Several vessels exporting goods from Iraq have been intercepted in the Gulf.

During the past few days, evidence has come to light that Iraq is exporting oil outside the oil for food programme. That oil could, and should, be exported within the programme, thereby attracting humanitarian relief. By exporting oil illegally, the regime is depriving the programme of revenue and the Iraqi people of humanitarian relief. The revenue goes straight into the pockets of Saddam Hussein and his cronies, and the Iraqi people see none of it.

Some argue that the oil for food programme is inadequate. It may not be perfect, but we firmly believe that, while sanctions remain in place, it is the best way in which to address the humanitarian needs of the people of Iraq. According to the Secretary-General's most recent report, the implemention of the oil for food programme is making a difference to the humanitarian situation in Iraq. It has delivered 12 million tonnes of food, and medical supplies worth more than $700 million, but, as Kofi Annan himself has noted the programme's potential impact is far greater. Unfortunately for the Iraqi people, it is not being realised because the regime appears indifferent to their suffering. It is no coincidence that the oil for food programme has had a substantially greater impact on the humanitarian situation in northern Iraq, where the regime is not involved in implementing the programme, than in Baghdad-controlled Iraq.

While, for its own propaganda purposes, the Iraqi regime allows the people of Iraq to suffer, the international community has sought to protect them from the effects of the embargo and the regime's cynical policies. Britain has consistently taken a lead in those efforts. Our most recent initiative was resolution 1284, a comprehensive resolution which was adopted after months of painstaking and intense negotiation. That was an excellent result and a remarkable achievement for British diplomacy. The resolution provides a new platform for the Security Council's dealings with Iraq on matters such as weapons of mass destruction, and humanitarian and Kuwaiti issues. The creation of UNMOVIC, a new disarmament body, represents a real opportunity for Iraq to make rapid progress on the remaining disarmament issues. That, in turn, would trigger the suspension of sanctions, for which my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow has consistently argued. If Iraq implements the resolution, the opportunity will exist for sanctions to be suspended.

The resolution also implements a range of humanitarian measures that provide for a bigger and better humanitarian programme—including the immediate abolition of the ceiling on the amount of oil that Iraq is permitted to export under the oil for food arrangements—and the speeding up of UN sanctions committee procedures.

Our priority is implementation. We welcome the appointment of Dr. Hans Blix as executive chairman of UNMOVIC. Work is well under way on the implementation of humanitarian provisions. We are very encouraged that all members of the council, including those who abstained in the vote on the resolution, voiced their commitment to its implementation. Meanwhile, Iraq's refusal to accept and implement the resolution yet again cynically denies the Iraqi people the prospect of relief from sanctions for which my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow so eloquently argues.

My hon. Friend also raised the question of the no-fly zones over Iraq. I would first like to record our gratitude for the invaluable role played by the RAF air crews who have risked their lives for eight years to protect Iraqi civilians from repression. The no-fly zones were established to protect innocent Iraqi civilians from persecution at the hands of the Iraqi air force. Although 1991 may seem a long time ago, it is still vivid in the minds of those Iraqi Kurds, Assyrians and Turkmen who fled their homes in fear as Iraqi helicopter gunships attacked their villages. That was not the first time that those villages had suffered. In the 1970s and 1980s, Iraqi forces destroyed more than 3,000 Kurdish villages. That is never referred to by the critics of our policy in the debate on sanctions.

On the question of the chemical weapons attack on Halabja, I recently met Professor Christine Gosden of Liverpool university. She has expert knowledge of the awful medical conditions suffered by the people of that town: infertility, miscarriages, congenital abnormalities, and cancers. They also suffer from respiratory problems caused by the inhalation of mustard gas. These dreadful illnesses continue to afflict people born in those areas even today.

Anyone who has seen the effects of such attacks on innocent civilians will want to ensure that such atrocities can never happen again. That is what our pilots do in the no-fly zones over Iraq. They patrol the zones every week, as they have for the past nine years, to deter Iraqi air attacks on Iraqi civilians. That happens not only in the north. RAF aircraft have also patrolled in the south since the establishment of the southern no-fly zone in 1992, to limit the repression of the Shi'a Muslims.

My hon. Friend mentioned water issues. He will recall the devastation wreaked by Iraqi forces in the southern marshlands. They burned houses and fields, demolished homes with bulldozers and deliberately drained the marshes, destroying a vast regional wetland for ever.

Mr. Dalyell: I have made an unannounced visit to the marshlands at Querna, and I do not believe that having seen the area with my own eyes.

Mr. Hain: I am surprised by the hon. Gentleman's statement. As well as causing grave environmental damage by diverting water flows and burning large areas of reeds—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. If the hon. Member for Linlithgow wishes to intervene, he must do so in the proper way and not from a sedentary position.

Mr. Hain: As well as carrying out the damage that I have just mentioned, Iraqi forces did much to destroy the way of life of the marsh Arabs. The persecution continues today. In March last year, Iraqi firing squads summarily executed a number of alleged demonstrators from Basra, who had already been tortured while in detention. Afterwards, they were buried in a mass grave. Why is no attention focused on that?

We must not forget what happened in the years leading up to the creation of the no-fly zones, nor should we ignore the repression that continues on the ground. Security Council resolution 688 called on Iraq to end its repression. The zones were set up in support of that resolution. Since December 1998, Iraqi forces have maintained a sustained campaign to try to shoot down our aircraft, which are defending the rights of Iraqi citizens. Iraqi forces have shot at, or otherwise threatened, UK and US aircraft more than 630 times. Those threats are real, and our forces have responded in a proportionate manner, in self defence. That is their right under international law, and their safety must be paramount.

I must make it clear that we do not target civilian infrastructure. All defensive action is strictly limited to responses against Iraqi weapons and facilities that pose a threat to our forces. Our forces make every effort to minimise the risk to civilians when responding to threats. I urge hon. Members to treat Iraqi reports of civilian casualties with great caution. As my hon. Friend is aware, the Iraqis have, in the past accused us of killing civilians on days when we have not even been flying, and of damaging buildings later shown to be intact.

My hon. Friend also raised the question of the Ilisu dam. We have received representations from the Iraqi and Syrian Governments about that project. That is reflected in the four key concerns that were listed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in his statement on 21 December. One such concern involves the need to ensure adequate downstream flows to neighbouring states. It is worth nothing in this regard that the construction in the 1980s of the Anatolian gap project on the Euphrates by Turkey has had no demonstrable effect on Syria's water supply. The Ilisu dam is a hydro-electric project, not an irrigation project, and there should therefore be no disruption to downstream flows along the Tigris. No decision has yet been taken about cover from the Export Credits Guarantee Department—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must moye on to the next debate.

12 noon

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I appreciate this opportunity to raise this issue. You will be aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I have sought for some time to raise it in the House of Commons. It is opportune to raise it today—it comes in the midst of a visit by the President of Indonesia and by journalists and politicians from Indonesia. It is a privilege that the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office will respond to the debate—I am aware of his interests and commitments in this regard.

Perhaps I should explain my interest in this matter. Why should an hon. Member who represents Belfast, South be interested in developments in Indonesia? Some might wonder whether I do not have enough problems at home. I am a minister of the Presbyterian Church in Northern Ireland, which for years has enjoyed fellowship with the Indonesian Church, especially in Halmahera. When I became a Member of Parliament, I discovered that one of my constituents, who is currently the moderator of the Continuing Church in Australia, was a theological professor in a college in Halmahera. He has been in touch with us about this debate. The moderator of the Indonesian Church had to flee from Ambon by boat to get to Jakarta to try to represent his people and to deal with the tremendously serious situation in which the Indonesian Government are involved. Our eyes have always been on East Timor, but problems were developing in other parts of Indonesia, which is the largest country in the world with a significant Muslim community. It is a vast country with a vast population, and it is made up of a huge network of islands.

Tragically, the situation has escalated since the election. Throughout 1999, incidents led to the deaths of at least 1,500 people. I say "at least" because I am aware that different people exaggerate casualties. I am also aware that those from the Islamic community claim that many more than 2,000 Muslims have been slaughtered by Christians, although there is no evidence to support that. Tragically, those from the Christian community have retaliated—some have sought vengeance, and some, who were defending their local situation, were involved in the deaths of their fellow citizens. I seek not to defend all the actions of Christians but to deal with the tragedy in the Moluccan Islands, which some may know better as the Spice Islands. Historically, there is a strong trade connection between our country and those islands.

The situation in eastern Indonesia is grave. Recent violence in the region—it is the one province of Indonesia's six provinces that contains a non-Muslim majority or only a slight Muslim majority—has been perpetrated largely by Muslim extremists against a Christian community in the province, in which Christians slightly outnumber Muslims. Since the violence began in January 1999, more than 1,500 people have died and thousands have been made homeless. Various figures have been presented. They show that 100,000 have been displaced in Maluku and about 50,000 in Sulawesi. Figures supplied by the Department for International Development show that more than 200,000 people have been displaced. That gives us an idea of the extent of the crisis and the needs.

Not only have people been made homeless, but many churches have been destroyed. Five mosques have also been burnt and Christian-owned property destroyed. We are aware of the report of the Jubilee Campaign United Kingdom, which has been involved over the years with British parliamentarians and raises human rights issues throughout the world. Its report confirms the situation outlined in numerous media reports.

I have recently noticed a more balanced presentation in the United Kingdom media, but I was concerned, in early January, to see some of our press reporting as if the Christians were attacking the Muslims. When we tried to find out what lay behind that, we discovered that the head of the Indonesian news agency is an extreme Muslim, appointed by the former President, Mr. Habibie. We must remember that even countries such as ours with a free press must balance reports, because most papers have their own emphasis. We should treat with caution some of the reports that come from the Indonesian news agency. It seems clear that widespread human rights abuses are being perpetrated by Muslim extremists, aided and abetted by army elements. As hon. Members will be aware, I have already tabled early-day motion 294 on this subject.

I find it somewhat ironic that over the past week the Government and the European Union have sought to isolate Austria on the ground that its democratically elected Government have formed a coalition with a party whose policies they find repugnant—as a child of the 1930s, I can understand some of the reasoning behind that—yet they appear unwilling to use influence to compel the Indonesian authorities to end the violence in the region and ensure the protection of life, property and freedom of religion. I recognise that it is looked on as an internal conflict, but that was the case in Austria, too. If people in a democracy vote in a certain way, they have a right to be represented in that way. That is not the case in Indonesia, where the election went against the extreme Islamic people. The national ideals of Indonesia, over the years, until Suharto came in, allowed tolerance.

We have seen the tradition of "pila", which allowed communities to co-exist with one another, set aside. One of the messages that I get from Muslims and Christians in Indonesia is that they long to go back to that tradition. In the struggle in Ternate, the sultan and the moderator of the Presbyterian Church, representing their communities, appealed for peace, restraint and co-existence.

The nature of the violence is such that it appears to be organised and directed by those in positions of authority. It is open to question how far it is an Islamist plot, led by former President Habibie, Islamic elements in the Indonesian army and Islamic militants, to establish an Islamic nation and to control the major international trade routes in that part of the world.

In a report in the Jakarta Post of 3 February, President Wahid mentioned attempts by hard-line generals and Muslim militants to destabilise the country. I can refer to no higher authority than the President, who lends support to my reading of the situation. It is certain that elements of the army, particularly Muslim units from the island of Java, have been guilty of siding with Islamic extremists. Indeed, one army group so involved is the Kostra unit, which has clearly taken an offensive position against the Christian community rather than fulfilling a peace-keeping role and trying to restore law and order in the community.

[Rev. Martin Smyth]

We must press home that question. Have the Government made representations to the Indonesian authorities about accepting a team of human rights observers to evaluate and balance reports of what is happening there, so that the world at large might have an objective view of it?

I can understand those who say that I am not speaking objectively but, speaking as a Presbyterian minister who has sympathy for the Christian population in Indonesia and the Moluccan Islands. I speak also as one who over the years has had Muslim friends in my home and elsewhere, so it is wrong to suggest that I speak only on behalf of the Christian community. However, it is true that it is the Christian community that is suffering most.

Will the Government urge the Indonesians to implement measures to prevent inflammatory statements and material being distributed? I know how difficult that can be. I know that the underground press works differently in different countries. I know that slogans are posted and that mobs get carried away, but we should restrict the media from publishing such slogans, as they can give the appearance of credibility and reliability, and, if necessary, measures should be taken to punish those found guilty of incitement to violence.

Have the Government made any attempt to encourage and facilitate reconciliation betwen the Muslim and Christian leaders in the Moluccan Islands, to allocate funds for reconciliation efforts and to offer British Government expertise in policing sectarian conflict? I realise that that can be done only by invitation, but our people are always standing by to provide such help if it is requested. We are part of a global village, and we cannot stand apart from issues that cause others to suffer.

It is important to ask the authorities in Indonesia to act swiftly and impartially to provide humanitarian aid and assistance to those displaced and in need, and to investigate, identify and prosecute those responsible for provocation.

I shall come to a close so that the Minister has time to respond. I remind him that it took the world 25 years to come to the aid of the people of East Timor. I understand that that was a separatist conflict, and that East Timor was never recognised as part of Indonesia. However, the law-abiding Christians and Muslims of the Moluccan Islands cannot wait for 25 years.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. John Battle): It is many years since the House of Commons debated Indonesian matters, so all hon. Members will be grateful to the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) for raising the subject. It is a great tribute to him as the representative of Belfast, South that, even in the circumstances that he has had to deal with, he has called our attention to suffering communities in Indonesia and has made them a priority of his work in the House. We are grateful that he has retained his personal contacts and been able to share his detailed experience with us. His speech in this Chamber is an important part of the formal records of the House of Commons. The speech and my reply will be read by others and by other Governments, including that of Indonesia.

The Government have watched the spread of violence through the Moluccan Islands with great concern, and all hon. Members will join me in deploring the violence that has brought pain and suffering to the communities there. We deeply regret the loss of life and the inter-communal violence that has taken place since the troubles began early last year. Communities that have lived in peace for many years, despite that long tradition of peaceful co-existence, are now sadly shattered with tension, conflict and fear.

We must exercise caution in rushing to a quick-fix solution. We know from conflicts much closer to home that rebuilding trust and peace is usually a long and painstaking process. Before we begin that process, we must understand the situation's roots and causes. The Moluccan Islands lie 1,700 or more miles from the Indonesian capital, Jakarta, and there are more than 1,000 of them in an area some three and a half times the size of the United Kingdom. When we look at the globe, I sometimes fear that we underestimate the size, scope and space taken up by the islands that compose Indonesia. The population of 2.1 million speaks about 150 different dialects.

In October 1999, the then Maluku province was divided into North Maluku and Maluku, the capitals of which are Ternate and Ambon respectively. Taken together, about 59 per cent. of the inhabitants of those regions are Muslim and 41 per cent. are Christian, although the proportions vary according to province and island. For example, Christians are in the majority in Ambon. That approximate balance is rare in Indonesia but has existed in the Moluccan Islands since the 16th century. The two communities lived in close proximity. Traditionally, inter-faith relations were protected by a twinning system that linked Christian and Muslim villages.

The balance between Muslims and Christians has shifted, over recent decades. President Suharto implemented a transmigration policy forcing many to move from one part of Indonesia to another. The Church in Maluku has stated that the transmigration policy favoured Muslim rather than Christian migration to Maluku.

The two communities had lived peacefully side by side for many years before the outbreak of hostilities in and around Ambon in January 1999. Since then, sporadic outbreaks of violence have occurred in different parts of the territory, most recently in the northern province.

Although the violence between the two communities has been described in religious terms, the origins are more complex, as I know the hon. Gentleman recognises. Nobody can say with certainty why the violence broke out when and where it did. To a large extent, it should be seen as the product of the economic crisis of 1998–99 and an adjustment to the end of 30 years of authoritarian rule.

A combination of political changes at the national level in Indonesia, migration issues, local rivalries, land disputes, as well as religious differences, have all contributed. There are also rumours of provocateurs from outside the region. All those factors provided the tinder that ignited the violence.

The official death toll, as of 16 January 2000, since the break-out of violence, is 1,902. However, since mid-December 1999, more than 1,000 people are thought to have been killed in fighting in North Maluku which began between two opposing Muslim communities. The immediate trigger appears to have been an incident on Boxing day when a Christian bus driver ran over a Muslim, but there was sporadic violence throughout December involving both Muslim and Christian communities. Although it is difficult to obtain clear and reliable information—which the hon. Gentleman emphasised—about the situation in the islands, it is apparent that both Christian and Muslim communities have suffered many deaths and casualties. Both sides have been accused of committing attacks and of committing atrocities against the other, and property and places of worship on both sides have been targeted and destroyed in two waves of violence, the first in January and February 1999, the second beginning last August. In addition to the large number of deaths, many tens of thousands of inhabitants from different villages across the Moluccas have fled their homes. Official Indonesian figures suggest there may now be as many as 205,000 internally displaced people who have fled as a direct result of the violence, while the joint assessment report issued on 6 February suggests a total of 370,000, including 123,000 who have escaped to Sulawesi.

The most recent violence took place on Halmahera and Haruku islands up to the weekend of 5 and 6 February. Ambon, which has seen some of the worst incidents, has been relatively calm since the deployment of large numbers of fresh troops in January. Although there have been reports of over-reaction and partisanship from a few police and military units, generally speaking, the reports suggest that the police and military have played a positive role in trying to calm the situation. The death toll would now be far higher if police and troops had not been deployed or had been withdrawn from the province. However, we will take account of the hon. Gentleman's well-made points about partisanship.

We welcome the positive steps that have been taken recently to address some of the key problems. The policy of sending troops who have no personal connection with the region, as well as a more careful religious balance among the troops, has helped the situation. The regional military commander is a Christian and the chief of police is a Hindu from Bali. They have succeeded in stemming the violence in Ambon and are taking steps to stop the shipment of arms into the Moluccas and to prevent troublemakers travelling from island to island to stir up trouble. The security forces are reported to have sheltered thousands of displaced people. Restoring some security to the troubled islands is an essential first step that only the military can take.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I am interested in the points made by the Minister. Will he confirm that those who say that it is separatist battle are wrong? Will he also confirm that, although it is true that the situation has tightened up recently, some 1,000 white-clad jihad warriors have arrived in the area by boat?

Mr. Battle: I do not know the details of those allegations, but they should be registered. I do not mean "allegations" pejoratively, because the hon. Gentleman's comments and the reports have to be taken seriously. The reform of the military is a key theme for the new Indonesian Government.

The role of the Indonesian Government will be crucial in finding a just and long lasting solution to the troubles in the Moluccan Islands. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, and the Foreign Secretary and I discussed the situation in the Moluccas with President Wahid when he was in London last week, following the delegation to me, led by the hon. Gentleman. President Wahid reaffirmed his commitment to secure lasting peace between the two communities. We have no reason to doubt his sincerity to find a solution, and will support him vigorously in his efforts. However, we should be under no illusion about the enormity of the challenges facing the new president. He has inherited a country of huge diversity and huge problems, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged. Separatism in Aceh, Irian Jaya and Riau, serious inter-community violence in the Moluccas, and extensive poverty in other territories present a host of regional problems. The Indonesian economy, which has been hit extremely hard by the Asian economic crisis and corruption, has yet to begin a sustained recovery. President Wahid took over a country with a poor human rights record, the legacy of authoritarian rule with which he is now trying to deal.

We are just catching up with the changes. A quiet, peaceful, democratic revolution has taken place in Indonesia. President Wahid is the first democratically elected president. In his short time in power since October he has released all political prisoners, appointed a civilian Minister of Defence, the first for more than 40 years, a Human Rights Minister, who is Acehnese, and an Attorney-General who is a committed human rights campaigner and an activist himself. Indonesia has renounced its claim to East Timor and withdrawn its troops from the territory.

The biggest challenge remains taking the military out of politics and establishing full civilian control over the military and the police. President Wahid has made important moves in doing that, such as signing a decree to retire Cabinet Ministers who are serving military officers from their military positions, which will take effect from 31 March, and appointing an admiral as head of the armed forces, an appointment that used to be held by the army.

We welcome those moves and the publication last week of the United Nations commission of inquiry report and of the Indonesians' own national inquiry into the appalling human rights violations in East Timor. The perpetrators of those crimes must be brought to justice, and we are pleased that President Wahid has shown such a strong determination to establish a credible domestic judicial process. We believe that President Wahid's democratic Government are fully committed to finding a fair and lasting solution to the regional troubles in the Moluccas and elsewhere in Indonesia, and we want to help that process in any way possible.

[Mr. Battle]

Like Indonesia, in Britain, we understand the tragedy of sectarian violence, and we have had to learn the painful lessons of fostering reconciliation between deeply divided communities. During the President's visit to London, the Prime Minister offered to share with Indonesia our experience of that process and of inter-communal relations in some of our major cities and urban areas. We can work together to share inter-faith dialogue, for example.

The hon. Member for Belfast, South has suggested previously that the answer to the violence in the Moluccas may lie in the establishment of a UN peace-keeping force to separate the two communities. As he acknowledged, however, no clear parallel can be drawn with East Timor, because the international community never accepted that East Timor was part of Indonesia, whereas the Moluccas clearly are part of Indonesia. Therefore no legal basis exists for international intervention in the Moluccas. As the hon. Gentleman said, intervention would have to be invited. Nor should a request necessarily be expected. In investigating lasting solutions to help the democratic Indonesian Government tackle the problem, we can work as friends of Indonesia, offering help when it might be useful to support the process, especially of community reconciliation. To that end, we fully support the efforts of the UN development programme, which recently conducted an initial mission to Maluku and North Maluku with the Indonesian Government, and this week presented a full needs assessment to the international donors.

Our ambassador in Jakarta, Sir Robin Christopher, accompanied the UN mission. The report was released only yesterday, and we shall now work with the Indonesian Government to assess what we can do to carry it forward. By agreement with the Indonesians, we shall build on earlier work done by the British Council in training community leaders in the Moluccas in reconciliation and conflict resolution techniques and in training the local and national Indonesian media, to which the hon. Member for Belfast, South referred, in reporting the conflict truthfully, fairly, and responsibly and without fanning the flames.

A group of Indonesian parliamentarians and journalists are in Britain this week as guests of the Government. The journalists attended a British Council seminar in Cardiff, and they and the parliamentarians are spending a week studying in detail the operation of the House, if not the Chamber. I spent some time with them yesterday, discussing the role of the media, the need for fair and truthful reporting and the relationship between the media and a modern democracy.

A key element in formulating a solution to the problems will be encouraging reconciliation between the two deeply divided communities through an inter-faith dialogue. We have been encouraged by President Wahid's determination to promote that. His own experience as leader of the world's largest Muslim organisation will be invaluable. He is widely respected as an Islamic scholar, as is his Foreign Minister. When they visited London last week, the need to raise an inter-faith dialogue internationally is something to which we could all contribute, not least because of our experience of British inner cities.

Council Housing (Negative Subsidy)

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): I welcome the opportunity to introduce a short debate on councils in negative subsidy and, in particular, the impact that the move to resource accounting for housing revenue accounts will have on those councils. Unless the current proposals are amended, they will have a dramatic and disproportionate effect on several councils whose stability will be threatened, as will their ability to cope with the programme of change and modernisation that the Government and local communities want to take place in local government. I am not having a general whinge that central Government are not doing enough for local government, but as someone who was a local councillor for 12 years until 1 May 1997, I can see the difference in what is happening now.

My local authority in Harlow has, for the first time, a local government settlement that has not led to central Government-directed cuts. It has seen the phased release of capital receipts and the replacement of compulsory competitive tendering by best value. All such measures have been welcomed; all of them were campaigned for by local government for a long time and all of them have been delivered by this Labour Government. Yet now, with the proposed move towards resource accounting, all those changes could be undone. It could, I fear, lead to cuts on a cataclysmic scale, and it is no exaggeration to use such terminology.

I shall describe the impact of the proposals on my local authority. If they were implemented unamended, there would be a cut of £3.1 million from Harlow's annual general fund budget of £12.4 million—a 25 per cent. reduction, leading to a slashing of services or a 55 per cent. increase in the council tax. I could not justify such a reduction or such an increase in the council tax. It is not as though my local authority and others in a similar position have had it easy over the past 10 to 15 years and have much fat and inefficiency to trim from the system.

Before the capping regime was introduced to small district councils when the de minimis provisions were abolished in 1992–93, Harlow had a budget of £24 million. Today, that budget is £12.4 million. I know of no other local authority in the country that has seen such a proportionate reduction in its budget. Having gone through the pain of that experience, difficult decision making, the impact of such action on the community because of the loss of services and the impact on the staff with significant numbers of redundancies and, finally, having felt that with a new Government we are on an even keel and we can go forward, now to be faced with the prospect of a further 25 per cent. cut in council services would be intolerable and unachievable.

I am not making a case for every council in negative subsidy, but I am making a case for Harlow and similar new towns, which, because of the nature of such communities, are in such a position. It is worth examining why such areas will be affected so dramatically by the proposed changes. I understand that the major part of the reason why Harlow is in negative subsidy derives from what the council did with some of its housing capital receipts in the 1980s. Some were used to reinvest in the ageing infrastructure of the new town in non-housing projects.

Why did Harlow and other new town authorities undertake such action? First, they had the money available from the sale of council houses. Secondly, there was no guidance from Ministers or civil servants that there was anything wrong in using the money for that purpose. In fact, the reverse was the case. The use of the money for that purpose was actively encouraged. Thirdly, new towns that have to consider that kind of approach face a particular problem. Unlike other communities, such towns are not masters of their own fate in terms of disposing of land and reinvesting the proceeds in regeneration. Major elements of our local communities are owned not by local councils but by the Commission for the New Towns—now CNT and English Partnerships—which has a specific mandate and direction from the Treasury to maximise the financial return on disposable assets. That generates £150 million for the Treasury per annum, largely without the community gaining. For those three reasons, councils did not have an alternative to what they did in the 1980s. It is therefore hardly surprising that that is how they spent those resources.

The nub of the problem is that that expenditure, and the on-going transfer of the interest from the notional use of capital receipts from the general fund to the housing revenue account, is a major part of Harlow's negative subsidy. That constitutes £1.4 million of the £3.1 million that I mentioned earlier. Without that statutory transfer, the problem would not be of the scale that we face today.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I assure the hon. Gentleman that that problem does not affect only new towns. I thank him for raising the issue on behalf of many other authorities, including my own in Runnymede, which are affected by the problem.

Mr. Rammell: I am aware that it it not only a problem for new towns. New towns, however, have a special problem.

The problem was also created by the commuting of CNT debt in 1996. My local authority, and others, were not engaged in an activity of which the Government were not aware. The Minister wrote to the chair of Harlow's housing committee as recently as December 1998 on the issue of the transfer of the surplus created through negative subsidy from the housing revenue account to the general fund. He stated:

"the transfer from the HRA to the General Fund is intended to benefit the authority by recognising that its overall ability to spend in a particular year should increase by the amount of the surplus."

It is clear that, as recently as a year ago, Ministers and civil servants were aware of the practice, and, on the basis of that letter, endorsed it. The sudden removal of that ability, under resource accounting, would contradict what Ministers have said and done under this and the previous Government. I acknowledge that the Government understand that there is a problem. They have already talked about transitional protection, which is welcome. Given the scale of the problem that we are facing, however, that does not go far enough.

It is also worth while arguing the case in terms of the Government's objectives in moving to resource accounting. Their motives are contradicted by the way in which capital receipts in the 1980s would be treated under the proposed system. As I read the Government's intentions, they want subsidy for local authority housing to be regarded as a national programme. Assumed surpluses in subsidy calculation would be pooled and redistributed to authorities in assumed deficit. That would involve transferring resources from councils with less relative need to those with greater relative need.

The fact that negative subsidy exists is not an accurate indicator of lack of need. It is obscured and masked by the previous use of housing capital receipts for non-housing capital purposes in the 1980s. If Harlow had not used the money for that purpose in the 1980s, its negative subsidy would be reduced by more than £1 million. Under the proposed new system, therefore, the redistribution from Harlow to other local authorities would be reduced by more than £1 million. That distortion means that the system does not accurately reflect housing or other need.

It is easy to criticise a set of proposals. However, I am arguing that there should be more than transitional protection for those local authorities that have been affected substantially. A distinction should be made between local authorities that are affected substantially and those that are not. The Government's consultation paper identified a cumulative total of about £100 million in respect of councils with negative subsidy, but I have analysed the way in which that figure breaks down, and for local authorities that are substantially affected, the amount is much less than £100 million. For example, if the system were so amended that any local authority could not lose more than 10 or 15 per cent. of its general fund standard spending assessment, the cost to the Government would be much less than £100 million.

I would argue for a maximum percentage loss as a percentage of local authority standard spending assessment, and the Government should respond favourably to that. Clearly, it would have to be provided on an on-going basis through a permanent compensatory grant.

On the specific problem of the treatment of capital receipts in the 1980s, I urge the Government not to maintain the current statutory requirement of an item 8 statutory credit transfer for councils with negative subsidy. The Government should allow the notional interest gained from the use of those capital receipts to go to the general fund, rather than the housing revenue account. In my local authority, that measure alone would resolve £1.4 million of £3.1 million, and other new town local authorities would derive a similar benefit.

Substantial transitional protection must be provided for a number of years. The changes, which will occur in just one or two years, will have a huge impact on local councils and cause major problems. This might seem a rather arcane issue, but to judge by the number of hon. Members in attendance it has given rise to considerable concern. I hope that, in the long term, the Government's response will be positive, but I am saying on my constituents' behalf that we need help on this issue. The local authority in Harlow and authorities elsewhere are not to blame. They were simply doing something that the system had enabled them to do for many years. Ministers knew that they were doing it, and they were actively encouraged to do it in the light of circumstances. I see no reason why those local authorities—and, more importantly, their communities—should be penalised in such a dramatic way.

Good government is about pursuing sensible reform, and this Government are demonstrating that in a number of different areas. Sometimes, Mr. Winterton, sensible reform—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. In this Chamber, there are four hon. Members to whom reference should be made not by their names but by the titles, Madam Deputy Speaker or Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have hestitated to draw that to hon. Members' attention but, whether or not we merit those titles, that is the decision of the House.

Mr. Rammell: I ask for forgiveness, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That goes to show that I should not listen to the radio programme "Yesterday in Parliament". According to last week's report on proceedings in Westminster Hall, an acting Deputy Speaker said that Deputy Speakers should be referred to by name. I apologise for my confusion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I can help hon. Members. On certain occasions, in addition to the four hon. Members who have been appointed as additional Deputy Speakers, senior members of Madam Speaker's Chairmen's Panel may also chair sittings in Westminster Hall. They are addressed as "Chairman" or by their surnames.

Mr. Rammell: I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for that information. I am duly put in my place.

I was saying that good government is about pursuing sensible reform. Some kinds of sensible reform, which are otherwise perfectly desirable, may have unintended, adverse and dramatic consequences. The move towards resource accounting, and the impact on councils in terms of negative subsidy, is an example of that.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): Is my hon. Friend aware that the council that stands to lose most in this respect is Dacorum borough council? Because of its huge overhang of commitments, almost every worthwhile project in my area is on hold, possibly for ever.

Mr. Rammell: I am aware of that, and my hon. Friend makes a telling point. The change is like a sword of Damocles hanging over local authorities that are affected. It puts a stop to the kind of long-term planning and modernisation that I know that the Government want to see in local councils. How can we begin to undertake such modernisation processes if such large cuts, or increases in council tax, are to be borne as a result of the proposals?

I understand much of the rationale behind the Government's move towards resource accounting, but I hope that they recognise the unintended consequences that may result in terms of the scale of cuts that would affect my local authority and many others. I strongly urge the Minister to reconsider the matter and amend the proposals.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Beverley Hughes): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) on his success in securing the debate, and his courage in raising the subject of housing finance, which is highly complex, as hon. Members who have been involved in it will be aware. He expressed those complex issues well, and it is right and timely that matters of concern to his constituency and elsewhere should be aired.

As my hon. Friend knows, I cannot give a complete or final answer to all his questions today, because we are currently consulting on the proposals, and it would be wrong for us to come to any decision before all those who feel that they will be most affected—such as his constituents—have had an opportunity to comment, and we have been able to consider their responses. However, I hope that I can respond to some of his concerns about the impact of our proposals on Harlow and other authorities in terms of so-called negative subsidy.

One of the problems with the present system of local authority finance is that it no longer meets the demands that are placed on it. We recognise that, and are committed to reforming it. Last year, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and the Regions announced proposals to improve the system. We propose to introduce resource accounting into the housing revenue account, and to change it to a purely landlord account. As always when such a change is being considered, it is the details, and how the details will affect people, that have to be worked through. We accept that. Concern about the effects of those details has been well expressed by my hon. Friend.

The purpose of the housing element part of the housing revenue account subsidy is to bridge any shortfall between notional income and notional expenditure in each authority. It covers expenditure on maintenance, management and debt charges, and other miscellaneous expenditure. The housing element also takes account of rental income and interest received by an authority on mortgages and investments. When we do the calculation, we find that some authorities have a notional surplus on their housing element, while others have a notional deficit. That means that there are more resources in some parts of the country than would be needed to provide a standard level of service, and too few resources in other parts of the country. In other words, there is an inequity in the distribution of resources.

We need a mechanism to allow us to transfer those resources to where the housing need is greatest. The mechanism that we currently use reduces another subsidy stream—the rent rebate subsidy—by the amount of any surplus, so there is an offset. That does not entirely work in the case of Harlow and about 60 other local authorities, because their notional surpluses are so large that they still have a surplus even when the whole of their rent rebate subsidy has been taken into account.

Authorities go into negative subsidy when they have very low debt or significant assumed investment income. Some authorities, for example, have a small number of properties in their HRA and there is perhaps significant income, often from the assumed investment of the set-aside resources generated by the transfer. Other authorities have a large and active HRA, but very little debt, and a below-average proportion of tenants available for rent rebate subsidy. As my hon. Friend said, authorities such as Harlow took responsibility for property from the Commission for the New Towns when it was wound up, but the debt that was transferred was commuted in 1996, so such authorities have relatively little debt. That is what creates the equation for them.

There is a legislative requirement for authorities in negative subsidy to transfer the amount of their remaining actual surplus into the general fund. The sums involved, as we have heard today, can be quite substantial for some of the 60 authorities. Nationally, we expect that about £100 million will be transferred from housing revenue accounts into authorities' general funds.

Those transfers can make a major contribution in individual cases to the amount of money that is available in an authority's general fund, which will either allow the authority to spend more than it could otherwise afford or allow the level of council tax to be held down. We expect some £3.3 million to be transferred in the case of Harlow in 1999–2000.

Our proposals for the changes to the housing finance system will also do away with that system. We believe that it is wrong that local authority tenants, who are for the most part among the poorest in the community, should subsidise the generality of council taxpayers in an authority. Such a cross-subsidy cannot in principle be right. I take my hon. Friend's point about the way in which that situation has developed over many years in constituencies such as Harlow, but that is not a justification for not doing anything about a cross subsidy.

Mr. Rammell: In principle I accept my hon. Friend's argument, but will she bear in mind the fact that the 50-plus legislative change introduced during the last Conservative Government created a stack of cards? The problem that the Government face is that councils responded by pulling out one card. That has many dramatic knock-on consequences.

Ms Hughes: I accept that the situation of some authorities, such as Harlow, has arisen because of the actions of the previous Government, and that the authorities acted in good faith. Nevertheless, it is not right that a cross-subsidy should effectively be paid for by some of the poorest members of the community. My hon. Friend's arguments cannot be used as a reason for doing nothing. That is our starting point.

We intend to make two changes to the housing finance system that will first reduce and later end this cross-subsidy. The first step will be introduced in April 2001. From that date we intend to pay authorities an additional subsidy as part of their housing element, which will be called the major repairs allowance, the MRA. It will help to focus scarce resources on local authority housing repairs to maintain the value of those assets, and we hope that it will provide a more stable framework for housing authorities. We do not yet know how much money will be available for MRA—that depends on the outcome of the spending review—but it will substantially reduce the assumed surpluses on authorities' housing element. In particular, it will reduce, and possibly in some cases extinguish completely, the transfers that authorities in negative subsidy would otherwise continue to make to their general funds. We are consulting separately on the MRA.

Even when the MRA is paid, some authorities will continue to cross-subsidise council tax payers. That problem will be solved by the more effective mechanism that we plan to introduce to capture and recycle all housing element surpluses. We are consulting on that mechanism now. To introduce it would require primary legislation. Our objective is to pool the assumed surpluses on the housing element across all authorities, so that they can be distributed according to need. The change will mean that authorities in negative subsidy will no longer be able to transfer resources to their general fund; instead, they will transfer the resources to the pool for redistribution to other housing authorities.

Criticism may be made that those pooling mechanisms are not in principle correct and that surpluses are local resources that should remain with the authority. That may be at the root of some of my hon. Friend's points. We take the broader view that local authority housing is not a purely local service, although it is managed locally. It is a national resource and needs to be considered as such, not least because it is funded extensively by the taxpayer centrally. The financial structures must reflect that.

Mr. Hammond: Does the Minister envisage that councils that are forced to transfer to the pool will keep their rents static and gradually allow the surplus to be eroded over time?

Ms Hughes: No. The equation that will produce the notional surplus or deficit for any authority will take into account not only rents, as it does now, but the proposed changes, including the major repairs allowance. It will be a different way of calculating whether an authority is in surplus or deficit. We need a system that can ensure that the best use is made of national resources that can be devoted to the housing sector. That means finding a way of allocating those resources to take account of relative need.

We realise that the introduction of the major repairs allowance and, in the longer term, the pooling mechanism, will have a significant effect on the finances of some authorities, such as Harlow and Dacorum, which will remain in negative subsidy even after the introduction of MRA. My hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) has explained some of the difficulties. To end the cross-subsidy from housing to council tax as soon as we introduced the new measures would cause difficulties for the authorities concerned. We want to address those difficulties.

As I have said, we are consulting on our detailed proposals for the changes to the housing finance system. As part of that consultation, we asked whether transitional arrangements should be introduced for negative subsidy authorities. I cannot pre-empt the results of the consultation, but my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow has made some important points and suggestions for that process. I know that a number of authorities have expressed concern that transitional measures would not be available from April 2001, but only at the second stage when pooling is introduced. I assure my hon. Friend that we have not ruled out the introduction of transitional measures from April 2001, when the MRA is paid for the first time. We need to consider both the form that such measures might take and the authorities to which they might apply, a point that my hon. Friend made clearly. We would consult on our detailed proposals for the transitional measures in due course.

I assure my hon. Friends that the Government are aware of the difficulties that they have raised. We have not ruled out transitional measures in the first phase of the introduction of MRA, but want the transitional arrangements to soften the impact as far as possible. Because of our longer-term objectives to produce a fairer housing finance system that relates national support to the areas of greatest need, this is a process on which we must embark. However, I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow for providing me with the opportunity to make the position as clear as I can. I assure him that we shall listen to the points that he and others have made and shall consult on them particularly on the arrangements for transition.

Question put and agreed to.

Air Services Agreements

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

9.30 am

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central): May I begin by saying how pleased I am to see so many people here this morning, from across the party political divide? The issue of air transport is fundamental to consumer choice, which should be at the centre of any such debate, and to economic development. If I may speak slightly parochially, the statistics showing the importance of Manchester airport to the national economy as well as that of the north-west are a testimony to the tremendous importance of air travel. Manchester airport already delivers £500 million to the economy of the north-west and about £1.7 billion to the national economy. It provides 85,000 full-time equivalent jobs. It is important not only to the future of the north-west region, but to the whole of the north of England: indeed, it is not fanciful to say that it is one part of the infrastructure that is vital to the future of the national economy. It is in that context that I make my first point.

For far too long, Governments have shown a strange reluctance to recognise the importance of airports outside the south-east. Airport policy has been fixated on the development of Heathrow and Gatwick. Regional airports were considered as a bolt-on, viewed simply in terms of the way in which they affected the development of air transport into the south-east. Such an approach may have been understandable, but it is unacceptable in terms of regional development and, indeed, runs counter to the national interest.

In the past, air transportation initiatives have been driven by the need to protect the interests of BAA, the airport operator, or British Airways, rather than those of the consumer. That view was fundamentally mistaken. I restate that the central issue is how to develop consumer choice—how we give consumers the freedom to exercise the choice to fly from where they are best served.

In the non-south-east air travel system, BAA and British Airways have been at best uncertain friends. I pay tribute to the importance of British Airways to the development of Manchester airport and other non-London parts of the system. British Airways is, of course, the dominant United Kingdom carrier. Nevertheless, it has too frequently adopted what it believes is a reasonable, commercially sensitive approach, leading to withdrawal of services or the failure to develop services outside Heathrow and Gatwick. Most recently, British Airways withdrew its service from Manchester to Islamabad, justifying its decision on the preposterous ground of consumer choice. It is difficult to explain to people living in Macclesfield, for example, how their choice is increased when their travel to Pakistan involves them taking a detour through a London airport.

In the past, British Airways has responded to competitive pressure only when forced to by other airlines choosing to use Manchester. British Airways has then put on rival services. My critique of British Airways is not meant to be hostile—rather the opposite. It is a recognition that it is important to the development of regional air transport. However, it will always operate in its own commercial interests, which we understand.

In the same way, nothing that I say should be seen as a criticism of BAA. It is a matter of practicality that, for a long time to come, consumers in my city and region will have to look to the London airport system for many of their long-haul travel requirements. Flights to Africa, the far east and Latin America, for example, will involve routeing from Manchester through either Heathrow or Gatwick. Therefore, it does not serve the interests of Manchester or any other region outside London for air travel in and out of Heathrow or Gatwick to be restricted.

For every passenger who travels through Heathrow or Gatwick, two passengers travel from United Kingdom regions to European airports, such as Charles de Gaulle, Schiphol and Frankfurt and then go further. That is an astonishing statistic; it means that the use of United Kingdom resources is already being eroded as people are forced to make a different choice. This is not efficient for consumers either in terms of economics or in terms of choice. Consumers are best served if they can fly from an airport that can be conveniently reached from the place where their journey begins. That is best enhanced by the development of a strong regional airport framework. I include Manchester, of course—but everything I say about Manchester could equally be applied to Aberdeen, Glasgow, Prestwick, Newcastle, Leeds-Bradford or Birmingham. This is not simply an argument about Manchester; it is about maximising consumer choice across the nation.

Slots in the London airport system are being severely restricted. That is a fact of life. Slot reductions—or slot rationing, to be accurate—impact on what happens regionally. It takes place not just at Heathrow and Gatwick but more widely. I mentioned passengers travelling through European airports. Last spring, KLM began running a service from Sheffield to Amsterdam. Passengers from South Yorkshire could end their journeys there or—which was more likely—travel on from Schiphol to their final destination. However, KLM came across a slot problem at Schiphol and has now ceased operating that service. Only if services are developed directly from the point of departure such as Sheffield can we be certain that consumer choice will be maximised in the long term.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to give us some comfort on my central theme. We want this notion of fifth freedoms—rather an inelegant expression—maximised so that regional airports can benefit. By fifth freedoms, we mean the ability of airlines to fly into our regional airports from their country of origin and go on elsewhere. Where that happens, it is good for airlines and for the travelling public.

In a rare moment of weakness, I will admit that Manchester airport faces a problem that Heathrow and Gatwick do not have. Demand for services from Manchester is clearly not as strong as at the London airports. Any airline that get its hands on a slot at Heathrow will take it, so Manchester's argument for fifth freedoms does not necessarily parallel Heathrow's. Heathrow can fill slots simply by offering them. Manchester's position is different, as the airport is still developing and needs to encourage airlines to come in. The ability for an airline to fly from its point of departure, disembark and pick up passengers at Manchester, and fly on elsewhere would give that airline a strong guarantee that it would make more money than it would if the service were restricted to flying from its point of departure to Manchester and back again.

[Mr. Tony Lloyd]

I ask the Minister to think radically about regional airports and fifth freedom rights. There once seemed to be a total ideological blockage on the concept of fifth freedom rights, but we have seen some movement. However, not all the changes have been helpful. For example, FedEx was granted the right to operate fifth freedoms from Prestwick airport for commercial services—freight. As a result, FedEx was able to fly from the United States to Prestwick and on to the far east. Polar Air, which had flown from Manchester, chose to relocate at Prestwick precisely because it could have fifth freedoms from Prestwick but not at Manchester. It is ludicrous that an airline should have to relocate for economically rational reasons because fifth freedoms are available at one airport and not another.

I warmly applaud the decision to grant Olympic Airways the right to fly from Athens to Manchester, and from Manchester to Boston. It is hoped that flights may go on to Toronto, although there are difficulties on the Canadian side. I hope that the Canadians will recognise that it is not in their national interest to restrict flights.

That decision displayed a welcome change of thinking in central Government, but I must temper such free public applause with some criticism by asking Ministers to liberate their thinking. Ideally, we would like unlimited fifth freedom access to regional airports. That idea receives much support from airports, including Manchester, that would welcome the ability to develop their own air services without restriction. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions argues that a bargaining process must be maintained, and that the Government are the custodian of long-term development. It is suggested that short-term consumer satisfaction may not always be best in the long term, and I accept that argument.

However, any restrictions on development of air transportation and the ability of consumers to use air services should be imposed in a way that is consistent with consumer choice, and, therefore, with leisure patterns, family travel and business travel. Too often, agreements on Manchester have been tied to decisions affecting the interests of London airports or British Airways. In the case of Olympic Airways, for example the knock-on deal with Greece—welcome though it was—was that British Airways should have parallel rights in that country. I have no objection to our increasing the capability of a British carrier, but I would be concerned if such trade-offs might jeopardise development at Manchester.

Let me give two examples. First, Biman, the Bangladeshi airline, wanted to travel in and out of Britain. It was offered flights to Manchester, but it wanted flights to London and was not prepared to accept Manchester as a second-best option. The irony is that Biman would have accepted a deal if it had been told that it could fly into Manchester and fly on from there. Forced to enter into a bargaining process, Biman was not prepared to accept a deal. Manchester has been frustrated for no clear national gain.

The other example involves Singapore Airlines, which was offered the chance to fly from Singapore through Manchester to New York, but was not prepared to accept that as a second-best option to flying via London.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Chris Mullin): Is my hon. Friend suggesting that we should unilaterally grant fifth freedom rights to countries in which our carriers are subject to restrictions that we would not tolerate?

Mr. Lloyd: No. I want the Minister, in any negotiation on regional airports—Manchester, of course, but also Birmingham, Sheffield and others—to bear in mind the development needs of those airports. It is, of course, necessary to put pressure on others to exercise the same freedoms and develop the same services that we have, but we must get away from thinking that development in Manchester must involve some deal for London airports or for British Airways as the national carrier. We want regional transport to develop for the sake of the regions, but also for the sake of the national airport system.

Air travel is growing enormously, and that will continue. There are also restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and other major international airports such as Charles de Gaulle and Schiphol. If British people from outside London are to enjoy maximum choice, we need strong development of regional airports and a strategy that sees them not as an add-on, but as a central part of national air travel.

If that development does not come, Heathrow and Gatwick will suffer. They are already at saturation point, and demand for development at Gatwick will be locally resisted on environmental grounds. There are restrictions on how many people can fly through Heathrow. Granting fifth freedom rights to regional airports is therefore strongly in the national interest.

I know that negotiations are taking place on that, particularly regarding Pakistan's PIA, which may fly into Manchester. The Minister may not be able to comment on the negotiations, which have taken place in recent days and even hours.

My appeal is that we should unblock the thinking that regional development must be conditioned by the view that the true national interest lies in the London airport system; it does not lie there, it never did and it certainly never will. Regional development is a national good. I look forward to a strong indication from the Minister that that old thinking is now a thing of the past, and that in future there will be a strong endorsement of flights into and beyond airports such as Manchester.

I realise that other Members want to speak and I hope that I have said enough to give the flavour of the matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Mr. Goggins) is in rather a difficult position as regards the debate, because he is a Parliamentary Private Secretary. I pay tribute to him because he provided the instigation for the debate, as the Member in whose constituency Manchester airport lies. He has played an important role in pushing for the developments to which I referred.

9.50 am

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate. I do so simply and solely as the Member of Parliament for Solihull.

International access to regional airports is of considerable importance to my local airport, Birmingham international, where only foreign airlines currently provide long-haul services to key business and leisure destinations. Indeed, a previous Conservative Administration first brought that about, by allowing American carriers to start services to regional airports from the United States without reciprocal rights for UK airlines. As a result, Birmingham now has two daily transatlantic scheduled services.

In the absence of UK airlines that are willing to serve regional airports such as Birmingham, the Government should encourage foreign carriers to do so instead, on a third or fourth freedom basis, but also on a fifth-freedom basis. UK airlines should not be able to prevent foreign airlines from doing that through the influence that they can exert over existing bilateral negotiations.

If foreign carriers were allowed to operate such services, the economic benefits to the regions would significantly outweigh any detrimental impact on UK airlines. It would also demonstrate that the Government were looking after the interests of UK consumers, who increasingly want to fly from their local airport, irrespective of the nationality of the airlines that operate there. That last category also includes me.

9.53 am

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I am glad to have the opportunity to say a few words in this important debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) on initiating the debate. Like him, my main purpose in speaking is to draw attention to the effects on services at Manchester airport. However, my remarks also apply to the other regional airports.

Manchester airport is not merely the airport for Manchester; it serves the whole north-west region and beyond—Yorkshire, for example. Without question, it is the most successful regional airport in England. That is because the former Manchester city council was always prepared to invest in it.

In the 1960s, in Manchester, I was a backroom boy, as a Labour party political organiser, when decisions were taken to develop the airport. People said, "It will not pay until 2000." Yet those developments of the 1960s have long since disappeared as air traffic has grown—terminals 2 and 3 and other developments make what was done at that time seem insignificant.

The difficulty is that we still expect people to travel into the country via London, and we should not do so. A few years ago, I was asked—as a representative of the House—to visit NATO in Brussels. I had to travel on a Monday morning and was told by the House authorities that I had to come down to London, because they expected me to travel from here. No one took into account the facts that the fare was dearer, that I had to come down to London on the Sunday before, or that a convenient flight from Manchester arrived in Brussels 10 minutes before the flight that I was expected to catch from London. None of that was included in the equation. It was only when I insisted that I would not go if I could not travel from Manchester, that it was conceded that I could do so. Even our own House authorities sometimes do not do all that they can to encourage the development of our regional airports.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central referred to fifth freedoms; that is extremely important. We want more freedom to be opened up. However, I understand the difficulty to which my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary referred: such reciprocal arrangements can pose problems. Nevertheless, it is nonsense for a plane to touch down at an airport without being able to pick up passengers—it is not economic.

At times, all Members who have an interest in regional airports have received letters from various companies, such as Singapore Airlines, which want to fly into different airports but have not been given slots to do so. In many cases, they battle for several years before they are finally allowed to run flights into those airports. We want other airlines to be able to do that too.

I regret the decision of British Airways not to use Manchester airport for their flights to Islamabad. That is a retrograde step because many people in the north-west want to travel to Islamabad with BA. It is true that they can use another airline, but they should have been given the choice of using BA.

There is always too much concentration on bringing people to the south-east. How many tourists come into the country through London who would have found that the north-west, or even Scotland or other parts of the UK, have as much to offer? They could fly into those places and visit them, rather than having to travel into London and fight their way out of it to get to other parts of the nation. Instead of visiting Stratford-on-Avon and other parts of the country for a couple of days, they could base their holiday in those places and visit London from them.

I look forward to the Minister's response on these important issues, although I accept that they are difficult ones. We want our airports to be given more freedom to develop their traffic potential, so that airlines can use all the regional airports. We also want our airlines to have the same freedoms to pick up passengers in other countries. The point is to give passengers—the consumers—what they want. We do not want them to experience the difficulty of having to come to London and to travel from Heathrow or Gatwick when it is not necessary. That is a major problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central has focused attention on these issues. As a Member representing a Lancashire constituency, I support his case, because the bounds of Manchester airport go well beyond Lancashire. We want Manchester airport—and others, such as Birmingham—to grow and flourish, and to give passengers freedom of choice.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I support fully the excellent case advanced by the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd). Like the hon. Gentleman, I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Mr. Goggins), who I hope will catch your eye, Dr. Clark, in the debate. He plays an important role as the chairman of the all-party group that seeks to promote and represent the interests of Manchester international airport.

I speak as the Member for Macclesfield, an important constituency in the north-west. That area contributes substantially to the economy and to the viability of the region. The benefits that flow to my constituency from the locality and the existence of Manchester international airport are very great.

I hope that the Minister will understand from the number of Members present in Westminster Hall today the strong feelings that exist about the importance of regional airports. From my point of view, Manchester is important, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) pointed out, Birmingham international airport is, too. Regional airports play an important role not only in transport, but in the overall economy of the United Kingdom.

We hear that there are problems with overcrowded skies in the south-east. Why do the Government not direct their attention to those parts of the country, such as the north-west, that could take the pressure off the south-east? There is room in the sky and runway capacity in the north-west. Many of us will be more than aware that the second runway at Manchester airport will come on stream in the not-too-distant future. As the hon. Member for Manchester, Central said, Manchester is only too willing to accept additional flights and they will bring great benefits to the economy of the region.

The north-west economic strategy identifies the development of Manchester international airport and other airports in the area as very important to the future prosperity and development of the region. In particular, it identifies the system of international route licences operated by successive Governments as a continuing constraint on the growth of international scheduled flights "which are the key to attracting new investment and supporting economic growth".

The Government rightly state—successive Governments have done so—that they want continuing economic growth in the United Kingdom. A more realistic approach to regional airports could make a major contribution to support the growth that we all want to see.

The hon. Gentleman cited statistics on Manchester airport. He said that, in 1998, it had been estimated that the United Kingdom income impact of Manchester airport was £1.7 billion, of which £585 million was in the north-west. As I am sure we all agree, that is a dramatic statistic. The hon. Gentleman also referred to the impact on total United Kingdom employment, which was estimated to be 85,000 full-time equivalents with more than 15,400 jobs on the airport site itself. He did not add that the 1999 census on working population shows that 17,900 people are employed on the site at the airport, an increase of about 2,500 in 12 months, which is the equivalent to the creation of seven new jobs every day. Is that not something that we want to encourage and to continue?

Forecasts of traffic at Manchester suggest that the airport could be handling—this is an amazing figure—40.7 million passengers in 2015, with a UK income impact of £4 billion to £5 billion and an employment impact of between 137,000 and 177,000 full-time equivalents. The catalytic effects, such as those on tourism, are not included in those estimates. However, the passenger forecasts are underpinned by the assumption an increased range of destinations will be served, and frequencies offered in international scheduled services. The hon. Gentleman ably made that case. I emphasis to the Minister that regional economic impacts will not be achieved if further liberalisation of air services does not take place.

I stress that several Members from across the political divide are here today to highlight the importance of regional airports. My hon. Friend the Member for Solihull made an excellent case for Birmingham international airport. Before I represented Macclesfield, I lived close to what was then Elmdon airport in Birmingham. I know just how important the international airport is to that major industrial centre. Obviously, I claim that Manchester is the second capital of the United Kingdom and its industrial contribution to the country is substantial. In 2002, Manchester will host the Commonwealth games and, if many colleagues visit Manchester, they will see a city and a region that has been transformed in recent years.

As a Conservative, I am happy to pay tribute to the contribution that the Labour-controlled council has made over the years to the economic success of Manchester. Members from the north-west appreciate the role of Manchester and there is often cross-party support for many of the actions that are necessary to ensure that the city can continue to play a major role in the economy not only of the north-west, but of the United Kingdom as a whole.

There is full liberalisation of air services in the European Union and the Government have accepted that. It has resulted in many new services to regional airports throughout the United Kingdom. There is unilateral access to UK regional airports for United States carriers on what is known as the third and fourth freedom basis. That is a complicated term, but those who understand the subject know what it means. The Government have also accepted that, and it has resulted in additional services to Manchester and to Birmingham.

The transport White Paper identified a role for regional airports to maximise the contribution that they make to local and regional economies. In addition, as I have already said, they should reduce the pressure on congested south-east airports. I refer particularly to Heathrow and Gatwick, but I might also include in that equation Luton and Stansted because they contribute to the overcrowded skies in that part of the United Kingdom.

We need also further to minimise unnecessary surface journeys. Expanded scheduled services to Manchester, Birmingham and elsewhere in the regions can make a major contribution to that. The hon. Member for Manchester, Central has drawn attention to FedEx and the problems resulting from its development, which has contributed directly to an increase in lorry movements on our roads, which the Government say they want to reduce.

I say to the Minister that regional airports cannot fulfil the role that the Government and others want them to fulfil while they are subject to bilateral constraints that prevent services from operating where there is demand.

Airports are major economic engines in the areas that they serve. They create local jobs, on and off airport sites, offering the widest range of skills. As the hon. Member for Macclesfield, I know that they stimulate the local economy, and that is a prerequisite for social inclusion. The regional liberalisation deal has had only limited take-up, and further action is necessary. It is not the correct mechanism; it is flawed and misunderstood, and it has not maximised the potential contribution that regional airports can make.

I hope that the Minister will respond positively to the debate. The subject raised and initiated by the hon. Member for Manchester, Central has strong cross-party support. I hope that the Minister will try to get his Department and the Government to make changes that will bring immense benefits not only to Manchester international airport, which is so important to my constituency, but to other regional airports that can contribute to the improvement in the UK economy.

10.12 am

Mr. Paul Goggins (Wythenshawe and Sale, East): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) on securing this important debate, and thank him for his warm remarks about my role. I thank also the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) for his warm remarks, and I pay tribute to his role in articulating strong arguments in favour of Manchester airport in particular, and regional airports in general. It is important that different parties and regions are represented in the debate.

My starting point is as the Member of Parliament for Wythenshawe and Sale, East, which is home to Manchester airport. As we all know, there have been many debates about the development and growth of the airport, not least about the construction of the second runway. Opinion in my constituency and throughout the region is strongly in favour of the airport's development because 18,000 people have a job there and the possibility of future growth is a great cause for optimism in the local economy.

The regional development agency, local businesses and the local authorities that own the airport all agree that it is a major driver in the regional economy. It connects the people of the north-west with destinations throughout the world. Crucially, it is a gateway through which global companies come and invest in the north-west of England.

Clearly, there is no dispute that the Government acknowledge the role of regional airports in transport policy and economic development, and they said as much in the 1998 transport White Paper. In that White Paper the Government promised greater liberalisation and they have already delivered the open-skies policy for airports other than Heathrow and Gatwick, provided that there are reciprocal arrangements with other countries and carriers.

At about the same time as the White Paper was published, we had a report on regional air services from the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee. The report went further than the White Paper and made a strong recommendation for "unilateral liberalisation of international access to regional airports, including fifth freedom rights, in addition to the limited liberalisation that has been announced."

Clearly the Government have not so far heeded that advice, and no doubt the Minister will go to some lengths to explain why that is so. The debate gives us a good opportunity to take stock and assess the current position.

I want to suggest, as colleagues have done, ways in which the system of air agreements could be improved, but we have to set those recommendations against the success that has already been achieved in the UK's aviation industry. As a whole, it contributes some £10 billion to gross domestic product. UK airports are now handling around 160 million passengers a year, and it is predicted that by 2015 that number will almost have doubled.

Some 180,000 people are employed directly at airports, and a further 200,000 are employed in service industries that support the aviation industry. A figure that bears repeating is that for every extra 1 million passengers who are attracted to airports in this country, 1,000 jobs are created. The industry is therefore important and already very successful.

As we look to the future, we have to tackle a number of constraints. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central spoke eloquently about the first, which concerns not only a physical but a psychological and cultural barrier: the belief that one can only run an international airport from London—that regional airports are only there to offer holiday charter and low-cost flights and are served by low-cost carriers, and serious international flights must go to Heathrow or Gatwick.

Mr. Pike: On that point, should we not stop calling Manchester a regional airport? Is it not a national airport that happens to be in the north-west?

Mr. Goggins: Indeed, I generally refer to it as Manchester international airport, because that is not only the reality but reflects the airport's aspiration. Just over half the flights out of Manchester are chartered, and just under half are scheduled, and the majority of the scheduled flights are international. The aspiration is to increase not only the number of passengers travelling through Manchester airport, but the number of scheduled flights and the proportion of such flights with international destinations. Manchester airport is becoming more international, and that should be the aspiration of other regional airports.

If it is possible for Denmark, which has a GDP smaller than that of Manchester airport's catchment area, to have an airport such as Copenhagen, there is no reason why a regional airport such as Manchester should not also be an international hub. If Milan and Frankfurt, as regional capitals, have major international airports, why cannot some of our regional airports also be major international airports? The London-centred mindset must be fought on a number of fronts, but it is particularly important to overcome it in aviation.

The second constraint is economic development. Time will not stand still, and if we do not succeed in turning some of our regional airports into major hubs, business will simply pass us by and passengers and carriers will go to other European international airports. My hon. Friend quoted a figure that demonstrated that far too many people from the north-west have to travel internationally via London, but twice as many go to international airports in Europe, such as Paris and Amsterdam. If we do not act now, when Gatwick and Heathrow are full to bursting, passengers and carriers will go to other European hub airports, and we will miss the opportunity fully to develop our regional capacity.

The third issue is fifth freedoms—an inelegant phrase, as my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central said, but essential to the development of long-haul services to our regional airports. Fifth freedoms have been essential to the development of Manchester airport's long-haul routes. Qantas Airways first developed its route from Melbourne to Manchester via Amsterdam, and other airlines did similarly—Emirates Airlines from Dubai via Zurich, and flights from Hong Kong via Amsterdam and Paris, and Pakistani International Airlines from Islamabad via Copenhagen.

The end result of the development of a fifth freedom may eventually be a direct route, but fifth freedoms are essential for carriers if they are to minimise risk, to develop passenger numbers, and to develop the market. As my hon. Friend said, the present negotiations on fifth freedoms are far too London-centred, and far too focused on the interests of Heathrow and Gatwick and the demand of international carriers for slots there. As a result, we are missing the opportunity to develop travel through our regional airports.

The fourth point to be confronted is a current issue. It seems that many of the partial liberalisations and mini deals are not working or are beginning to unravel. We all hoped that mini deals would lead to progress, but I fear that they are taking us in the wrong direction. Only last week, the possible mini deal between the UK and the United States appeared to have stalled. That has massive implications for Manchester and the north-west region.

Mr. Winterton: Has the hon. Gentleman received the letter that I have from British Midland, commenting on the failure of the talks between the UK Government and the United States, which could put under threat the 2,000 jobs that British Midland had hoped to create, many of them in the region? Does that not show how important it is that we get it right?

Mr. Goggins: I entirely agree. As I understand it, Mr. Deputy Speaker, some 600 jobs have been lost from Manchester as a result of the difficulties in negotiating that mini deal.

We heard earlier about the fifth freedoms granted to FedEx and Polar Air for daily flights to Prestwick, but we also heard the recent announcement from FedEx that it is suspending those flights. FedEx also wanted fifth freedoms to Stansted, and regards it as unprofitable to have fifth freedoms into Prestwick only.

Although the intention behind the partial liberalisations and mini deals is entirely honourable, they do not always work out as we hope. There is a strong argument for removing uncertainty by taking the politics out of the matter. We should leave it to the airports and carriers to work out the routes and services, making those decisions on the basis of their commercial assessments. I recognise, as the my hon. Friend the Minister pointed out in his intervention, that the protectionist attitude that exists in some other countries and among some carriers must be confronted, but if we do not move ahead, we will miss a huge opportunity to develop our regional airports.

Manchester airport will soon have a second runway. It is under construction as this debate takes place. The airport has the aspiration, and by 2015 will have the capacity, for 40 million passengers a year to travel through it. Gatwick and Heathrow are already approaching capacity, with little or no likelihood of further expansion in the near future.

We have a choice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Either we create a level playing field which gives regional airports in this country a real opportunity to grow, or passengers will simply move elsewhere. They will travel via Paris, Frankfurt, Amsterdam or Copenhagen. The implications for jobs, growth and prosperity in our regions are immense.

Dr. Michael Clark (in the Chair): Order. For the convenience of hon. Members, may I point out that there are four Deputy Speakers allocated to this Chamber. I am not one of them. I am a member of the Chairmen's Panel, standing in for a Deputy Speaker. Therefore it would be appropriate to address me by my name.

I call Mr. Harold Best, confident of the fact that he will accommodate me by bearing in mind that I have three Front-Bench speakers to call, starting at 10.30 am.

Mr. Harold Best (Leeds, North–West): Thank you, Dr. Clark. I echo the observations made by previous speakers about the importance of international airports in various corners of the United Kingdom. It is difficult to overstate their importance to industry, commerce and people.

The idea of regional international airports is not new. We have heard references to cross-party support, and there is also trans-Pennine support for Manchester's airport. When I was a member of West Yorkshire county council, we joined others in trying to impress upon the Government of the day that such an international airport should be developed in the north of England.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): Is my hon. Friend aware that in my constituency there will, we hope, be Doncaster Finningley international airport, which will be the only airport in Yorkshire able to provide the long-haul services that our region desperately needs and the finance that Manchester currently enjoys?

Mr. Best: I am aware of those proposals, but my hon. Friend is not entirely right. The airport in my constituency, Leeds-Bradford, has that capacity now and for some years has been able to handle flights to anywhere in the world. Concorde is a regular visitor to the Yeadon site in my constituency—not always welcome, however, because of the noise that it makes and the pollution that it leaves behind.

The freedom to get goods, services and people in and out of a region is essential for the future of the northern part of the United Kingdom. That is why I find that intriguing phrase, "the fifth freedom", so attractive. However, there are problems, which it would be remiss not to mention.

There is resistance in my constituency to the further development of an intercontinental airport, because of the huge increase in the associated road traffic and the pollution that that might bring. With considerable foresight, the planners and developers of the international airport in Manchester supported the idea of a permanent rail link between that airport and Leeds city centre. It is now possible to travel freely in both directions, making use of a good service.

An important factor in the control of pollution and damage to the local environment is the simple, almost accidental fact that the railway track that serves Harrogate through Leeds passes within three quarters of a mile of the end of the airport runway at Yeadon. A study is under way to examine the feasibility of extending and developing a terminal for the railway service at Yeadon airport. That will not detract from other facilities, but will expand in an intelligent and environmentally friendly way the services essential to such an airport.

I am mindful of your injunctions, Dr. Clark.

In my constituency, we welcome the expansion of air transport. It is important that it should be seen to be fair and evenly distributed throughout the United Kingdom—"fair" not just in the sense that one should play the game fairly, like cricket, but fair in the sense of industrial, commercial and travel opportunity for the people of the United Kingdom.

Only those who have to face the certain knowledge of the nightmare journey from the north of England to Gatwick or Heathrow to catch a plane to other parts of the world understand the pain of travelling and the massive inconvenience that it causes to the commercial and industrial interests of the north.

It is difficult to resist the arguments that have been advanced for an expansion of the fifth freedom. I believe that we should have open skies, as far as that is possible and practicable, but we should do what is necessary in planning terms to protect the immediate environment and provide the transportation facilities to ease the burden on our existing road network.

10.30 am

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): We have had a useful and timely debate on an important subject. I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) on choosing the subject and securing the debate.

Having listened to the debate for the past hour, it is incumbent on me to provide not only an element of political balance—hon. Members have stressed the consensus that exists—but a small amount of regional balance. The speakers have been predominantly from the north-west, especially Manchester. I pay tribute to Manchester airport, which has received a great deal of political support. It is a successful airport, which will develop this year through the second runway. However, to someone from north of the border, Manchester is to the rest of the regional network what the London airports, especially Heathrow and Gatwick, are to Manchester and other places. We are lured to Manchester to go on our holidays.

Caroline Flint: It took me more than two hours to get to Manchester airport by public transport last year. It also takes me two hours to get to London. A long-haul airport in the south of Yorkshire is important for my constituents and the other 4 million people who travel south to go abroad.

Mr. Moore: I welcome that intervention and I wish the hon. Lady every success in securing a regional airport for her area. It is important to strike a balance, not only between London and the rest of Britain, but within the regions.

The basic proposition that we have discussed is well understood. We all agree that strong regional airports are good for regional economies. Many hon. Members have referred to both Birmingham and Manchester international airports, as well as using the old names by which those airports were known 20 or 30 years ago. We know Edinburgh international airport as Turnhouse airport as much as by its modern, wholly appropriate name. That airport is being vastly expanded so that it can cope with the huge growth in demand that it, like many other airports throughout the United Kingdom, is experiencing.

Dealing with air service agreements and providing for the fairest and most open system possible are crucial to ensuring the development of the success that has been achieved so far, and making the most of it. There is a chicken-and-egg aspect to our considerations. Does a successful regional airport drive the local economy, or does a successful local economy drive the need for a regional airport? Many hon. Members in the Chamber are frequent fliers. I applied to become a member of two frequent-flier schemes, as I travel from Edinburgh to London. We are often stacked over Watford, and have to wait for a long time to land in London airports.

Our areas provide evidence of the development of regional airports and the importance of giving them the strength—through the extension of the fifth freedom deal, or other measures—to improve their contribution to their local economies. Airports contribute to the local economy directly through jobs and indirectly through the service suppliers to the industry. Several hon. Members have highlighted the direct leverage effect of increasing the number of passengers in specific airports. The growth in leisure travel and cargo is crucial to complementing the lucrative business markets with which many of us may be most familiar.

When we are considering the development of our regions, many of us focus on the importance of inward investment. Good regional airports, be they in Yorkshire, the north-west or Scotland, are important in attracting that inward investment. Until recently, I served on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. Last year, we carried out an important investigation into inward and outward investment. Time and again, we were told by officials, agencies such as Locate in Scotland, or companies, which described their motivations, that the infrastructure links, especially air links, were crucial to the decision to locate in an area. Tourism, which is vital to our regional economies, can be developed only if there are worthwhile and useful air links to promote it.

Airports are not much use if the business, leisure or cargo services are not available at them. I want to focus briefly on two issues that have been mentioned in passing this morning: the impact of disputes over transatlantic scheduled services, and cargo. Regional airports' efforts to develop transatlantic services will be stymied if we cannot make progress on the issues affecting Heathrow. The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) referred to the letter from British Midland. I also received a copy. As a keen supporter of that airline's role in increasing competition and providing consumer choice—another theme of this morning's discussions—it is important the such airlines can develop their services and participate in transatlantic flights. Clearly, the immediate focus is on Heathrow, but British Midland has suggested that it is keen to work with Manchester airport.

Many participants in the debate will have followed the recent transatlantic talks and watched as public expectation increased that a break-through would occur. The break-down of those talks is worrying and I hope that the Minister will be able to shed some light on it. It is widely suspected that the commercial interests of British Airways and Virgin may have been as influential as the American Government in curtailing the talks and causing them to fail.

Let us consider cargo. Many references have been made to Prestwick. The relaxation of fifth freedom rights for Prestwick was widely welcomed in Scotland. However, that welcome has been turned on its head by the disappointing news that FedEx will cease its service. Again, commercial negotiations, and the desire to fly in and out of Stansted, are clearly important. I agree with the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Mr. Goggins) that piecemeal developments in fifth freedom rights are not the answer. However, they can be important in such areas as Prestwick, where airports have developed their businesses largely through their cargo facilities.

I echo the comments of the hon. Member for Leeds, North–West (Mr. Best). If we are to develop regional airports, which are key drivers of local economies, and if we are to gain the necessary freedoms to increase the flights and respond to consumer demand, we must consider the integrated nature of the available transport. It is a source of constant amazement that there is no rail link from Edinburgh airport, which is 200 yd above the main east-coast rail line to the north of Scotland, to the city. That story is repeated in many places around the country. Perhaps the Minister will comment on that in his reply.

There is cross-party consensus that liberalisation and responding to customer demand are important. The Government must knock heads together to ensure that we do not stymie important local developments.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): The number of hon. Members who have spoken or who wished to speak, and the passionate advocacy of the various airports that we have discussed from Members representing all political viewpoints will have convinced the Minister that the negotiations in which the Government engage in pursuit of liberalisation of air services are vital not only to the industry, but to many people in the areas surrounding those airports. I take the point made by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) that we should perhaps not refer to them as regional; they are international airports that happen to be in the regions.

Conservative Members are entirely in favour of liberalisation. As the Minister and others will be aware, the previous, Conservative Government consistently negotiated hard and did an enormous amount to achieve a degree of liberalisation—although not enough—in Europe and elsewhere. The Minister will also be aware that that liberalisation must be balanced with the interests of airlines and airports and their right to maintain their business as best they can with the travelling public. We have discussed the development of various airports. Manchester has a number of advocates, but Birmingham international and Leeds-Bradford are equally important, as are other prospective international airports that hon. Members clearly desire for their regions. They have all done a lot to encourage economic growth in the areas surrounding them and to achieve regional development. That has been possible under the existing terms of air service agreements and much has been achieved through flights between United Kingdom regional airports and the United States.

Negotiations with the US are often at the heart of the problems that we face. The Bermuda 2 agreement is clearly not perfect, but it represents a step forward. We must be realistic and recognise that we have to build on what is in place. Despite the restrictions and imperfections of Bermuda 2, the UK aviation industry is a success story and has done much to encourage regional development. The link between successful airlines and successful airports is clear, as is the link between successful airports and regional development. The debate is about how we can best maximise the growth and continued success of the aviation industry and the associated benefits that that brings to the regions.

We must consider the negotiations and refer in particular to the FedEx and Prestwick case. I hope that the Minister can explain where he sees that going. I understand that FedEx was given fifth freedom rights at Prestwick with no reciprocity, which disadvantaged other airports around the regions. Also, there was no benefit for British carriers to the US, which was a double whammy on the downside. As we have all heard in the past few days, after that rather dubious agreement was reached, FedEx pulled out anyway, leaving Prestwick with no benefit and the disadvantage of hoped-for jobs not being created. That is a catalogue of disasters by any standard.

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind the fact that FedEx represents 10 per cent. of cargo handling at Prestwick. He may be giving the impression that it represents cargo handling in its entirety.

Mr. Green: No, no. The hon. Gentleman is exactly right, but I am sure that he agrees that an enormous head of optimism built up on the back of the FedEx deal. Obviously, that has been deflated and I hope that the Minister will explain where he sees things going.

The problems over the FedEx deal bring home the importance of cargo issues. Most of the debate dealt with passenger services, but, as the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) said, cargo is equally important. Indeed, cargo is a key industry for some airports. For example, DHL has done much to bring investment to East Midlands airport and independent cargo airlines such as Channel Express have invested heavily in Bournemouth airport.

Caroline Flint: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that cargo and maintenance needs in Yorkshire are not being met by any of the Yorkshire airports? That niche could be filled by Finningley, especially if air services were liberalised.

Mr. Green: The hon. Lady is persistent in getting her message across, but I have no intention of engaging in what appears to be an intra-Yorkshire debate. I have learned in life and in the House that it is wise to steer clear of them.

The British Cargo Airlines Alliance estimates that access to the US market could create 4,000 UK jobs by 2005. Everyone would welcome that, but it depends on the Government achieving the best possible deal for UK carriers in the open skies negotiations with the US. I hope that the Minister reaffirms that they will continue to push for a slice of the American market for UK airlines. The direct impact on regional airports would be not only economic growth, but the environmental benefits of which he will be aware. For example, the more we spread the freight load being carried to different international destinations, the shorter lorry journeys will be. With the right infrastructure around airports and if more freight could be carried from different airports around the UK, heavy-lorry traffic would be minimised.

Several hon. Members mentioned the British Midland letter and expressed disappointment about the failure of the negotiations, but I was struck by how positive it is about using Manchester airport. The letter says that > "Manchester Airport has been supportive of our efforts to establish a new hub . . . this remains a key element of our . . . strategy."

That will be welcomed by those who advocated the case of Manchester international so eloquently. Many such problems inevitably hit the logjam of the question whether the Government can negotiate successfully, with the Americans in particular, and there will be no progress without successful negotiations.

The underlying figures are slightly disturbing in respect of not only the individual competitiveness of our regions, but our national competitiveness. British business travellers can travel direct to only 10 US cities, but there are 18 direct services from Frankfurt for German business travellers. Greater diversity of services from this country is clearly necessary. For example, Manchester provides only 48 direct services a week—operated by the four UK-US airlines—to only five cities and no services to the US west coast, which is a vital and growing market. We would all like those services to be increased. Birmingham, which is at the heart of many of our industries, has only two airlines operating 14 services direct to only two US cities. Glasgow has only one direct service. Not only is that inadequate for the individual airports and cities concerned, but it puts the whole country at an economic disadvantage compared with some of our European partners and economic competitors.

The Minister will be aware that he and the Government have an important job to do in negotiating those various new services. We are all aware that Ministers face a difficult task and he will have heard this morning that, effectively, he is being urged to give unlimited fifth freedom access to many of our airports, even though that may not be in the interests of some of our carriers. I am also aware that "open skies" means something different in America from what it means here. The American definition seems to exclude cabotage, ownership and control, wet leasing, the fly-American policy and other arcana of the debate.

Perhaps the Minister could spend a few minutes explaining what the future negotiating stance will be after the recent failure of the talks. That stance will be important not just to airlines and to the various airports, but to the possibility of successful regeneration in many cities. I hope that the Minister will give us some information and comfort on that point.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Chris Mullin): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) for initiating what proved to be an interesting debate in which, possibly with one exception, Members of all three main parties have spoken with one voice.

My hon. Friend made the central charge, which others echoed, that for too long airports policy has been fixated on London. I assure him that we recognise the importance of the regions. Indeed, I represent a seat in the north-east of England which has an expanding airport at Newcastle. I am sure that it would make the same arguments as my hon. Friend has made on behalf of Manchester airport.

We also recognise that, given the demand for air travel is increasing exponentially, it is inevitable—even if we did not want it to be the case, and we do—that there will have to be an expansion of air travel and services from regional airports. One of the great challenges facing this and any Government in the next 20 or 30 years is to reduce the 70 per cent. of air journeys that originate from the three London airports, and to spread the load more equally around the country—for environmental reasons as much as for any other. It is inevitable and desirable that greater development takes place in regional airports.

I concede that the policy may have centred too much on London and on carriers' interests. However, I think that that policy was beginning to change even before we were elected—the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) asked me to acknowledge that—and we intend to continue in that vein.

[Mr. Chris Mullin]

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central made a balanced speech. He was generous enough to concede that it was the Government's job to balance other interests, and the hon. Member for Ashford made the same point. We face the dilemma that I put to him in an intervention: do we concede freedom to countries that resolutely exclude or limit our carriers, or do we try to get something in return?

I should add that some foreign carriers are also fixated on London, and it does not follow that, were we unilaterally to grant the freedoms that some have called for, those carriers would necessarily all take advantage of services from regional airports. A number of airlines—my hon. Friend mentioned Biman, the Bangladeshi airline—have been offered freedoms from Manchester but have rather contemptuously declined them. I hope that, on reflection, they will realise that great value is to be gained from those freedoms.

Those are some of the problems that we must take into account. Several hon. Members have referred to environmental considerations. We should not have such a debate without recognising that neither regional nor national airports are entirely popular with some of our constituents, especially if they happen to live next door to them. One way of mitigating the great expansion of regional airports that will inevitably and desirably take place is to ensure that there are proper public transport links. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North–West (Mr. Best) referred to the rail link at Leeds, which is very welcome, and the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) talked of the lack of such a facility at Edinburgh. The Government are trying to encourage all regional airports to develop proper access by public transport, and thereby reduce pollution and disruption.

In the short time allotted to me, I shall do my best to address some of the other points made by hon. Members. In 1998, the Government decided to make an offer to all states with which we have bilateral aviation relations and where services to the UK regions were not already liberalised. The offer was to open up all UK airports, other than Heathrow and Gatwick, to services by foreign airlines, without restrictions on capacity or frequency. The only condition was that UK airlines should have the same rights to fly from those UK airports to whichever airports in the relevant foreign state were available—often just the national capital, rather than regional airports.

Of the 74 states that we contacted with that offer, 17 have so far agreed to it and 25 have responded negatively. We continue to remind the others of our offer, and take every opportunity to raise the matter when we have air services discussions with them. So far, by our calculations, two new long-haul services to Manchester, two to Stansted and one to Birmingham have commenced as a direct result of that regional policy.

Many states realise that demand for services from their territory to UK regional airports does not exist. They are therefore simply not interested in the offer. Others are instinctively hostile to liberalisation and are not ready to follow the lead that we have taken. Because of those factors, the take-up rate of our regional access offer has been relatively low.

Some, including the Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs, have urged us to make our offer on a unilateral basis. That point was made in the debate. They want us to offer to accept foreign airlines at UK regional airports without restriction, while UK airlines remain prevented from flying the same routes, or restricted to a certain frequency. The Government have been reluctant to do that. The granting of monopoly rights for a foreign carrier to serve a UK regional airport may, in itself, be an attraction to start services, but we do not believe that it is in the long-term interests of consumers to put foreign Governments in a position to keep UK carriers off specific routes and to leave development of a route entirely in the hands of a foreign carrier.

The Select Committee, Manchester airport and others have also argued that we should unilaterally concede fifth freedom rights from regional airports in the UK on the ground that such rights can help to swing a decision by a foreign airline in favour of commencing operations to a regional airport. Again, the Government have not been convinced that the merits of such a policy outweigh the drawbacks. Capacity increases, fifth freedom rights or more flexible tariff frameworks are frequently sought by UK carriers from foreign states, and it would weaken our ability to negotiate such rights for our own airlines if we unilaterally granted fifth freedom rights to others.

However, we have been prepared, on a case-by-case basis, to examine requests by foreign carriers for fifth freedom rights from UK regional airports. In each case, we ask the Civil Aviation Authority to conduct an evaluation of the benefits and disbenefits of such services for UK airports, for the regions in which they are situated and for UK carriers.

Following such an analysis, we have recently approved an application by Olympic Airways for fifth freedom rights from Manchester to Boston and Toronto. Those services are due to start in April. Singapore Airlines operates fifth freedom services from Manchester to Bombay. In addition, Emirates Airlines has in the past made use of the fifth freedom rights that it enjoys from Manchester to a number of European points, but no longer does so. We have also indicated to Emirates that we would be willing to consider fifth freedom rights from Manchester to New York, but it has preferred to concentrate its efforts on obtaining such rights from London. Similarly, Singapore Airlines has been offered transatlantic fifth freedom rights from all UK regional airports but rejected the offer because fifth freedoms from Heathrow were not available. My hon. Friend asked about Pakistan. We are having further talks with Pakistan regarding its service, and I am told that those talks are going well.

Several others points have been raised. I would have liked to say something about the difficulties that we are experiencing in talks with the United States, but time does not permit. I shall be happy to follow that up with my hon. Friend in correspondence if he so desires.

I reiterate the point that I made at the outset. We accept that past policy may have been tilted too far in the direction of London, but that will not be the case in the future. We recognise the desirability of expanding regional air services.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): I am very pleased to have secured this debate on the fishing industry after several months of putting in for it. It might not have been necessary if the House had had a full day's debate on the whole subject of the fishing industry on 13 December. In the few hours allotted to us at that stage, it was noticeable that no Conservative or Labour Back Bencher representing a coastal constituency was given the opportunity to express his or her views.

I want to examine at the fishing industry today on two levels: first, the complete failure of the common fisheries policy, its devastating impact on the British fishing industry and its total failure as a conservation measure; and secondly, and more important for me, the trickle-down effect of that failure on small fishermen, particularly those in my constituency of East Worthing and Shoreham, and its impact on non-pressure stocks such as sea bass, which is causing problems off the Sussex coast. Again, it might not have been necessary for me to raise these issues if the Minister, who I am glad is here today, had agreed to meet a delegation of fishermen from my constituency, but he has declined to do so on two occasions.

The common fisheries policy has failed, first, to treat British fishermen equitably. There is no level playing field, or whatever the marine equivalent of a level playing field is, in Europe. However, the industry is still important for the United Kingdom. According to the latest figures, it still has 7,800 vessels, catching 980,000-odd tonnes of fish, with a value of £620 million. It employs 18,600 people directly, and gives work to 3,000 fishmongers and a great many more people in supporting industries.

Recent common fisheries policy developments have been singularly unfair to the United Kingdom. The total allowable catch cuts proposed by the European Commission at the end of last year are substantial. The cost to the UK fishing industry is likely to be £88 million, out of a total industry of £622 million. That is about 14 per cent. of the catch in value terms. Inevitably, that will lead to more decommissioning of boats and job losses. Yet there never seems to be the same impact on other EU fishing fleets. Cuts by other member states have equalled those in the UK numerically, but not as a percentage of national fleets. Thus, some other member states, mainly Spain and Portugal, have cut their industries by a smaller proportion, yet received support grants for having been judged to have complied.

The UK gets a particularly poor deal from grants. The United Kingdom was the fifth largest recipient of FIFG grants between 1994 and 1997, receiving 173 million ecus, compared with Portugal receiving 248 million ecus, France 267 million ecus and Spain a massive 1,163 million ecus. It seems that still we have that problem, and the Minister is still proving unsuccessful in standing up to the Treasury. One of the reasons for the disparity is that the Treasury is unwilling to allow MAFF to apply for the multi-annual guidance programme grants awarded for decommissioning, because of the Fontainebleau agreement, which requires 71 per cent. of moneys granted to be removed from the national rebate. That has implications for the modernisation of the UK fleet, which is now much older than the equivalents in Spain and Portugal, for example, and becoming less efficient. Effectively, the United Kingdom has paid £100 million towards the upgrading of the Spanish fleet, while our own is being increasingly decommissioned.

In recent quota cuts, the Minister failed to stand up for Britain by invoking the Hague preference for North sea cod. That would have given the UK an additional 4,350 tonnes to catch. The Hague preference exists to give sensitive regions extra quota when TACs fall, but the Minister failed to play that card for Britain. The United Kingdom continues to get a poor deal from quota hopping, which always hits the headlines. Despite plenty of hot air from the Government, foreign-owned vessels fishing UK quotas still account for around 25 per cent. of the tonnage of the UK fleet. We increasingly see other ways being found around the restrictions, such as foreign vessels unloading their catches at UK ports straight on to freezer lorries destined for home port markets on the continent.

England also faces added competition because the Scottish Parliament now has its own Scottish Fisheries Minister, with powers to discriminate against English, Welsh and Northern Irish vessels operating in the Scottish zone. The Scottish fishermen have a Minister arguing solely for their interests, while England loses out. We have nobody to speak out against the excesses of Scottish vessels, which now come as far south as the south coast of England.

Another problem facing the UK industry is that of safety grants, another disgraceful example of the way in which the UK fishing industry is operating with one hand tied behind its back. MAFF's decision to axe safety grants was a disgrace. The interminable delay in reinstating them does no credit to the Government and speaks volumes about the place of fishermen's safety in the Minister's priorities.

The industry is now faced with the working time directive regulations, ignored by most European fishermen, under which the courts can decide whether or not the directive should be applied, despite the Minister's assurances. As with so many things, regulation weighs particularly heavily on the smaller operators, as the larger commercial operators can afford to take advantage of the increased regulatory burden to force uncompetitive practices on the smaller competition.

It is little wonder, therefore, that the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations recently called for the Minister's resignation. Its chief executive went on record recently as saying:

> On practically every major front, the industry is being forced onto the back foot. It is intolerable that the Minister has asserted that the fishing industry is doing well under the present Government. Nothing could be further from the truth. The catalogue of failure, fudge and callous indifference clearly shows that the interests of the industry in England, Wales and Northern Ireland have taken a back seat."

The second failure of the common fisheries policy is on conservation, where it has failed dismally. Last November's announcement about cuts in the TAC, understandably described as massive, was surely an admission that the CFP is not working as a conservation measure. The cuts recommended were indeed massive:

for cod 47 per cent. in the North sea and 69 per cent. in the Irish sea; for haddock 26 per cent. in the North sea and 40 per cent. in the Irish sea. Those were pretty desperate measures, as the cuts are usually capped at 40 per cent. for any one year. We are told that cod and haddock levels are at their lowest for 30 years, which is hardly a vindication of the CFP or a mark of its success.

The truth is that the CFP has no role as a conservation or environmental measure, because British fish stocks were particularly healthy prior to our joining the EEC. The whole approach to conservation in the CFP is completely wrong. Quotas do not reduce the amount of fish caught. Instead, boats trawl again and again to find the catch for which they have a quota to fill. They are more likely to catch non-quota stocks and then throw them back into the sea dead, including many juvenile specimens. It has been estimated that possibly 30 per cent. of fish stocks have been thrown back. A MAFF study conducted a few years ago near my constituency, off Brighton, showed that the survival rates of fish thrown back into the sea can be as low as 40 per cent. The coley example is a good one, because there is a small quota available for coley, which breed prolifically in the North sea. However, apparently annually some 80,000 tonnes have been dumped back into the sea to die and pollute the oceans.

Throwing dead fish back into the sea totally undermines any attempts at conservation of our fishing stocks. It is ironic, therefore, that, as from 1 January this year, the minimum landing sizes for 11 species of sea fish—including brill, turbot, dab, and black and red sea bream—were abolished, allowing the legal landing of postage stamp sized fish, which are particularly popular in foreign markets.

Fishing News, not surprisingly, says:

"Reducing or scrapping MLS sizes is an act of stupidity and no British fishermen wanted to see any reduction in MLS sizes. We have been calling for increased MLS sizes for so many years that we now see MAFF paying lip service to the EU."

The upshot of all this is the creation of a climate of environmental failure and a dog eat dog mentality among United Kingdom and European fishermen—or, perhaps, dogfish eat dogfish—between Scottish and English fishermen and, now, between larger commercial fishermen and smaller operators, often fishing off-beach, as is the case in Worthing. Alas, it is my fishermen in Worthing and Shoreham who are, as it were, the last dogfish on the menu and whose very existence is at stake. Already, only the last vestiges of a fishing fleet remain there.

Let me say something about the local situation. Sea bass in particular have caused great problems among my fishermen, who brought the matter to my attention last summer. At that time, for the second season running, the livelihoods of Worthing fishermen have been threatened by larger fishing boats which come along the coast—particularly from Newhaven, in East Sussex—and scoop up large quantities of fish using nets slung between a pair of trawlers.

Pair trawling is a real problem. Two trawlers operate typically 200 yds apart. Up to six pairs have been operating in the area during the season, and they have started the season early. They drag heavy steel wire lines in water as shallow as 20 ft. Heavy weights are attached to hold down the gear, which are in contact with the sea bed. Heavy wire sweeps herd fish into the nets with a funnel effect, and heavy chains and rubber bobbins scrape along the sea bed, overturning boulders, smashing rocks and uprooting kelp beds, which provide feeding grounds for bass and other fish and where small species such as crabs hide in the dark.

Often, after the pair of trawlers have been along, there are no fish for other fishermen. The fragile kelp beds, which have been deteriorating off Worthing for the last 15 years, are now virtually gone. It is said that they were deteriorating in any event, but dragging heavy gear along the sea bed cannot help the position.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for going out with the fishermen of Worthing and Shoreham, and maintaining contact with them. When I was the Minister in the Northern Ireland Office responsible for agriculture, we did a fair amount of research in Strangford lough on the effects of dredging. I suspect that the results we obtained were the same as those found in the near coastal waters of the south coast and elsewhere. The practice is very damaging, and I will support any recommendation that my hon. Friend makes to the Minister that it should happen way offshore, if it happens at all.

Mr. Loughton: My hon. Friend knows the position in Worthing as well as I do. I have seen photographs taken 10 or 15 years ago, and compared them with those taken by divers over the past few years. There is very little left—which is especially galling for Worthing, given that, arguably, its name is derived from the Saxon word for seaweed. Worthing has had problems with seaweed for many years: it has made a mess on the beach, and in summer it stinks. However, although the stink has gone, the fish will go as well because of the lack of seaweed.

Another problem with pair trawlers is that they have been coming closer and closer to shore. Some have come as close as 50 yds from the end of the pier, causing a danger to swimmers. As local fishermen will testify, after pair trawlers have hauled in their gear, vast amounts of small bream and whiting can often be seen floating dead or dying on the surface, feeding the seagulls. That does no good to anyone, apart from the seagulls.

I acknowledge that, as it stands, the practice is entirely legal, as long as it is restricted to boats of less than 14 m in length using a net mesh of 90 mm or more, and provided that the boats do not come within a quarter of a mile of the shoreline. Pair trawling is perfectly legitimate, and is not restricted under European Union legislation. I do not suggest that the fishermen operating out of Newhaven—whom I have also met—are flouting the regulations. I believe, however, that the practice is damaging the fish for everyone, and is weighing unduly on small fishermen who are restricted in terms of the distances that they can travel.

Pair trawling is an increasingly effective way of fishing. The amount of sea bass caught in that way has increased by 500 per cent. over the past two years. In 1997-98, 43.3 tonnes were landed; in 1998-99, the amount had increased to 216.2 tonnes. Because of that enormous increase, a number of full-time commercial boats are now fishing for bass. The number has increased substantially over the past five or six years.

My fishermen in Worthing and Shoreham are very aggrieved that some of the best bass fishing grounds of Sussex are being systematically denuded. Since working with them, I have received letters of support from all over the country—from as far afield as Glamorgan, Somerset, Cornwall and Nottinghamshire. I have been out to see the pair trawlers, and I have been out with the conventional fishermen as well.

The response from the pair trawlermen is understandable, and in many respects I sympathise with them. They are caught by the common fisheries policy like everyone else. Because of the lack of pressure stocks and the decreasing quotas for cod, sole and plaice, they are having to look for alternative catches, and the position is worsening. They are having to look further afield for new species that are not covered by the quotas and the TACs. I was recently told that a colony of scallops had appeared in an area that the men do not usually fish; they scooped them up and moved on, leaving no scallops behind.

The problem in Worthing is that shoals of bass come close to the shore and are easy prey for the pair trawlers. Bass is rather a lucrative catch. The trawlers plough up and down all day long and then fill their nets. The Sussex fishery is typical of the eastern channel. A variety of species arrive season by season—for instance, Dover sole, turbot, brill, cod and mackerel. Now, as I have said, trawlers are coming down from as far away as Scotland to take advantage of the position, because of pressures in the North sea. The sea bass stocks, which are not covered by quotas, are inevitably coming under pressure, as evidenced by the catch limits per week being imposed on boats.

A fisherman from Somerset wrote to me about the problem of pair trawling. According to him:

"Pair trawling is not a sustainable method of fishing a relatively small sea or arguably any sea area, particularly for one of the less numerous species of fish albeit one with a culinary price on its head which has the unfortunate habit of forming very dense shoals when spawning and is therefore easy prey for these high tech vessels. Sea anglers and artisan fishermen as well as the knock on effect on the local tourist trade pay for the consequences of this overfishing."

The letter also mentions the MAFF report on offshore bass fishing, which was issued last year. It is the result of a pilot study, and is entitled "MO802". According to another letter:

"The Report which was conducted during the winter of 1998-99, clearly shows that this fishery has become a recruitment fishery which is relying on each new year class of fish as soon as they enter the adult stocks. The catches consist predominantly of small adults in their 1st/2nd year of spawning. Very few fish were present in the widely sampled catches that exceeded ten years of age in a species that normally lives in excess of twenty five plus years and does not successfully spawn until aged six/seven years."

One of the most serious problems affecting the state of world fish stocks is the level of spawning stock biomass for each species. I am sure that you, as a scientist, appreciate that, Dr. Clark. Only mature fish can spawn, and thus contribute to the replenishment of stocks. World fisheries, however, are now increasingly targeting fish that are immature or only recently mature. Those fish have had little or no opportunity to spawn, and cannot contribute to the long-term health and survival of the stock. The plight of the sea bass is a prime example of the problem.

We have to look only at MAFF's consultation document on the subject, which was produced last October, to highlight the problems. Again, I quote:

"When the adult bass return inshore in spring, following spawning, they supplement the summer fishery, but these fish are now perceived to be returning in much reduced numbers. As a consequence, effort on juvenile bass may be intensifying, thus undermining the current conservation package aimed at protecting these fish."

It goes on:

"the trends in the Fishery are worrying. They may indicate that the offshore stock is depleted and that the depletion is already affecting the Inshore Fishery."

That is serious. Pair trawlers are doing, and have the potential to do further, large-scale, long-term damage to the future of sea bass around our shores. In Ireland and the United States, pair fishing has been banned as not sustainable and harmful to quotations. The influence on south coast and south-west fisheries needs to be properly looked at before it is too late here as well.

What is the Minister doing about it? He has twice refused to meet a delegation of fishermen from my constituency, who are suffering from the problem, but who will not give up because their livelihoods are at stake. His actions are just encouraging pair fishermen. I went to see them last summer and tried to broker a gentleman's agreement, whereby they would respect certain lines of demarcation. Initially, they were keen to do that, but when word got round that the Minister was not taking the case seriously and refused to meet my fishermen, they got back to me and said, "If the Minister does not think that it is a problem, we will carry on and take as many fish out as we can." An unhelpful state of affairs has resulted.

The Minister keeps deferring to the Sussex sea fisheries committee, which operates out of Newhaven—from where those very boats come. It constantly denies that there is any such problem, which flies in the face of the evidence. It claims that pair fishermen are using gear that is designed to skip over the ground, rather than carve through it. That is patently not the case, as anyone who has seen photographs of the gear that they use will know.

The complacency on the boats coming too close to shore is worrying because swimmers were endangered last year. The chief fisheries officer of the Sussex sea fisheries committee is quoted in the paper as issuing the advice:

"anyone who swims near a trawler should know to avoid it."

That is hardly helpful advice in the circumstances. We still have a tourist trade and sandy beaches in Worthing and we do not want to discourage tourists in that way.

Worthing fishermen have few options. Some boats target cod in the summer, but they have now moved a long way offshore, on to wrecks in deep water, and are accessible only to a few larger boats. If the quota for cod is exhausted and a blanket ban put on in summer, what can those few boats do for the season? There is a problem. The common fisheries policy and fish stocks covered by quotas are one thing, but the effect on non-pressure stocks should not be overlooked. The livelihoods of many small and part-time fishermen in and around my constituency are seriously threatened. The whole tradition of fishing long associated with places such as Shoreham and Worthing could disappear. Clearly, we have a problem in Worthing and in the UK as a whole; it is no good pretending that everything is rosy.

It is not for me to say what the UK Government's policy should be, but, clearly, the CFP has failed and is failing large vessels, and its trickle-down effect means life or death for my fishermen. Carrying on the way we are will end in the wide-scale demise of the Europe-wide fishing industry, particularly the British fishing industry, which poses a serious threat to the long-term sustainability of fish stocks and the health of marine varieties that depend on them.

We need to regain greater control over our national fishing waters. The 2002 review of the CFP and the potential expiry of derogation is an opportunity to thrash out a proper long-term sustainable policy once and for all. I, for one, would favour the permanent extension of national and local management to 12 miles, empowering EU member states actively to manage the fisheries themselves, sensitive to local needs and circumstances and with sustainable social and environmental safeguards. That is the view that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds took. We can learn much from Norway—it manages its fishing industry without the necessity to dump dead fish and it uses complex and technological monitoring mechanisms and zonal management.

The CFP is a perfect example of everything that is wrong with the EU. It is rigid, centrally applied and has no flexibility. When dealing with a natural resource such as fish stocks, a large degree of flexibility is needed both over time and between areas. The Commission has imposed the quota system from Scandinavia to Gibraltar with no diversity; hence it is failing in all areas. Instead of promoting flexibility, the Commission has introduced a permit system that will take effect from the end of 2002, whereby all vessels that fish outside the six or 12-mile limit will be part of an EU fleet under the Commission's control. That does not bode well for UK fishermen.

The last vestiges of the fishing industry in Worthing are in crisis. It is a microcosm of the desperate state of the UK fishing industry as a whole and it is getting worse. In the interests of the UK fishing industry and the sustainability of European fishing stocks as a whole, that decline must be urgently reversed. That cannot be achieved by a Government who constantly try to con people into believing that they have never had it so good.

We need a Minister to stand up for British fishermen and to take a lead in Europe with radical reform of the CFP, starting with the extension of the derogation to national Governments of control of the 12-mile limit, rather than taking the soft option of caving in every time. We need to hear his proposals for 2002 very quickly. We need a Minister who will stand up to the hoarding mentality of the Treasury, while grants to UK boats that desperately need modernisation and extra safety measures are effectively closed off.

We need a Minister who will have the good sense to acknowledge the plight of smaller fishermen such as those in my constituency, who will be prepared to listen to their views and their experiences at first hand and include them in the whole equation when discussing the fishing industry. I urge the Minister again to receive a delegation of Worthing fishermen, or to come down to Worthing to meet them.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) on securing the debate. I was one of the many Members who were not fortunate enough to be called when we had our annual fisheries debate last year, so I welcome the opportunity to take part in today's debate. However, I shall not repeat the speech that I had prepared for that occasion because it concentrated on the proposals on quota cuts for this year and things have moved on. Instead, I would like to concentrate on the proposals that were recently agreed in Brussels to close part of the Irish sea fishery, which will have a serious effect on the fishing industry in Fleetwood.

As the Minister is aware, Fleetwood lost its distant water trawler fleet in the cod wars with Iceland in the 1970s, but successfully built a flourishing inshore fleet. Unfortunately, that fleet has gone down from about 70 vessels to 20, so there are serious concerns about its viability. We need not only measures to ensure that it continues in the short term, but measures to secure its long-term future.

The cuts in quota that have been agreed for this year because of the parlous state of fish stocks will make it difficult for Fleetwood fishermen to sustain their industry. Therefore, they were especially concerned when they learned of proposals to close part of the Irish sea fishing ground.

My local fish producers organisation well understands the need for conservation of fish stocks and spawning grounds. It also recognises that the Irish sea as a whole is suffering from over-capacity. Fleetwood has been trying very hard to ensure that it does have a sustainable fishing industry.

Fishermen are remarkably resourceful people and the fishermen of Fleetwood are certainly among their number. They have invested locally and they work closely with the local authority. The catchers have been working with the producers and auctioneers in the market, with everyone pulling together to ensure that the fishing industry remains. Fleetwood owes its birth to fishing. Even though not so many people are now employed in that industry, it is still part of their heritage and they want to keep it going. They are working hard to ensure that it does.

The producer organisation has proposed various conservation measures and is looking forward to the opportunities presented by the review of the common fisheries policy in the run-up to 2002 to ensure that this country, and indeed Europe, has a viable fishing industry. The fishermen would support a total ban on fishing in the Irish sea to protect spawning stock of cod and juveniles, but they are bewildered why beamers from Ireland, Holland and Belgium are to be allowed in to fish. Beam trawlers are large vessels and they are moving ever closer to the 12-mile limit. Fishermen from the Fleetwood inshore fleet tell me that beamers regularly come inside that limit and that they have reported the sightings to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I urge them to continue to report such incidents because, clearly, policing the 12-mile limit is at issue.

As the Minister is aware, trawlers in the beamer fleet take by-catches of cod. Boxes of codling are offered for sale to merchants in Fleetwood, so fishermen from those trawlers are coming ashore. My local fishermen tell me that some of the by-catch from those larger vessels is more than the total catch of the small inshore fleet—what is seen as a by-catch for larger vessels is their livelihood, which adds to their concern.

I read with interest an article in Fishing News on 4 February in which the Minister explained the background to some of the recent measures taken by the Council of Ministers. It is an excellent article and outlines the issues in detail. I noted, in particular, that the background to the debate was:

"to protect the immature cod which will spawn this year during February, March and April; to maintain those fisheries that would not conflict with the spawning cod; to impress on the Commission and the UK industry that the industry's involvement in the process was essential if a realistic plan was to be developed."

I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend said in the article. I want all that to happen. My fishermen and I agree that immature cod have to be protected and want their fishery to be maintained during the time that the cod are to be protected. They also want to work closely with the Commission and the Government to produce a realistic plan.

I hope that my hon. Friend will respond positively to this debate and let me know how these fishermen can become actively involved in the Irish sea cod recovery plan. Without fish, there will be no fishermen. That is why Fleetwood fishermen are realistic about the problem.

Representatives of the local producer organisation and Fish Forum are to attend a meeting in Belfast next Wednesday, when the matter will be discussed further. My hon. Friend the Minister is aware that interesting moves are afoot to study a regionally based plan for the Irish sea. That fishery concerns not merely men from Fleetwood but people from Northern Ireland and Eire, as well as other European countries. At last, they are talking to each other constructively and I want that constructive dialogue to be maintained.

In the meantime, Fleetwood fishermen would certainly welcome an opportunity for MAFF scientists to accompany them on one or two of their inshore vessels on short trips to those grounds to monitor fishing activity and take samples of the fish caught. They also want the opportunity to accompany MAFF survey vessels on their observations. I often find myself in the difficult position of, on the one hand, listening to and reading accounts from scientists of what is going on, and on the other, listening to fishermen who have fished those waters for 20 or 30 years, and I find that their accounts do not always marry up.

It is important that scientists and fishermen study carefully the data that scientists are collecting, as well as taking into account fishermen's knowledge based on their own enterprise. We need to ensure that quotas are properly allocated, based on the availability of the stock. If scientists and fishermen disagree, the industry will not work together as we would all welcome.

My hon. Friend the Minister has agreed to meet with some of my fishermen. He has visited Fleetwood on two occasions, I think, and he impressed local fishermen with his profound knowledge of fish, the fishing industry and his commitment to their long-term sustainable future. Having met them, he knows that they are people who express their opinions forcefully. They will express their concerns to him at the meeting that we hope to have next week. They very much welcome the opportunity to meet him to discuss the issue. The Irish sea is the only fishing ground for Fleetwood's small inshore fleet. If it is closed, they will have nowhere else to go. They need to consider carefully how conservation will give them a long-term future, but also what measures can be taken now to ensure that they will be in a position to take advantage of that future when that is being discussed as part of the wider debate on the CAP.

Fishermen understand the need for conservation and for quotas. They understand that scientists have a role to play in advising on the state of the fish stocks. They want to take an active part in the process. My local producer organisation recently appointed new officers to lead it and it is determined that the voice of Fleetwood will be heard when the fishing industry is discussing its future, and that it will be a positive voice because they want the industry to succeed in Fleetwood and elsewhere.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) on obtaining this important debate and compliment him on the cogency and fluency with which he put his case.

I am pleased to see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss), the shadow fisheries Minister in their places. I have always found the Parliamentary Secretary to be unfailingly courteous in dealing with these matters. Within the constraints imposed upon him by his stewardship of a pernicious and unworkable regime, he has always been unfailingly helpful.

I have never understood how a person with the hon. Gentleman's strong views on animal welfare has been able to reconcile those views with support for the common fisheries policy, which positively encourages wanton destruction of precious marine life. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the hon. Gentleman and the Labour party condone the CAP, which, as we all know, results in more than half of all the fish that are caught being dumped back dead into the sea. That is all done, as we know, in the name of conservation.

What is even more extraordinary is that there has not been a squeak out of the animal welfare lobbyists on the subject. They are very busy opposing fox hunting and fur farming, but, when it comes to the utterly unnecessary and totally immoral destruction of millions of fish, there is not a peep. Every day of every week, thousands upon thousands of perfectly saleable fish are needlessly discarded, but the animal welfarists remain strangely—and suspiciously—silent. Here is an open-and-shut case of wanton destruction of animal life, but they have absolutely nothing to say. Hon. Members might like to ponder why that is. They might even conclude, as I do, that the motivation of those self-styled champions of animal rights is purely political.

As I am on the subject of political motivation, I should return to the Minister himself. The hon. Gentleman might resent being called a communist—

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): It is not very new Labour.

Mr. Gill: There is, however, no escaping the fact that the Minister and his Government colleagues are supporting a collectivist policy. How else would one describe a regime that, from the centre, tells fishermen what they may catch, in which sea areas, in which quantities, and even—from last year—at which ports they may land them, and, in some cases, between which hours that landing may be made?

The Minister and the Labour party are totally committed to that policy. They are the ones who condone the evil regime. They are the ones who are responsible for what can only be described as an environmental outrage. They are the ones who have acquiesced in the scrapping of the minimum landing size on the 11 species that were mentioned, quite accurately, by my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham. They are the ones who, far from reducing the sand eel total allowable catch, are party to its being increased.

Mr. Morley indicated dissent.

Mr. Gill: Before the Minister intervenes, I should say that I recognise that there is now a closed area for sand eels. However, as he will know, that area has been created for the sake of the birds. In the modern idiom, the whole of the policy is for the birds. The policy is certainly not for the sake of fish or for the good of fishermen.

Mr. Morley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gill: If the Minister will let me finish on this subject, I shall gladly give way.

I should like the Minister to listen to what a Scottish fisherman has to say on the subject. In a letter to Fishing News, published on 17 December, Mr. George Stephen, of St. Combs, in Scotland, had this to say:

"From midnight on 31 December I will be subject to constant satellite surveillance. . .

Why? What have I done to warrant this electronic tagging? I am not a paedophile, drug dealer, murderer, gun runner or released IRA terrorist, neither do I cruise Clapham Common, trade in porn or smuggle booze. Nor am I a burglar, mortgage swindler or an illegal immigrant.

My crime? I am a fisherman, a so-called 'enemy of the environment'! In 30 years at sea I have never caught a whale, destroyed a dolphin, killed a seal or dumped nuclear waste, but I have been forced by the EU to dump hundreds of tonnes of edible fish in the name of 'euro-conservation' CFP style."

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman is making a speech in his usual robust style. However, I should like to clarify a couple of issues. First—and we have been through this before—the vast majority of fish that are dumped are dumped because of the nature of fishing itself and the fact that they are immature or non-target species. Nevertheless, that is not an excuse for the extent of dumping. It is a technical conservation issue that must be tackled, and we are doing that.

As for closed areas for sand eels, science on the impact of sand eel catches on birds was used to justify the closure. However, there is no doubt that the closure has had benefits for migrating salmon and other commercial food stock species. Moreover, it was the United Kingdom that argued for a limit on sand eel catches. Although I concede that that limit was far too high and that I should like to revisit the issue to obtain such reductions, we shall have to have science to back our arguments.

The impact on the sea beds is part of the science—

Dr. Michael Clark (in the Chair): Order. You are making an intervention, Mr. Morley, and I should be very grateful if you could keep it intervention length. You will have a chance to sum up later.

Mr. Morley: Thank you, Dr. Clark.

Mr. Gill: I shall be only too happy to respond to that intervention, Dr. Clark. One of my complaints about the common fisheries policy is that, for 25 years, we have known that there is a problem, and that, for 25 years, Ministers—people who have gone before the current Minister—have been saying that something needs to be done. The Minister and I have crossed swords on many occasions when I have explained to him that the prospect of reforming the common fisheries policy in any radical or meaningful way is impossible. He and I know that it requires unanimity; otherwise, or that, if the changes are proposed and are passed under qualified majority voting, at least one nation—I suspect the Spaniards—will take the European Union to court on the ground that there has been discrimination.

The Minister also did not tell the Chamber that the outcome of the Government's representations on sand eels to the Council of Ministers was that the sand eel total allowable catch was increased from 1 million tonnes to 1,020,000 tonnes. However, anyone with the least knowledge of fishing and fish stocks realises the importance of sand eels as a feedstock for fisheries.

The fact that the European Union has increased the sand eel TAC is mind-boggling. Currently, the sand eel catch is less than half of the approved catch limit. The estimate is that, in 1999, 430,000 tonnes of sand eels were caught. Moreover, the catch has been decreasing by about 100,000 tonnes for each of the past three years. Why on earth Ministers decided that they needed to increase the sand eel TAC is a matter that the Minister will perhaps deal with in his slightly longer intervention at the end of the debate.

I do not think that you were in the Chair, Mr. Jones, when I read extracts from a letter by Mr. George Stephen, of Aberdeenshire, but I do not think that I need to say more about that letter—the gentleman said it all. The common fisheries policy is devoid of any semblance of common sense and is entirely hostile to the environment that it purports to sustain. Indeed, the policy is hostile to that most precious of infinitely renewable resources—the fish themselves—that it purports to conserve. The policy is entirely bereft of any sense of morality.

The greatest scandal, however, is that the CFP continues to be supported by politicians—people such as hon. Members in the Chamber now. There can be no excuse for that situation. Thanks to the tireless efforts of Save Britain's Fish, there is no longer ignorance about the facts of the common fisheries policy—how it originated, how it works, and what it will inevitably lead to. We carry on down that path at our own peril. Furthermore, the guilt of destroying one of nature's most priceless assets will be on our shoulders.

I should like the Chamber to know exactly where the Conservative party now stands on these issues—[Interruption.] I shall make it abundantly clear, without a shadow of a doubt, and hope that I shall not embarrass my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cambridgeshire. On 15 December 1998, the previous shadow fisheries Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), said:

"We have to bring fisheries policy back under national control"—[Official Report, 15 December 1998; Vol. 322, c. 845.].

He echoed the words of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who stated as long ago as 1997:

"There are several areas where the EU is exercising powers which could be devolved to the member states. Another candidate for repatriation is fisheries policy . . . Fishing grounds out to 200 miles or the median line could be brought back under national control, with sensible bilateral agreements and recognition of the historic rights of other countries."

The last word must go the Leader of the Opposition, my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), who, in a letter to Mr. George Wiseman of Fraserburgh, dated 9 March 1999, stated:

"I do not believe the current CFP arrangements are working . . . Our aim has therefore been set out unequivocally . . . our approach will succeed in regaining national control of our own fishing waters."

That is unequivocal. That is where we stand, and where we shall fight. We shall stand up for a vital British interest. We shall fight to retain what remains of a once-proud industry, and we shall take back control of our own waters out to 200 miles or the median line.

I applaud that outbreak of common sense. I rejoice in the fact that my party now has a policy which is distinct from that of the Labour party and the other Opposition parties. I further rejoice that the Conservative party is now on the right side of the argument. I welcome this renunciation of collectivism.

I challenge the European integrationists and the proponents of the common fisheries policy—some of whom are present in the Chamber this morning—to explain what distinguishes this collectivist policy from communism. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. George) laughs, but he will have an opportunity to answer the question. I have posed it to many others, and they have all failed to answer. I shall be delighted to hear what the hon. Gentleman has to say.

One of the consequences of collectivisation is that what everybody owns, nobody owns. A regime that denies individual fishermen any sense of ownership is the absolute enemy of conservation. The Chamber will be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham for his graphic description of how the common fisheries policy is failing the fishing industry, failing the nation and prejudicing the very existence of the fish themselves.

Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) on an eloquent and thoughtful speech, and on securing the debate. He rightly pointed out that the annual fishing debate—the pre-eminent opportunity for us to review the state of the industry—was so severely curtailed that we had little debate at all. I ask the Government's business managers to ensure that next year's debate provides an adequate opportunity.

The substance of the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham's speech was local, but it has resonance around the coast of the British Isles in relation to local, coastal and low-impact fisheries and their impact on other economies in the area, including tourism. The hon. Gentleman referred to the failure of the common fisheries policy, as did the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill). I do not think that any Member here would condone or support, as the hon. Member for Ludlow put it, the common fisheries policy in its present form. I and members of my party—and other hon. Members—have criticised the common fisheries policy for being an almost complete failure on almost every count. When I came into the House in May 1997, that was the situation I found, and we must deal with that situation.

The hon. Member for Ludlow claims that it is a collectivist policy, and that the Minister therefore must be a communist. If so, the previous Tory Government were, for 18 years, communists also.

Mr. Gill: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman should be allowed to get away with that. I said that the Minister would probably resent it if I called him a communist.

Mr. George: I am sure that the hon. Member for Ludlow would resent that, too, but that is the inevitable conclusion that one must draw from the hon. Gentleman calling anyone responsible for trying to manage the common fisheries policy in government a communist or a collectivist. As the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham pointed out, there are serious issues to address, such as conservation and quota management.

I wish to refer to safety and to minimum landing sizes, and I agree with the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham about the working time directive. He will find that the Liberal Democrats strongly opposed the introduction of the working time directive into the industry in its present form, but we failed to secure the support of Conservative Members when we tabled a motion in the House just over a year ago.

Mr. Loughton: I was a member of the European Standing Committee which debated the working time directive, and the Conservative members did vote against it.

Mr. George: I accept that, but the motion tabled in the annual debate in 1998 emphasised that the directive should not be imposed on the fishing industry in the proposed form. The fact is that we failed to secure the support of Conservative Members at that stage.

The hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) referred to the impact of the annual cut in quotas, and how substantial the cuts have been. All hon. Members have been struck by how severe the cuts have had to be this year. We have called on the Minister to say whether the Government have had further opportunity to consider the possibility of introducing multi-annual quotas. We cannot simply go on limping from one year to the next with the 11th-hour brinkmanship over the setting of quotas. We do not know two weeks before the commencement of the next fishing year what the quotas will be. There is some indication of quotas, but clearly that is not good enough.

I have enormous sympathy with the substantive point that the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham raised about the damage done to the inshore fishery in the Worthing area, and I was interested in his comments about Worthing and seaweed. In my part of the country, seaweed was seen in the past as a great resource and the kelp industry was an important part of the local economy. Perhaps if there is a lot of seaweed, especially kelp, in the area, the hon. Gentleman should encourage some of his constituents to consider that as a potential economic development opportunity.

On the Cornish coast around my constituency, we have similar problems, although the problems created by pair trawlers beyond the 12-mile limit are a matter of great concern. The Minister knows my criticisms of the way in which the Government introduced the 15 tonnes per month rule at a very late stage, when we were previously looking at five tonnes per week. As far as the bass longliners in Cornwall are concerned, that has meant unwelcome continued fishing opportunities for pair trawlers, whereas the five tonne per week limit would have curtailed some of those fishing opportunities. Line-caught bass around the Cornish coast is an economically viable industry. Low-impact fisheries are economically viable and they should be encouraged, not damaged by pair trawlers, which, by the ratio of catch per person employed, do not have the same beneficial impact on the local economy. Therefore, I encourage the Minister to monitor the impact of the 15 tonnes per month limit and to consider withdrawing it to protect the bass stocks and encourage low-impact fishing around our coast.

The hon. Gentleman may also be interested to learn that I have disagreed with the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) about the damage done by certain types of fishing methods, such as scallop dredgers, in inshore areas. I have argued that they have damaged important fishing grounds, especially crab and lobster grounds, but the hon. Gentleman has strongly argued in favour of continued freedom for scallop dredgers. Attitudes to the issue depend on local circumstances and the concerns of the local fishing fleet.

I shall be interested in the Minister's response to the points raised by the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood on the closing down of part of the Irish sea. The industry has agreed with the broad thrust of local management agreements, and it will be interesting to see whether the way in which the closure will be achieved will be altered under the devolved regional management plan proposed for the area. The industry in Cornwall has long argued for seasonally closed areas and satellite surveillance, because responsible fishermen recognise that if they are to follow the rules, other fishermen must also, and they need effective policing to ensure that. Therefore, I can tell the hon. Member for Ludlow that many fishermen welcome the introduction of satellite surveillance to ensure that their conformity to the rules does not put them at a disadvantage.

I was also interested in the hon. Gentleman's clarification of Tory party policy on the common fisheries policy. It will be interesting to hear in a moment whether the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) concurs.

Mr. Gill: Our policy is better than yours.

Mr. George: The hon. Gentleman's policy is for the birds, because policies have to be achievable in the real world. The Liberal Democrats have long argued for a radical reform of the CFP, which involves decentralisation, along the lines proposed for the Irish sea, to regional management boards, which would include scientists and fishermen. That would give fishermen some say over fishing policy in their areas. With power comes responsibility, and the fishermen recognise that. If we could achieve that through reform of the CFP in future, it would be very welcome.

The Minister has reassured me that we are reasonably confident of maintaining the six and 12-mile limits and relative stability beyond 2002, but we need further reassurance that the Minister is fighting hard to achieve, as far as possible, a regional fishing policy along the lines proposed by the industry. I know that the Minister has shown some sympathy for the proposal.

I share the concerns of other hon. Members who have raised the issue of minimum landing sizes today. I appreciate that criticisms of discards made by the hon. Member for Ludlow and others have also been made vociferously by the industry, but it is now saying that discards are better than scrapping the minimum landing sizes altogether. I believe that the fishing industry in this country is responsible, and there is little or no market for juvenile and undersized fish in this country. Therefore the scrapping of minimum landing sizes will probably have little impact in the UK. However, the danger is that it will give a green light to irresponsible fishermen who may target juvenile fish because there is a market for them in other parts of Europe.

I look to the Minister for some reassurance that action will be taken, because a reformed CFP should contain more robust mechanisms to ensure that the rules are enforced evenly across Europe. The Minister will know that many British fishermen have little faith that their conformity with the rules is matched in other countries.

Fishing safety is an issue of great concern. I know that the Minister is not directly responsible for that, but the Deputy Prime Minister held out the prospect of reinstating the fishing safety grants for six months. Only a couple of weeks ago, after he had let the fishing industry down, he criticised fishermen for their irresponsible and cavalier attitude to fishing safety. That is not good enough, and it has not gone down well with the fishing industry that the Minister who claimed that he would be responsible for reintroducing fishing safety grants has taken that attitude. We have recently seen tragic loss of life in the fishing industry, and in my own constituency in 18 months we have lost 11 men to the sea. That is an issue of grave concern, because no other industry has such a record of tragedy and loss of life. I look to the Minister for some reassurance that the issue will be a top priority for the Ministry.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire): May I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) on his success in securing this debate? May I also compliment him on making a competent and cogently argued case? It contained many points to which I will, I hope, give the Minister enough time to respond. We never seem to have enough time for our fishing debates. It has already been alluded to several times that our annual debate was very short and very few Back Benchers managed to contribute to it. One would encourage Back-Bench colleagues to put in for more fishing debates in this environment.

I support my hon. Friend's plea for action on the sea bass problem. I have had several letters from around our coast, but particularly the approaches in the channel, showing that this is now a very serious problem. My hon. Friend referred to last year's offshore bass fishery report, which confirmed that the bass targeted by the pair trawlers were shoaling bass which were about to spawn. Given that evidence, one wonders why little if no action has been taken since that report came out. It is also in direct conflict with Labour's charter for anglers. Under the heading of sea angling, Labour said that it would introduce a coastal planning policy that would recognise important areas of sports fishing and closed areas for spawning and preserving breeding stocks. We have not seen much of that policy; perhaps the Minister will tell us why the Government have been a bit dilatory in coming forward with it.

I want to give the Minister plenty of time to respond to the very important points that have been made this morning. However, I also want to give him the opportunity to answer the six-point indictment from the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations which recently called for the hon. Gentleman's resignation. This must be the first time that such a body has called for a Minister's resignation. [Interruption.] The Minister has had plenty of time to answer the main points that were put in Fishing News and in the federation's press release. Perhaps this morning he will begin to answer some of the key criticisms that have been made. First of those was his failure at the European Commission meeting to invoke the Hague preference for cod in the North sea. It is a critical aspect of fishing in that area. As my hon. Friend pointed out, it could have meant an additional 4,350 tonnes which, in pounds and pence, represents £6 million to the industry. That cod was clearly traded off for some other priority. It would be helpful to know why the Minister did not invoke the Hague preference and what other deals were done as a result.

The federation believes that the Commission's plan for Irish sea cod will fail to build on the industry's proposals to protect the spawning cod. It will also fail to secure vital haddock fishing during the main season. The federation points out that British vessels will have to be tied up or undertake expensive conversion to remain in business.

On fleet modernisation, the usual point is made that there is a continuing decline in the British fishing industry, and that nothing has come from the Government in the way of grant aid for decommissioning or scrap and build.

Safety has been debated both in the Chamber and on the Floor of the House, and promises were made. On 11 June 1999, the Deputy Prime Minister wrote to Barrie Deas of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations regarding the decision of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to close the national fishing vessel equipment scheme. The right hon. Gentleman said:

> "We share that concern, which is why, speaking for Government as a whole, I have made clear that the fishing vessel safety equipment grants would continue."

He has not repeated that position, speaking for the Government as a whole, but he wrote on 2 November saying that the problem was that since he wrote on 11 June, there had been devolution. He continued:

> "MAFF's previous regulations which covered this scheme are no longer valid. Nor can they simply be restored, either for the UK or England alone, because of what the regulations' text actually provides . . . In light of this, it makes sense to draw a line under the previous scheme, and to consider whether to introduce a grant scheme for this purpose in the future."

The key word in that is "whether", whereas in his earlier letter, the right hon. Gentleman had more or less confirmed that the scheme would be reintroduced.

Finally, the federation believes that the Government's enthusiasm for the working time directive has led to the interests and concerns of the fishing industry being brushed aside. If applied to the industry, the working time rules will mean that most vessels will be unable to operate in a viable way. I add to that list the fact that the Minister, who supports minimum landing sizes—or used to—failed totally to hold his corner at the meeting. As a result, the issue of minimum landing sizes—which the federation and most people looking at the industry believe to be a key ingredient of all conservation measures—has been swept aside for certain species.

I rest my case there. I have not spoken for very long, but the Minister has many questions to answer and I hope that, in the time available, he will do just that.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): There have been some very good contributions in this debate, and I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) for the way in which he made his case. I do not agree with all the points that he made, as I will explain in a moment, and I shall deal head on with the local issues that he raised.

It is true that the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations has called for my resignation. Calls for fisheries Ministers to resign are not unusual; it is an occupational hazard. I have been around the industry for a very long time, and if the hon. Gentleman would like to talk to those of his right hon. and hon. Friends who have held this post, he will find that a call for one's resignation, in the context of the history of the relationship between fisheries Ministers and the industry is pretty small beer, frankly. I recognise that there are genuine frustrations and concerns in the fishing industry. If it makes fishermen feel better to call for my resignation, I am not one to complain.

I have never said that the industry has never had it so good. Although some parts are clearly having a very difficult time, it would be wrong to think that all sectors are on their knees. However, I do not want to gloss over the problems that the industry faces, and I will deal with them.

As this debate was secured by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham, I should like to deal with his points before dealing with the general issues. I accept the points that have been made about the time available for fisheries debates. That is a fair comment, although I think that it was helpful to have a three-hour debate on the Select Committee report on fisheries. That extra debate gave many hon. Members the chance to speak.

I accept the need to look after the inshore sector. I am very keen on the inshore sector—I have introduced a consultation document for inshore fishermen which deals with how they can protect their interests. I have increased the underpinning of certain stocks for the inshore sector. As for quota hoppers, one benefit of the new economic link regulations was that some of those vessels actually gave back all their quota—50 tonnes of sole—directly to the inshore sector to assist it. So I understand the sector's needs; I am keen to support it and want to do more.

I did not accept the hon. Gentleman's request to bring a delegation of local fishermen to see me, and I should like to explain why. Generally speaking, I am only too pleased to meet hon. Members and fishermen to discuss their problems. The hon. Gentleman would have been only too welcome if he had stopped me in the Lobby to discuss the matter in more detail. Indeed, some of his hon. Friends have no qualms about discussing fish with me whether I want to hear them or not. I offer him that courtesy; we are all constituency Members and I want to help all hon. Members to deal with constituency issues.

However, I did not feel it appropriate to meet the hon. Gentleman's delegation on the particular issue on which he requested the meeting. The matter is dealt with by the sea fish committees. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman's fishermen are concerned about pair trawling, which may damage kelp beds and disturb the inshore fleet and even sea angling. As soon as the hon. Gentleman wrote to me, I raised this serious matter with the Ministry's sea fisheries inspectorate and the Sussex sea fish committee. Both bodies assured me that pair teams working off Worthing respect the committee byelaw that puts a maximum length of 14m on vessels within the SFC district. The teams also used larger meshes than local single trawls did, which is also regulated by the byelaw. I am keen to see people using larger meshes than required because it is good for conservation.

I was further informed that there was no evidence that the pair trawlers were damaging what remained of the kelp beds. The hon. Gentleman referred to problems with the gear being used. The SFC is dealing with that and I would be reluctant to trespass on areas that are the responsibility of local sea fish committees. I favour devolution and regional management, and the sea fish committees are an important part of that. My responsibility as a Minister is simply to confirm that byelaws made by SFCs are made after due consultation. Operation of the byelaws is a matter for the committees, which represent a range of interests in their regions.

If I met a delegation that wanted to raise the type of complaint identified—quite legitimately—by the hon. Gentleman, I can guarantee that the hon. Member who represents the interests of the pair trawlers would also demand to see me. The pair trawlers have a very different tale to tell on this matter, and I should have to try to arbitrate in a local dispute that is the responsibility of the sea fish committee.

I was concerned to hear the hon. Gentleman say that pair trawlers are using the fact that this is a matter for the SFC as an excuse to do nothing. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman is trying to reach an agreement, but that role lies with the SFC. In at least one part of the country, there has been an example of what happens when an SFC cannot achieve agreement locally. In that event, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has to take over by introducing temporary byelaws and taking a role in local regional management. I do not believe that we should do so. Inshore management should be a matter for the committees, involving local fishermen and other people.

That is why I felt it inappropriate to become involved in the dispute on which the hon. Gentleman wrote to me.

Mr. Moss: Will the Minister explain why agreement was given for a massive increase—500 per cent.—in the sea bass catch?

Mr. Morley: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman is right in referring to an increase in the sea bass catch as there is no quota on sea bass, which is a non-pressure stock. We have, in fact, introduced measures to restrict the catch of sea bass.

I shall try quickly to cover the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) and the hon. Members for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) and for Ludlow (Mr. Gill). Funds have been made available for decommissioning, and funds remain available for a small decommissioning scheme, which we may have to introduce as part of our multi-annual guidance programme. By and large, we have achieved our MAGP target for the bulk of our fleet, so we do not have to decommission. I am glad about that. Although we have sometimes had to decommission, that does not resolve the problem, and unbalanced decommissioning can cause particular problems in ports around the country.

We had a detailed debate on fleet modernisation, and I do not think that it would do any good for the inshore fishermen represented by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham if the Government used public funds to modernise vessels so that they were more efficient and could increase their catches. In some cases, we would be giving people money to build vessels that they could not sustain on their normal catches. That does no one good, including fishermen.

Mr. Loughton: I entirely agree that that would do no one any good. Why, in that case, are we giving £100 million of United Kingdom taxpayers' money to Spanish fishermen to do exactly that? May I remind the Minister that the problem is generally one of pair trawling, and, as the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. George) said, that also affects other parts of the country. Will the Minister meet my fishermen on the subject of the damage that pair trawling is doing, even if he meets those represented by other hon. Members at the same time? That is the point I should like him to consider. Expansion in the industry is making it exceedingly efficient and effective, and that is having a detrimental knock-on effect on people such as my fishermen.

Mr. Morley: I want to help the hon. Gentleman. That was not the point that he put in his original letter. If he and his inshore fishermen wish to see me about an issue for which I have policy responsibility—pair trawling may be such an issue—I shall of course consider his request sympathetically, as I would for any hon. Member. He may wish to ponder on what request he wants to make.

Time is short, but I shall try to deal quickly with points made about the Hague preference. In the Fisheries Council of the European Union, I must negotiate in the best interests of our country. Our national interest relates not only to the North sea, but to the English channel, the waters off the south-west and the Irish sea. The future of the Hague preference is also an issue for consideration. We do not have an automatic right to impose the Hague preference, but can do so only with the Commission's support once it has gone through the Council of Ministers. Four member states objected in the most recent negotiation.

We must focus on the benefits. We have managed to negotiate a quota of 34,360 tonnes of North sea cod for this year. As the actual catch in 1999 was 33,357 tonnes, we have managed to negotiate a quota larger than the amount caught last year. Yet all science suggests that cod stocks are in poorer shape this year than they were last year. I should tell the hon. Member for Ludlow that that has nothing to do with the common fisheries policy, but has more to do with cod breeding cycles and rising sea temperatures.

All countries that are not in the CFP also apply quotas. The CFP can of course be criticised—it is not perfect, and the Government have never said that it is. However, there must be an alternative to quota management. Every other country uses quota management, and Norway employs a discard policy that involves ships landing their discards, although the authorities in Norway have told me how difficult it is to enforce that policy.

I do not have time to go through all the points raised this morning. If hon. Members feel that I have not touched on particular burning issues, I ask them to write to me. My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood raised several important points, and I shall take them seriously. She is bringing a delegation to see me, and I hope to discuss those points in more detail then.

In conclusion, important issues have been raised, and we must tackle them properly. I was not convinced by what the hon. Member for Ludlow said about Conservative policy. Recognising historical rights is tricky—

Mr. Barry Jones (in the Chair): Order. We must now move to the next debate.

Objective 2 Funding (Southend)

12.30 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): The hopes and aspirations of thousands of my constituents depend on the outcome of this debate—such is the responsibility that has been placed on the shoulders of the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs, the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells).

I shall state what I am trying to achieve at the outset of my remarks, because there is a chance that, as I continue, the purpose may be lost. On behalf of my constituents, I want to obtain a plain answer as to why their Member of Parliament was not given the courtesy of being told by the Government, at any stage, that Leigh and Chalkwell would be removed from objective 2 status. Later on, I shall give more details of the circumstances of my inquiry. However, my constituents need to know why their MP was treated so discourteously.

I hope that the Minister will be able to explain who—precisely which body or individuals—decided to take Chalkwell and Leigh out of that bid. Only six wards were removed; hey presto, that included the only two that were in my constituency. Someone must have been responsible for that decision. Was it the Government, the council or Members of the European Parliament?

Finally, I hope that the Minister will tell me whether anything can be done to change that original decision. If that is impossible, can something be done to help my constituents in Leigh and Chalkwell?

This is my maiden speech in Westminster Hall—this dreadful poor relation to the Chamber. I thoroughly disapprove of this arena, but I have been trying to secure a debate on the Floor of the House for such a long time that I decided to accept its being held in Westminster Hall. However, I do not aspire to some consensual, European style of diluted government.

I want to share with the Minister the background to the bid. It was never my idea to get involved in any bid for objective 2 status. The local authority is controlled by 12 Liberal and 8 Labour councillors, against 19 Conservative councillors. Through its officers, the council asked me to support its bid for objective 2 status. I did so enthusiastically.

Given that the UK is such a huge contributor to the EU budget, although I voted "no" in the referendum on Europe in the 1970s, I was only too delighted to try to secure some of that money to help my constituents. My goodness, they need help.

In the larger world, there is an impression that Southend, West is a well-heeled community. When the Guinness family represented the area—as they did for 100 years—that may have been so, but it certainly is no longer true. I live in the heart of the community and I know only too well the challenges faced by my constituents. That is why I secured an Adjournment debate in the Chamber on 30 April last year. The then Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, now the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), replied to the debate and we had a useful exchange of views.

After the debate, he suggested that I arranged for a group to meet him to set out in greater details the reasons why Southend was entitled to objective 2 status. That meeting took place on 28 June at the Department of Trade and Industry and was most agreeable. At the end, I looked the then Under-Secretary straight in the eye and said, "If we are successful, I will thank you; if we are unsuccessful, I will blame your boss."

There was some delay before an announcement was made. I have had a great deal of correspondence on the matter. The deadline kept being pushed back; I do not know whether that was because our officials could not agree with European officials. There was some difficulty in drawing up the map for objective 2 funding.

The subject is complicated and technical. I have yet to meet anyone who has a real grasp of all the details—we are only human beings. However, I deduce from the map that there was much double-speak before it was finalised—I shall explain that in due course. After much correspondence, we heard the wonderful announcement that Southend was to be promoted. I have the document in front of me; it was published in October 1999. It gives the names of the successful areas, with the joyous news that Southend was to be proposed as qualifying for objective 2 status—two of the wards were in my constituency, and we were delighted that Leigh and Chalkwell were to qualify for that status.

I am sure that the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs understands that the local community worked extremely hard to draw up various proposals as to how to spend £15 million over 10 years. I pay tribute to Daryl Godbald, who leads the local fishermen, and to Steven Dell, who leads the local cocklers. They drew up a wish list of different proposals.

For instance, we have been hoping for some time that Leigh creek would be dredged—for various reasons. It would enable fishermen and yachtsmen to keep their craft afloat, with access to a lock. It would attract considerable income and employment to the town from permanent moorings and visiting UK and continental craft. It would be an ideal stopping-off point for continental yachtsmen visiting London.

Other large schemes were proposed; for example, cockle sheds at Leigh straight wharf, with improved road access. We planned to extend Bell wharf by 100 m—the list went on and on. The bottom line is that those proposals would have transformed our area.

Sometimes a false impression is given of Southend. Anyone who knows Southend knows that the fishing and cockling community is extremely important. Many families in the town have been involved with that industry for many years. The community gave magnificent support to this country at Dunkirk.

It is sad to see what has happened to that community over several years. I have had several discussions with the former Under-Secretary for Trade and Industry, who has done his best to help. The proposals to which I referred would have transformed the area; there can be no doubt of that.

There are arguments to be made about the facts and figures that were considered during the bidding process—the amounts may seem small to some people, but they are important to my constituents. However, to underpin our qualification under the fisheries strand, it should be borne in mind that 10 years ago there were seven boats in Leigh; at present, only three work full time. There were five boats in Chalkwell; currently only one works full time. By and large, the area is supported only by the cockling industry. For instance, the firm of Gilson's used to employ 23 people, but that number is now down to eight. I therefore found it extraordinary when I received a letter from a Minister telling me that we did not qualify under the fisheries strand because there had not been a reduction in jobs.

So seriously did I take the local authority's call to support the bid that I not only had meetings with Ministers but went to Brussels. I met two of our European Members of Parliament, Mr. Robert Sturdy and Mr. Geoffrey Van Orden, and the lady responsible for working up the east of England bid. We made sure that Europe was made well aware of the position.

I now come to what has incensed me most. On 26 November last year, I was at the switch-on of the Leigh lights with the chairman of Leigh town council. He asked me whether I had seen the local newspapers and I said that I had not. A huge group of people attended that day, but the chairman of the council told me that, if I read the local newspapers, I would see that Leigh and Chalkwell were no longer going to obtain objective 2 status. I could not believe it. Such is the style of politics these days that elected representatives count for nothing. The media are much more important and they get news three weeks before elected representatives. It is an absolute disgrace that a democratically elected Member of Parliament should find out from local newspapers what is going to happen to a project that would have meant a great deal for his constituents.

I can do no better than to quote the letter written to me by the clerk of the council:

"The Town Council was very seriously concerned to hear last Friday (26th November) that Leigh and Chalkwell Wards may be excluded from support through Objective Two, and replaced by two other Wards. This means that the two Wards originally planned for this support which are in the Town Council's area" will not receive any support whatever. He adds:

"Leigh is the registered Port for the area, and the centre of the fishing and cockling industry . . . These two activities have been severely hit over recent years by a variety of problems and directives, which limit the times at which they can operate and also the levels of catches they can make . . . There are also problems in relation to Leigh Creek".

The letter describes the consequences of that and continues:

"In addition to these industries, the whole of the foreshore needs attention . . . Attention to a part of this area only would lead to a marginalisation of the West of the town; unemployment in Chalkwell is currently 6.4 per cent., against an average for Southend of 5.8 per cent. and for Essex of 3.7 per cent."

I blew a gasket when I learned the news. I was elected to the House on the same day as the Prime Minister. In the years I have been a Member of the House, I have not thought that party allegiances determined whether letters were replied to. Ever since we have had a Labour Prime Minister I have never received a single letter back when I have written to him personally. Someone in his office has presumably told his staff, "If you get anything from a Conservative Member of Parliament, bung it on to the Minister." That is a disgrace. Unless we are called in the House – and that is a lottery – how can we make our points? How on earth can we speak on behalf of our constituents? What is the point of being a Member of Parliament any more? Let us not bother with elections; let the media and the civil servants run the show.

Since I received the news on 26 November 1999, I have done everything to raise the matter in the House, so here I am in the new Westminster Hall to do just that. I shall not make personal remarks against the Minister, but it seems that I have not even got the right Minister to answer the debate. He and I have had no contact on this issue. All the letters are from different people. What does that say to my constituents? Does it say, "You've got a Conservative Member of Parliament and they are a lot of old rubbish. They are down to 164 and we have are not going to have an Opposition. It is only Labour Members and Labour areas that count"? If that is the game, I am not putting up with it. The sooner the general public become wise to it, the better. Such an attitude would be a disgrace. However, I am sure that the Minister will be able to reassure me that that is not what happens.

The town council wrote directly to the Minister for Trade to raise several points. It wanted to know why the decision had been made, on what basis it had been taken and what he was going to do about it. I have seen the exchange of correspondence and the Minister for Trade has written most courteously to the town council. However, I do not agree with the contents of his reply. We seem to be at an impasse. We are told that when the UK case was put to Europe, it did not quite fit and that changes had to be made. Throughout the United Kingdom, six wards were taken off the list and it was my bad luck that two of them happened to be in my constituency. It would be interesting to know whether any other Member's constituency lost help as a result of the ward changes. I bet my bottom dollar that I am the only Member of Parliament in that position.

We were then told that we qualified under the urban strand. I have examined the criteria for that, and what has gone on is barking mad. I am delighted that the other constituency has qualified for the money; I do not want to take money from it. However, it is extraordinary that one of the wards included in the urban strand is regarded as the most affluent in the whole of Southend.

I have not even mentioned Westborough ward in my constituency. It is the most challenging area, with the highest crime rate in the whole of Essex. It faces huge pressures from asylum seekers; it has the largest primary school in Essex; and it has high unemployment. However, Westborough ward does not even get a look-in. I am expected to accept that we do not qualify under the fisheries strand, but that we qualify under the urban strand. However, when I consider one element that has been included in the urban strand, there is no way that at least one of the wards in Southend, West should not have been included. That is an absolute disgrace.

I pay tribute to the councillors who have continued to make the case for Leigh and Chalkwell. They are Councillor Mike Dolby, the chairman of Leigh-on-Sea town council, Councillor John Lamb, a Leigh councillor, and Mr. Richard Brown, Mr. Charles Latham and Mrs. Leslie Salter, who are all in the Chalkwell ward and continue to raise this matter with me. However, it is desperately disappointing that, despite the fact that we have tried diligently to engage the Government in dialogue, we have not got anywhere. I know that officials talk to each other, so how was it that UK and European officials did not talk on the telephone or exchange letters to agree things in the first place? It is extraordinary that they did not.

[Mr. David Amess]

Why were we told that we would have objective 2 status when I read in the local newspapers that we could not? The whole thing stinks. It is an absolute disgrace that my constituents have lost out.

I am delighted that the Government have secured objective 2 status for Southend and supported the local authority's bid for that status. I pay tribute to the Southend council officials who spent about two years drawing up those proposals. However, it is a shabby outcome for my constituents. Southend, West is a tiny constituency of seven wards, and if two of them had benefited from the decision, that would have been marvellous.

I know that when the Minister responds he can do only as he has been advised, and he will say that Southend is getting the money, so my constituency will benefit. I invite anyone to come to Southend. They will find that people in Leigh and Chalkwell do not feel an affinity with people in other parts of the town. They seem to live in individual communities, and the fishing community will not feel any benefit from what is going on in another part of town.

I represent a tight-knit community who were overjoyed that they were to get help via objective 2 status. I know that the Minister will not have time to respond in detail to the points that I have made, but will he and his officials reflect carefully on my remarks? The Parliamentary Secretary, Privy Council Office, was able, in the Christmas Adjournment debate, to give me some hope, although I think that the facts were not as he had understood them. If the Under-Secretary is unable to say anything positive today, I hope that he will at least reflect on the matter, whether to see there is any way in which he could possibly help us in future. I ask only for fair treatment for Southend, West, and we have not received it so far.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Dr. Kim Howells): I thank the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) for raising this important issue. There is a great misconception throughout the islands that if a town is situated in the south-east of England, it must be wealthy. I know that Southend is not wealthy and that it shares many of the problems of coastal towns, especially those in Kent.

To put forward a forceful case, the hon. Gentleman should have been much better informed than he was about the ways in which structural fund decisions are made. I shall not try to defend those methods. An MP should be consulted about any changes that are to be made. During the negotiations for reallocations, some Members made representations and were part of the process, but I know that it is very easy to miss those stages, and the hon. Gentleman has told us how he fell into that trap. There is nothing worse than finding out about an important decision affecting one's constituency by reading it in the press.

I want to concentrate on the basis of the change. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that there are several criteria, or strands, that determine whether a particular part of a city or region can qualify for structural funding under the objective 2 changes. Those strands are industrial, urban, rural and fisheries. If the hon. Gentleman does not have the information on what each of those four criteria comprises, I will gladly send it to him.

When the wards were first considered, they were included in the fisheries strand because, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, there have been big changes to the pattern of the supply of sea products along the Thames estuary and elsewhere. The fisheries strand areas have been identified as ports showing a decline in fisheries jobs between 1992 and 1997, or between 1995 and 1997, whichever is available. However, the Commission also required a minimum programming area of 50,000 population for urban and fisheries areas and 100,000 population for industrial and rural areas, so we have had to build up programming areas.

If the hon. Gentleman will set aside for a moment the problems that he has had in communicating with Ministers—he made a fair point when he said that we have never before communicated about this subject—I will try to explain the criteria by which structural funding decisions are made. The programming area criteria meant that we had to include some non-qualifying wards and exclude some isolated qualifying wards, which is an unavoidable consequence of the rules.

While the hon. Gentleman was speaking, I asked my officials about the loss of jobs in his area. EU regulation 1260/1999, which governs the structural fund, says in article 4, paragraph 8:

> "The areas dependent on fisheries . . . shall mean coastal areas in which the number of jobs in the fisheries industry as a percentage of total employment is significant and which are facing structural socio-economic problems relating to the restructuring of the fisheries sector which result in a significant reduction in the number of jobs in that sector."

The hon. Gentleman has admitted that the number of boats involved is very small. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), who is also present, has witnessed a decline in his constituency in the numbers of people who earning their living, not necessarily from deep sea fishing, but from working the waters of the Severn estuary. There is no question but that there have been great changes in fishing. The European Commission did not accept that the loss of fisheries jobs between 1992 and 1997 or between 1995 and 1997 in the wards mentioned by the hon. Member for Southend, West was sufficiently significant, and that is indisputable.

As the hon. Gentleman said, there was then an effort to include those two isolated wards in the urban strand, and link them with the most problematic wards with the greatest unemployment and social deprivation. The Commission would not accept the inclusion of those "islands", even though they are very deprived. As the hon. Gentleman and others know, there are many such cases throughout the country; for example, a troubled council estate may lie on the edge of a town that has a population of fewer than 50,000 but has severe problems.

It must be exceptionally irksome for the hon. Gentleman to see his constituency deprived of a couple of wards and that money shifted to other wards not far away. I imagine that that would generate a great deal of anger and debate.

For the first time, Southend will benefit from objective 2 funding. It is the only place in Essex that will receive that extra money. I trust that, despite his disappointment about his own wards, the hon. Gentleman will devote his remarkable energy and forthrightness to ensuring that the jobs that are created in Southend, East will benefit his own constituents in the deprived wards of Southend, West.

I can offer no other explanation. It is always problematic when someone else sets criteria about how money can be distributed. The hon. Gentleman has clearly expressed his disappointment with that process. If we are to ensure that the fine-tuning of objective status allocations is not to happen in future, I hope that the Government and the European Union and the Commission will look carefully—

Mr. Barry Jones (in the Chair): Order.

Pensioners (Minimum Income Guarantee)

1 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Today is an auspicious day, because it is the day when I am fully qualified to join the Southwark pensioners action group. I already qualified as a resident of Southwark, but from today onwards, I qualify as a pensioner. It will be a great boost to me to belong to an organisation of which I will be, at least briefly, the youngest member.

The story that we have to tell is a grim one. In spite of all our hopes through the long years of opposition, pensioners as a group have not had a fair deal from the Government. While we were in opposition, we said many times that when Labour came to office, we would concentrate on the poorest pensioners. The credibility of our policies rests on that.

Let me quote what the then Secretary of State for Social Security said after we had been in office for just over a year. She stated in July 1998:

> "There are some pensioners who are even poorer than those on income support. They are some of the very poorest people in Britain. They are the pensioners who are entitled to income support, but are not getting it; those who are slipping through the safety net altogether—the forgotten pensioners. This is not a marginal issue involving just a few slipping through the net. We estimate there are as many as 1 million of these forgotten pensioners. They are mostly very elderly, and nearly all women."

The Secretary of State went on to say:

> "Now we are taking action to bring the guaranteed minimum income to them, too."

She promised that, starting from the following April—April 1999—

> "we will be introducing, for the first time, a new national programme of personal advisers for pensioners. . . Through new technology, we will for the first time use the information that pensioners have already given us throughout their lives. . .
> The pensioner will then be contacted by the personal adviser, who, over the telephone or through a visit, will assess their entitlement, and then fill in the forms for them. All that pensioners will have to do is sign, and their extra money will come through the following week."—[Official Report, 17 July 1998; Vol. 316, c. 704.]

A sophisticated system was supposed to be in place to provide that, but, almost two years later, nothing has happened. The minimum income guarantee is crucial, because it is the Government's alibi for not restoring the link—about which we spoke for many years in opposition—between basic pensions and earnings. With that link, the basic pension would not be £67 from April this year, but £95.

The Government show no inclination to restore the link. Indeed, they have argued that the poorest pensioners would lose by it, but the reverse is true. Pensioners who are not getting income support would have benefited pound for pound from the restoration of that link.

What has happened since 1998? The minimum income guarantee has been introduced, but it amounts to very little. It may just be window-dressing—a change of name. We see that throughout the history of social security since the war. The minimum income guarantee is the old basic state pension, plus income support. That has existed for a long time.

It is disgraceful that those who contributed to their pensions throughout their lives are getting pensions below the level that the Government say is the minimum on which they should live.

[Mr. Paul Flynn]

We are told that the number involved is now about 700,000. That is the new figure given this week—700,000 who, according to the Government's figures, are losing £18 a week. That is a huge sum. We have pursued the issue through many avenues, to ensure that it is taken up. The next general election is rapidly approaching and we have failed to honour our promises.

Is there money available? Yes, there is ample money in the national insurance fund. There are surpluses described by the Government Actuary as "unneeded surpluses", and that is over and above the £6 billion that is regarded as a working surplus.

Until about a fortnight ago, the surplus was described as £5.9 billion, but, according to the most recent calculations, it is £9 billion over that level and will be increased further if, contrary to what the Minister said in the House on Monday, the Government go ahead and introduce the cut in SERPS that they promised. There is no doubt that the money is available for the changes. Even if the link to earnings were restored for a period of five years, the money is there.

On Monday, the Minister said, referring to take-up:

"There is an issue about who is being missed out—hence the research. We cannot be certain about the figures. There is a broad spread of figures; they come from the general household survey."

A new figure was given by the Minister. He said:

"Following the Benefits Agency work, we estimate that the figure is a little over 2 million."

He continued:

"Those people will be targeted in three tranches anyway. There will be television and press advertising. We will make an early announcement about the way in which we intend to go forward; we certainly will make the announcement before the end of this month. There will then be a large Government-sponsored take-up campaign, with a telephone national line and television advertising.

The work has been done, in the sense that we have seen the scripts and literature, with 'minimum guarantee' on leaflets and drafts. At present there are no posters or leaflets with minimum income guarantee on them. There are no documents, but there will be: we have seen the proofs. To that extent, we are on the verge of being able to launch that campaign. It is important that we get the money to the people who deserve it."—[Official Report, 7 February 2000; Vol. 344, c. 77-78.]

That statement is disappointing, and there are points in it that we must take up. After two and a half years in office, the Government are planning an advertising campaign, of the same type, presumably, as Governments have run several times over the past 50 years. None has had a lasting effect, for various reasons.

There is no mention of the data-matching or the personal advisers that we were promised two years ago. Unless advisers are available, the scheme will create a little flurry of publicity and then be forgotten. It will not reach the persistent cases who are not claiming the income support to which they are entitled.

Will my hon. Friend tell me in his reply whether the data-matching and the personal advisers have been dropped? With regard to the number of pensioners involved, what on earth does mean? We previously heard the figure of 700,000. Has it suddenly risen to 2 million? That is alarming, if it is the case. How did it happen? If the Minister was referring to all the people who are currently getting income support, the figure should be higher than that. We need clarification.

"a little over 2 million"

The fact that there are no posters or leaflets with "minimum guarantee" on them means that nothing has been done so far to encourage claims, two and a half years into a Labour Government. The number of non-claimants is almost certainly the same now as it was a year ago, despite the introduction of the so-called guarantee.

If the missing pensioners are to be targeted in three tranches, it will take many months before the final tranche is reached. In the meantime, the pensioners who should have been getting extra money from July 1998 have missed out on £1,000, on average. On the basis of all previous law on social security, according to which payment is made on the date of entitlement, attempts will be made to persuade the Government that all the pensioners who miss out—not through their fault, but because of the Government's inaction—should receive the back-pay to which they are entitled. Otherwise that money will go straight back into Treasury funds. That is elementary.

One of the most disappointing aspects of our Government is that they talk about giving money to the people who "deserve" it. That gives the game away. The winter fuel allowance was announced as if it was a gift from the Government. There was even a stunt in which a large cheque was offered, to show that this generous Government were giving money to pensioners. Pensioners do not get money because they are deserving; the Government need to be reminded that pensioners have paid out money throughout their working lives of 40 or 50 years. Their contributions are made in accordance with the rate of inflation. The money is not a gift or a handout, but an entitlement. When the Government speak as though it were a gift, they incur pensioners' anger—and rightly so.

We appreciate that many pensioners do not take pensions because they are disabled or intimidated by the forms. However, the main reason for not taking them up is that some people never lost a day's work and never claimed supplementary benefits, national assistance or income support, and it is a matter of pride to them that they never accepted a state handout; they do not intend to begin now. That is profoundly important. If the money is added to the basic pension, it becomes an entitlement. If it is left as a so-called minimum income guarantee, it becomes a handout, and many people of my generation find claiming it a demeaning experience.

London Labour party members received an extraordinary document from the Prime Minister's office, which states:

"For pensioners . . . we have introduced a £100 winter fuel allowance"— that is fine—

"free TV licences for the over 75s and restored free eye tests for the over 60s. Together with the Guaranteed Minimum Pension" whatever that is—

"these measures mean that the poorest pensioners will soon get almost £20 a week more than when we came to office."

A letter from the Minister comes to a different conclusion. He cites those changes, but concludes that, as a result of Government measures, pensioner households will be better off by £300 a year, and those over 75, who tend to be the poorest, will be better off by up to £500.

Why has the Prime Minister written to hundreds of people in London and multiplied the figure by two? The Minister's figure is fairly optimistic, but perhaps he can contact the Prime Minister and ensure that he sends a correction to all the people who received the letter to London Labour party members. What is a guaranteed minimum pension? It is another example of the new language. It is neither a pension nor guaranteed; it is the basic pension that pensioners have earned through their contributions, plus a little income support.

I want to give the Minister plenty of time to reply to the debate, but the Prime Minister's letter referred to other Government measures. For example, it states:

"the poorest pensioners will get almost £20 a week more than when we came to office."

If the arithmetic is wrong, perhaps we should be told.

Like other Labour Members, you and I, Mr. Jones, fought the election on a promise in our manifesto to ensure that all pensioners would share fairly in the nation's growing prosperity. Early-day motion 1 and early-day motion 2 have been tabled on the minimum income guarantee. They are regularly signed by 100 Members of Parliament. We have achieved good things for many pensioners, and we have been fairer—I shall not say more generous—than previous Governments. However, the confidence trick continues to be played on pensioners. Many Labour Members feel unhappy and have bravely spoken against the leadership and the policy line. Their views are based on genuine unhappiness in the pensioner community.

It is a shame that pensioners do not take a leaf out of the book of the often well-heeled, rich groups, which persistently and enthusiastically lobby Parliament. The pensioners' lobby is much too polite; pensioners do not often block streets or take action. They do not get the Government's attention.

A deep and continuing injustice is perpetrated against those who built this country; many of them built the party to which you and I belong, Mr. Jones. They are being cheated by a Government who promised them a great deal. The Government should examine events in Britain in the past 12 months, which hold a terrible, unacknowledged lesson for us. A man who was told that he was not fit to be a Labour party candidate not only won an election, but got the biggest majority of any candidate in Scotland. In Wales, people in Llanelli, Islwyn and, of all places, the Rhondda, deserted the party. The same may happen in London. Many of them are elderly. They feel, "We won the election, but we lost our party." The Labour party is losing people who voted Labour before new Labour was invented.

The Government must restore pensioners' confidence and faith. They are our core supporters; they created our Labour party many years ago. We currently put up attractive sums of money—£100—which appears to be a great deal more than £2 a week. That is reminiscent of the tricks played by rotten employers who cheat their workers in their pay packets every week but give them a turkey at Christmas. The Government present skilful propaganda, half-truths and figures that are exaggerated or misrepresented, but, as a Government and as a party, we do not deliver for the mass of pensioners. As for the poorest pensioners, on whom we promised to concentrate, we are cheating them.

The Minister of State, Department of Social Security (Mr. Jeff Rooker): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on his 65th birthday today. He is a model Member of Parliament. However, I seriously question some of the language that he used. The Government are not playing any tricks on pensioners. We must be careful not only about the language but about the figures we use.

My hon. Friend has questioned one or two figures. Before I reach the thrust of my remarks, I shall answer his questions about figures. There is no contradiction between the letters that he has received from me and the letter from the Prime Minister. I am happy to provide detailed figures, although I cannot give them at length because there is not time to do so.

I cited the figure of £500, which relates to single pensioners over 80 between April 1998 and April 2000. This includes the winter fuel payment of £100 a year, for which my hon. Friend almost said thank you, and the reduction in VAT on fuel, from 8 to 5 per cent. That is only £16 a year, but that money still counts. The minimum income guarantee increase over the Rossi price index represents £293, and the free television licence, which comes into effect later this year, takes the figure to £510. The figure that he gave—I do not have the letter from the Prime Minister in front of me, but I understand that he was quoting—refers to 1997-2000 and older pensioner couples aged over 80. I have taken advice, and I know that the figure must come from there. The comparable figure for 1998-2000 is almost £13. We are not playing around. We consider couples and singles and use different years, whether 1998-2000 or 1997-2000, so figures are bound to change.

Mr. Flynn: Do I understand correctly? Is the Minister saying that £13 a week is almost £20 a week?

Mr. Rooker: No. I am saying that £13 a week applies to 1998-2000 and £20 a week must apply to 1997-2000. One figure applies to two years and the other to three. There is a difference, so the figures are bound to be different. The Government came to power in 1997 and the Prime Minister's figure refers to when we took office. I was referring to 1998-2000, in respect of which the figures are £672 for a couple—almost £13 a week—and £500 for a single person. We are considering couples and singles over two years or three; one has to look at a common figure. All the quoted figures are correct, but they apply to different groups over a different time scale.

My hon. Friend quoted at length what I said on Monday evening In respect of the forthcoming take-up campaign, I want to make it absolutely clear to him on the record that I did not say that 2 million people are missing out. I repeated our broad estimate of between 530,000 and 870,000—the average figure is 700,000—but we do not know their addresses. If we did, we would contact them. The figures come from a statistical extrapolation from the general household survey. To make the take-up campaign meaningful and to reach those people—on the assumption that they exist—we have looked at the information that the Government have within the Benefits Agency and used data matching and data sharing. From this, we have identified about 2.1 million pensioners who look most likely not to take up their entitlement. We plan to contact them personally in three tranches—by post, at specific addresses—so that we can cope with the feedback and the telephone line can cope with the inquiries that we shall receive. We have estimated the use to which the line will be put.

We will not send out a 40-page leaflet—lengthy forms are a big put-off in respect of MIG or income support—but will use a filter system to identify the most likely to be eligible and put them into the system to see whether they are eligible and whether they have been missed out because they have not claimed. Some may wilfully refuse to claim, but it is many years since I met a constituent who knew that they were eligible but wilfully refused to claim. Since I became a Social Security Minister, and following MIG's introduction, I have not dealt with a constituent without savings who survives on the basic state pension of £66.75, and neither have the two Age Concern branches in my constituency, which are very active. I am not saying that such people do not exist, but they may not fit the stereotype—a single pensioner living alone in a damp flat with a two-bar electric fire who refuses to claim because of pride or because he has been told that the minimum income guarantee is a state handout—language I did not use. The people whom we will find through the take-up campaign will not fit that stereotype. However, that is not the issue.

The money is there to be claimed, but we will never be able to backdate it simply because it is means-tested. Money is paid only from the day on which people make a claim, and my hon. Friend has to take that on board, but we must overcome the barriers to making a claim. I know from experience that people do not want to go to the social or the DSS. They do not want to be equated with the kind of people whom they perceive as using the social unfairly and affecting the unemployed, the disabled, people of working age on income support, and lone parents. Pensioners do not want to be associated with the DSS. I do not agree with that attitude, but I understand it. However, it is not necessary to go to a DSS or Benefits Agency office to claim the minimum income guarantee. That can be done through a home visit, by post or, in many parts of the country, over the phone. The information can be taken and the application completed at the other end and sent to pensioners to sign—that is all they would have to do.

The take-up campaign will not be in full swing on the day it is announced, which, as I said on Monday, will be before the end of the month; but it will be stepped up over the spring. We will then be able to use an electronic claim form, which will do wonders as people will not have to see all the questions that they do not have to answer. I freely admit that lengthy forms are a big put-off, although I am told that form design is reviewed every six months. For heaven's sake, there has not been much improvement in the past few years, let alone the past few months. There has been no literature or posters carrying the words "minimum income guarantee" in post offices or anywhere else visited by pensioners. That has been a big mistake. It does not matter whether anybody argues that MIG is income support dressed up as something else because it is different. MIG has been related to earnings in the way that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said it would be and we have to market it as MIG. That is what we will do.

As I said on Monday, we have seen the leaflet proofs. They refer to MIG and are simple, clear and easy to understand. They will be used as a filter to see whether people might be eligible before we get them into the main system. Obviously we have to check their means and know about their assets. There is no doubt about that. I say to my hon. Friend, with due humility, that this will not be like other Government take-up campaigns, which he so easily dismissed and which I accept have not always been successful: this one will be carried out on a different scale.

Much to my annoyance and distress, when I arrived at the DSS last summer, I discovered that we could not launch the campaign before Christmas. We could have made a start or introduced it this month, but it would not have worked. The planning has taken a considerable time; the cost will not be zero; and we have had to organise the resources to run it properly, which is what we intend to do. The Government have a moral obligation to see that everyone who is entitled to the benefits that Parliament has said are available—based on need and as of right—receives those benefits. They must not miss out because of ignorance.

People may choose not to claim, even if we remove all the hurdles that are present and perceived to be present one by one as we assess them. But let us be realistic: millions of pensioners claim means-tested council tax benefit; millions of pensioners claim means-tested housing benefit; and 1.5 million pensioners claim means-tested income support—MIG now. Forget the research, forget the statistics; because of my constituency experience, I do not accept that there is a massive stigma in claiming. Millions of people consider those benefits—which are based on their needs—to be a right, not a handout. We are getting that money to them, either from central Government or, if it is represented by housing benefit, via the local authorities.

Mr. Flynn: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: No, I do not have time; there is only a minute left.

My hon. Friend said in his first sentence that pensioners have not had a fair deal from the Government. Even though it is his birthday, I say to him that that is simply not true—I rebut it. The party to which he and I belong will lose seats if its own Members peddle an untruth, wherever it is peddled. It is not fair to say that there has been trickery in the Government's dealing. There has been no trickery and our record on providing for pensioners, based on their income and their needs, stands comparison with that of any previous Government.

Second Home Ownership

1.29 pm

Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): I am pleased to initiate this important debate. Since the House resumed in October, I have been requesting a debate on second homes. The Minister for the Environment made a statement on this matter to a fringe meeting at the Labour party conference. No doubt, when he replies to the debate, the Under-Secretary will address himself to that statement and the Prime Minister's response to it.

I welcome the new hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas). "Agas dynargh", as we say in Cornwall. Perhaps there is a translation of that into Welsh—we may find that out later.

It is my experience that it is impossible to raise the issue of second homes without the debate becoming deeply emotional. I want to emphasise that, in calling for this short debate, I am not, unlike some others, engaging in the politics of envy, seeking to wreak revenge or fanning the flames of an absurd class war across rural Britain. That is not my purpose. I simply want to probe Government thinking on this important aspect of policy and to make it clear that we are talking about second residences that are entitled to a 50 per cent. discount in council tax, not about holiday homes on which business rates are payable.

I emphasise that my reasons for raising this issue are not personal. There are many second homes in Cornwall and on the Isles of Scilly, and we are pleased for their owners to come to our communities. Many of them are close friends of mine, so I do not intend my remarks to be personal. Those people are a bonus for the community. Although they cannot be there supporting local services all year round, they make a limited contribution and take pleasure in investing in the local economy. Of course, for some people personal wealth and privilege go hand in hand with arrogance, pomposity and a patronising attitude, but such people constitute a small minority and do much to undermine the good name of the majority, whom I have found to be pleasant and sensitive to local people and to have a genuine interest in the local community.

I seek the Minister's recognition of the social and economic costs of high second home ownership in areas of high unmet local housing need where local services—shops, schools and businesses—become unviable. I am not suggesting that second home owners should be inappropriately penalised, merely that they should not be subsidised as they are at present.

Before concentrating on policy points in detail, it is worth dealing with some of the myths that still surround the often highly charged debates on this subject. Those who defend the purchasers of second homes often maintain that local people, by selling their properties at extortionate prices, have cruelly and cynically exploited unwary and innocent second home purchasers, whose sole interest was to protect vernacular architecture and the fabric of rural areas. That has been the serious contention of people defending such sales, but it ignores the reality of how the housing market works. If a local person sells his house, he must buy another, equivalent house, so he must sell at the market rate. Local people have not sold their birthright. Where will they live? That contention is clearly not valid.

The other contention is that it is not possible to apply policy in this area because it is impossible to define a second home. Those who follow this debate found it remarkable that, when it became possible to obtain a 50 per cent. discount on council tax on second homes, amazingly and miraculously thousands of people were, overnight, suddenly able to define their properties as second homes. We all noted that with great interest.

I accept that in some areas—the north and the islands of Scotland and other places—there is little or no unmet housing need, and second home ownership protects properties from falling down. Such injection of capital in those rural areas may be valuable.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): The hon. Gentleman is making a good case. The problem with second home owners taking on a run-down property is that they often knock two cottages into one. They take those properties out of the housing market for ever and a day for people who may, with some support, be able to buy back into the market. Does he agree with that?

Mr. George: I welcome that intervention. The hon. Gentleman is assiduous in this regard. Yes, any property loss—whether it be two properties knocked into one or any property in a rural community where there is a high unmet local housing need for affordable housing—adds to and fuels the house prices in that area, so that they are above that which the local community can afford. That is the issue that we are dealing with.

Cornwall, with a population of 500,000, has about 200,000 properties. A survey in which I have been involved professionally in the past and information from other sources suggest that there are about 20,000 people with an unmet housing need, half of whom—the figure varies from time to time—are on local authority waiting lists. Therefore, the figure is about 10,000, sometimes more and sometimes less. There are about 20,000 second and holiday homes, including those in the business sector, half of which are second residences for the purpose of recreation. It is interesting to relate that housing need to the number of properties that are taken out of local availability in Cornwall.

Such homes are concentrated in some areas more than others. They are in largely coastal areas, estuaries and other areas where there is a lot of sailing, such as Roseland and St. Minver. I am pleased to see that my hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) is present. Certain identifiable locations contain higher numbers of second homes and are concomitant with higher house prices. In many communities—some in my constituency—30 or 40 per cent. of the housing stock is under second home ownership.

The new earnings survey produced annually by the Government shows that Cornwall has been pretty well on the bottom since records began. It has the lowest earnings and the lowest gross domestic product of any comparable area. We have one of the biggest mismatches of house prices and earnings anywhere in the country, and that is of great concern.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Does my hon. Friend agree that the most significant aspect of this matter is that it is an accumulation of many local problems. The last thing we want is for someone from Whitehall to lay down a strategy for dealing with this situation. We want local communities to have the freedom to say when enough is enough—whether in the Lake district, the west of Wales or our own end of Cornwall. Those who know best about saturation and the economic and social problems are the local people.

Mr. George: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. It helps me to make a point that I shall refer to later. There is no doubt that the implementation of new policy in this area would have to be applied variably across the country. Local authorities should be able to interpret the policy as it applies to their own areas, and use their power flexibly in one area as opposed to another.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I first congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing time for this very important debate and thank him for allowing me to intervene very briefly. He may know that two years ago I introduced a ten-minute Bill to deal with this problem. My suggestion then was that local authorities could use the classes order: if a property was a part-time property, it would have to have planning permission, in which case there would be the flexibility in each local area to deal with the problem.

Mr. George: Once again, I am grateful for a very helpful and positive intervention. What the hon. Gentleman says falls entirely within Liberal Democrat party policy. It has been our policy for a very long time. I entirely support and endorse the purpose of the hon. Gentleman's ten-minute Bill.

In addition to covering mainland west Cornwall, my constituency includes the Isles of Scilly where the problems are much more highly focused. The Isles of Scilly consists of five inhabited islands and many uninhabited islands, with about 2,000 people and 1,200 properties. About 30 per cent. of those properties are second homes. As in Cornwall, there are very low wages on the Isles of Scilly, but it also has even higher house prices. The smallest house on the islands costs £200,000, and it costs £160,000 to buy a council house there. On the off islands, one might obtain an assignable lease for a small property starting at about £300,000. Clearly, anyone on local wages cannot even look at that kind of property. They have to go to the rented sector, where they can find it. Low-earning islanders do not have the option of commuting to work from a low house price area somewhere on the mainland. That is physically not possible.

There are four areas of policy concern. I shall deal with the first two briefly, because they do not form part of the Minister's brief. The first is capital gains tax, under which cohabiting couples can avoid paying the tax if they register their two homes under different names. Secondly, a matter that concerns many hon. Members is the fact that during national elections second home owners can choose where they can most effectively vote. If one home is in a safe seat and another in a marginal, where, if they are politically aware, will they most effectively place their vote? They can have a disproportionate influence on the way in which elections are decided, and, as there are thousands of second home owners, it is a matter of concern.

I hope that the Minister will respond on the third matter, which concerns the 50 per cent. rebate on council tax referred to earlier. Even the much hated and socially divisive poll tax did not dare do that; people simply paid the poll tax twice. Then, in the haste to introduce the council tax, the clause giving the 50 per cent. discount was introduced. It was justified by the previous Government on the basis that second home owners did not use the more expensive personal services, such as education and social services. But the council tax is a tax on property, at a rate which varies according to the value of the house. It does not depend on which services the council tax payer uses. Many local people who do not use the most expensive service, which is education, are not entitled to a discount or a rebate.

The Government response so far has been disappointing. I have been pushing Ministers. The Under-Secretary wrote to me on 15 November saying:

"council tax is generally working well as a local tax and . . . there are no fundamental problems which require our urgent attention."

Similarly, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury wrote to the secretary of the south-west branch of the Local Government Association on 29 September 1999, saying that the Government's review

"concluded that the council tax had no fundamental problems" and was widely accepted as working well.

With regard to proposed amendments, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury said in the same letter, in reply to proposals that the discount should be removed:

"As far as the effect on local revenue is concerned, you will know that the proportion of local authority second homes attracting the 50% relief is reflected in the calculation of Revenue Support Grant."

In other words, there are no financial benefits for local authorities if they wish to vary the contribution that they are seeking from second home owners. However, even if that were true in all circumstances—this assumes that all local authorities stick to their standard spending assessments—what about the interests of the taxpayer at the end of the day? If a local council taxpayer does not subsidise the second home owner, the effect, to judge by that reply from the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, is that the national taxpayer does. Therefore, the Government should take a second look at this matter.

There have been proposals from my Liberal Democrat colleagues, from Liberal Democrat councils and others that local authorities should, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall suggested, be given the powers to vary the rate of council tax in the affected areas. Perhaps that additional income should be ring-fenced to be directed towards affordable homes for local people, or to contribute towards local services that would otherwise not receive the same kind of support because of the existence of second homes in those areas.

The Government need to review that matter again. The rather complacent response that I have received from Ministers so far with regard to their review, saying that the council tax system is working very well in this area of second home ownership, is not accepted on the ground by local authorities that have to work the system.

The fourth matter is one of planning control. Proposals for change in the use class order have been made. On 1 October, the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions proposed the banning of second homes in certain areas. Either way, there would need to be a definition and some kind of use class order—some kind of regulation—to implement such a proposal.

I draw attention to something that the Minister will see in his own records, as I told him before the debate. The Isles of Scilly has pointed out that section 319 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 allows the Secretary of State to make orders modifying the Act's application to the Isles of Scilly. The Town and Country Planning (Isles of Scilly) Order 1992 is an example of that—it relates to local authority housing.

Without introducing primary legislation, the Minister could introduce an order giving the Isles of Scilly the power to have a use class order for second homes, use that as an initial experiment and then relate it to other areas. I hope that the Minister will take that on board. The councillors from the Isles of Scilly who have requested a response have not so far received a satisfactory answer.

I shall conclude now because I want the Minister to have ample time to respond to the points raised. I am interested primarily in equity and social inclusion, not in penalising second home owners. I am interested in probing the Government's thinking on this matter. I hope that the Minister will accept that my questions and comments are intended to be constructive. Judging from other comments made by the Government, I believe that this is a matter of concern for some members of the Government. I am asking for simple recognition of the fact that one person's apparent freedom may have both social and economic costs which are worthy of consideration, and that these costs should be reflected in policy, and not overlooked. I look forward to the Minister's reply.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Chris Mullin): The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. George) has raised an important issue and has presented his case very reasonably and forcefully. I shall do my best in the 11 minutes he has left to me to address the points that he raised, although we may have to follow one or two of them up by correspondence.

Although the quality of life is in many respects higher in the countryside than in the city, shortages of affordable housing in some areas are a matter of real concern. I lived in the west country 30 years ago, and even then the issue of second homes was a serious problem in some of the more scenic areas. In many rural areas, particularly those like the south-west, demand for housing is high, both from local people and from those who want to retire to pleasant surroundings or buy a second home. As the hon. Gentleman says, people on low incomes are easily squeezed out.

On a national level, the number of rural second homes is relatively small, amounting to less than 1 per cent. of housing stock. According to the hon. Gentleman, the proportion in popular tourist areas is as high as 30 or 40 per cent. I was informed that it was 20 per cent., but the hon. Gentleman probably has more detailed knowledge of the position.

As we are heard today, such concentrations of second homes are of real concern to communities that are rightly keen to ensure that there is enough affordable housing locally. The Government recognise the important contribution that housing makes to balanced, sustainable rural communities and the need for affordable housing, especially for those on low wages and for young people.

The area represented by the hon. Gentleman is very beautiful, but it is also an area of contrasts. The available employment is predominantly seasonal and low paid, and unemployment, especially in winter, is well above the United Kingdom average. When I was a reporter on the Sunday Independent in the west country, I was sent to St. Ives to write a feature on high unemployment outside the summer season, and I know that such unemployment makes it difficult for many local people to afford housing.

Local authorities, however, can and already do act to alleviate the problem. Penwith district council is currently advising owners of empty properties on how to return them to use. The council is now a member of the West Cornwall partnership with Carrick and Kerrier authorities, which are commissioning housing association projects jointly with the Housing Corporation. That should create some more affordable housing. Penwith has received a 50 per cent. increase in its total allocation from the housing investment programme for the current financial year, and I understand that it proposes to increase its financial support for registered social landlords during the year.

Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly will receive up to £314 million from European structural funds over the next seven years to increase economic prosperity. Although the funds are not targeted directly at housing, they have the potential to support housing initiatives indirectly. I acknowledge that the Government also have a part to play. We have introduced a number of initiatives to help people to buy their own homes through low-cost home ownership schemes; we have also taken steps to improve the quality and increase the supply of affordable rented housing.

The Government have a good record on social housing. We have increased investment significantly: local authorities will receive an additional £4.4 billion for housing during the life of the current Parliament, which will enable many of them to begin to tackle the backlog of renovation. They can use some of the money to provide new social housing in order to meet local priorities. Of the extra resources, roughly £20 million will go to Cornwall, representing an increase of about two thirds.

Local authority housing expenditure programmes will be based on the priorities identified in their housing strategies, which should be based on robust assessments of local need and must take proper account of the needs of rural communities. It is vital for authorities to consult local interests such as parish councils in developing rural housing strategies. The Housing Corporation and the Countryside Agency are jointly funding a project to develop a good practice guide for local authority rural strategies.

The Housing Corporation continues to have a significant role in the delivery of new housing. It will deliver about 40,000 new social lettings in England during the present year, some in Cornwall. To ensure that sufficient priority is given to the needs of small communities, we have set a rural housing target each year. The current target is that 3.4 per cent. of new homes provided by the Housing Corporation should be in villages with populations of fewer than 3,000. Since 1989, when the programme began, it has provided an additional 16,000 homes in rural areas. The Housing Corporation has also established a rural housing advisory group, which is examining current approaches to establish whether they can be improved.

The planning system also has a part to play. Where there is evidence of a need for affordable housing, both low-cost market and subsidised, local planning authorities can require an element of such housing to be included as part of a wider residential development on suitable sites. The rural exceptions policy enables local planning authorities in rural areas to grant planning permission for land that would not otherwise be released for housing. A condition is that "exceptions housing" must be occupied only by people on low incomes.

Both the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) suggested that the spread of second homes could be controlled by the creation of a separate category of land use in the use classes order. I have been given a lengthy explanation of why that might not be possible for legal reasons, but time does not permit me to read it all out. I shall merely say that I should be glad to follow up the point in correspondence.

The hon. Member for St. Ives said that my Department had received a formal request from the Isles of Scilly for the Secretary of State to introduce secondary legislation requiring planning permission for housing that is to be used other than as a main residence. The wider issue of second homes has been raised by many people during consultation on the rural White Paper, and the concerns of the Isles of Scilly are likely to be considered in that context.

The hon. Gentleman made a forceful case for changes in council tax. He pointed out that second home owners had no difficulty in defining themselves once it was known that doing so would bring some financial advantage. There may well be a case for doing away with the discount for second home owners, but that might not solve the problem that the hon. Gentleman seeks to solve. Given that second home owners are by definition more prosperous than others, most can easily afford to pay the difference. I accept that that does not deal with the question of whether it should be done, but it is relevant to the problem that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

The hon. Gentleman said that he had received a rather complacent response from the Government, and, indeed, I have here a rather complacent response, which I will not read out. I merely say that the issue was reviewed about a year ago, and at the time there were no sufficiently cogent reasons for a change. I am, however, willing to follow up the point in my Department. Perhaps we can discuss it later.

I entirely accept the point raised by the hon. Gentleman. I am well aware that it is a serious issue in communities such as his. I regret to say that there are probably no easy answers: some problems can be solved, but others are more complicated. I hope that I have at least demonstrated, and that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge, that action is being taken to address the problem of low-cost housing in his constituency and others, but I recognise that more needs to be done.

Mr. Andrew George: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Mullin: I think that you are about to stop me, Mr. Jones, but the hon. Gentleman can try his luck.

Mr. George: May I return to this issue of the Isles of Scilly? The Minister says that the Government are reviewing the possibility of introducing secondary legislation. Are they considering a planning rather than a council tax regulation, and will they write to the council shortly?

Mr. Mullin: We shall be responding to the council, and, as I have said, the issue is likely to be reviewed in relation to the rural White Paper, which will have to address the whole issue. We have no plans to do what the Isles of Scilly wants in the immediate future, but I realise that the problem there is serious—perhaps more serious than the problem in any other part of the country.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 10 February 2000

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Badgers and Bovine Tuberculosis

[Relevant documents: Fifth Report of the Agriculture Committee, Session 1998–99 (HC 233), and the Government's response thereto (Session 1998–99, HC 612).]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting do now adjourn.—[Mr. McNulty.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I rise as acting Chairman of the Select Committee on Agriculture. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) has moved on to higher things—or lower, depending on one's view of the Whips Office. I was pushed into the breach, but I am getting to like the job.

I commend the fifth report of the Select Committee on Agriculture on badgers and bovine tuberculosis and I shall speak about the progress made on implementing its recommendations. I should start by saying that the report is good, which is my sincere opinion. The Committee was assisted by Professor Peter Hudson and Professor Tim Roper, who were excellent, stimulating and exciting advisers. The report was the first one produced by our Clerk, Lynn Gardner, who did a skilful and effective job writing it. The inquiry was well handled and I found it fascinating. I knew nothing at all about badgers before we produced the report—I had thought that they lived up in the Press Gallery. The report is a study of animal husbandry, farm procedures, wildlife and the activities of pressure groups on both sides of the issue, so its production was an educational experience.

The inquiry was undertaken because of the rapid spread of bovine tuberculosis. In common with Ministers and the report, I emphasise that bovine TB is not a human health issue, as the risk that it poses to humans is extremely low. However, the disease is an important issue, because herd breakdown is a devastating experience for farmers and destructive to their business. The National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association argue that compensation arrangements are inadequate, because, even though compensation is paid for slaughtered cattle, no account is taken of farmers' on-going finances. Herd breakdown is a devastating experience that has important repercussions on animal welfare, and it hits an industry that is already hard hit by the BSE crisis.

All those factors have to be taken into account when examining the problem of bovine TB, which is another of the good things that come from the south and spread to the north. Those things include high interest rates, although they have come from the south-east, whereas TB is moving up the country from the south-west. I see from the MAFF report that it has reached the Staffordshire-Derbyshire border, around Ashbourne. As it spreads up the country, its incidence and impact increase: in 1992, 1,626 compulsory slaughters were carried out; in 1998, that figure had risen to 6,086; and in the first half of 1999, it had risen to 3,756. It appears that the figures will increase again next year.

That spread and the alarm it generated led to the commissioning of the Krebs report, which was completed in December 1997. It argued that there was compelling evidence of a link between badgers and bovine TB—a link that some badger supporters, including Friends of the Badger, still deny, pointing to other possible sources of infection. The Select Committee report said that all such sources should be considered and researched to see whether the badger is the animal responsible, as the Krebs report suggested. We argued for research on trace elements and for new guidelines on animal husbandry, which the Department has since produced. The Committee also argued that other wildlife species should be considered in the research, and the Ministry acted on that recommendation as well.

However, I have to tell my hon. Friend the Minister that the National Federation of Badger Groups says—in a document that I received this morning, a copy of which I presume the Ministry has also received—that some of the recommendations have not been implemented. Specifically, the National Federation of Badger Groups states:

> "The Committee recommendation that MAFF ensure that a thorough and well-designed sampling procedure of wildlife species other than the badger be put in place in the trial to determine if M.bovis can persist in other species when badgers are removed"

has still not been acted upon; the work has still not started. Nor has MAFF provided more funding for research into the relative importance of cattle-to-cattle transmission, which was also recommended in the Select Committee report. I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply and hope that he will tell the Chamber whether those accusations are justified or whether those recommendations have been responded to.

The Select Committee also recommended that other alternatives should be considered, which is only right and proper if the research is to be adequate. We must point the finger of blame where the blame actually lies and be satisfied that there are no other methods of transmission. The Krebs report was unable to prove scientifically that badgers are responsible—it was unable to demonstrate a causal connection—but it pointed the finger of blame in that direction none the less. As a result, people believe that badgers are responsible and badger extermination by angry farmers continues because they are worried about the risk to their herds.

To determine where the blame lies, Krebs recommended that a proper scientific study be conducted, with 10 triplets in TB hotspot areas. Three different research strategies were to be pursued in each area. The first two were: total extermination—the proactive killing or bumping-off of all badgers at the start of the study; and reactive culling, where badgers are killed as a result of a herd exhibiting TB. The third group was a control, in which there was to be no culling at all—in so far as it is possible to prevent farmers from killing badgers unilaterally.

The Government accepted the Krebs report and set up the Bourne group to oversee the study. Then, in August 1998, the Government announced that they would go ahead with the Krebs recommendation, which is where the Select Committee came in. The Select Committee was somewhat worried that the experiment would be over-elaborate and difficult to carry out. The problem is not one of pure science: because it involves ecology, husbandry and human relations, it is not like a laboratory experiment in which it is possible to produce sound results.

The study was always likely to be subject to vagaries, such as whether farmers would continue to kill badgers illicitly. That is an inevitable human reaction, on which—unfortunately—I commented during one of the Committee's sittings. It was unfortunate because a friend from New Zealand had sent a group of badger enthusiasts down from Craven, having first told them that I would as least give them a fair and favourable hearing. The delegation then heard the hon. Member for Great Grimsby saying that, if he were a farmer, he would go out with a machine gun and mow the bastards down—not the delegates, the badgers. That incautious remark attracted an enormous amount of mail, mainly abusive and some of it purporting to come from badgers, but it made me realise that I should keep my mouth shut. Those are not my feelings—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) tells me that they are, but I was, as a representative of an urban constituency, merely speculating on the possible reaction of farmers to the disruption.

The trials could be disrupted by badger enthusiasts who decide, on humanitarian grounds, to make it harder to kill badgers. It was always going to be a difficult scientific approach and it will be hard to be consistent. I suggested that the trials should be cut down and speeded up. My amendment to that effect was vetoed tumultuously—the voting figures are in the back of the report, if hon. Members want to discover the extent of my sarcasm. However, the Krebs recommendations were simplified and modified by the Bourne report to make them acceptable to the Select Committee. Our main concern was one of speed and delay.

The Select Committee report is dated April 1999—a document of the last century, and it is distressing to find that it has not been implemented as fully, quickly and effectively as we wanted it to be. The delay puts greater pressure on farmers to act unilaterally and creates more difficulties in the areas in which bovine TB is spreading. Herd breakdown is a problem that is galloping ahead of us, and the Ministry must catch up quickly. If research is delayed, there will be increased pressure from farmers: they will want to know why we are floundering around when something more should be done immediately. Farmers will not view this as a scientific or academic issue, but as one that is vital to their livelihoods and continued activity on their farms.

I accept that MAFF is a piggy in the middle—that is, perhaps, not the best phrase to use, given that Agriculture questions today were largely devoted to the pig industry crisis. The Ministry is under pressure from Friends of the Badger and the farming lobby, yet has had a counsel of perfection urged upon it. However, the major delays in establishing the triplets that had occurred before the Select Committee met have continued. The Select Committee and the Bourne report wanted the system to be up and running by February 2000, but here we are, in February 2000, and the Governments first report tells us that, although progress has been made, only six of the 10 triplets have been enrolled and culling has begun in only three.

We are well behind schedule. The latest Bourne group report, which was published last week, is moving the target for identifying the triplets to the end of this year, with culling starting in only seven of the 10 triplets. The problem has arisen because of disruption and the difficulty in recruiting staff and identifying areas, but it is longstanding and urgent action is required. We need accurate information that allows us to pin the blame where it belongs and to develop an approach to cope with the problem, but we may not get that information until 2005, or possibly later. Meanwhile, bovine TB will rampage on, and that is exactly what the Select Committee wanted to avoid.

Delays happen for all sorts of reasons. I deprecate the fact that badger lovers have interfered with the trials: by so doing, they have failed to put their case as effectively as they should have done. It is no use blindly or blandly asserting that the badger is innocent: we need to know, and there is no way to identify the problem without the research. Nor is it useful for the Friends of the Badger to put great emphasis, as that organisation did in its evidence to the Committee, on vaccines, whether for badgers—which would be difficult—or for cows. The Committee recommended greater research effort in respect of both, but laid the main emphasis on cattle vaccine. Effort must be made to develop vaccines, but we do not have one yet and a vaccine might not solve the problem anyway. In the meantime, the Krebs recommendations must be implemented so that we can discover what is responsible for herd breakdown.

I am not here to adjudicate between badger lovers, who in some ways have overreacted, and MAFF, which has in a sense underreacted. It has been too dilatory, perhaps for financial reasons. I know, from the impact on the fishing industry, the state of MAFF's accounts.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley) indicated assent.

Mr. Mitchell: I see my hon. Friend the Minister nodding his head in worry. I hope that such problems are not blighting his life, but they are certainly not making the research any speedier.

The Select Committee's view was that research to secure an understanding of the matter needed to be expedited. One issue to be addressed is the delay in getting started, but another relates to research on the road traffic accident survey—post mortems on badgers killed on the roads. Unless we are to assume that a badger infected with TB is more vulnerable to being killed on the roads, because it moves less quickly or is more stupid, it is safe to suppose that sampling from badgers killed on the roads will give us an idea of the incidence, scale and spread of the disease. The CLA has stated in representations that post mortems have been halted because of health and safety concerns. Have they been halted? When will they restart? It is difficult to picture dead badgers in cold storage waiting for the research to resume—or for MAFF's period of overspend to pass so that the funding can be provided, but it must be provided, because badger autopsies do not come cheap. The Government's latest reply on the issue is not very cheerful.

The Government need to get on with appointing an independent statistical adviser to verify the statistics and the results. MAFF's initial reply to the Select Committee was that that would be done, but I understand that it has not been done. The Select Committee made various suggestions on how to fine tune the research to make it more sophisticated and effective. We wanted more information and progress reports, better public awareness and education and better liaison with the Bern convention. We got action on that: in July 1999 the Government did what our report recommended and, in December 1999, a standing committee of the Bern convention agreed that the cull proposed in the triplets was in accord with the convention. One might wish that that statement had been made earlier, but it came and it was a direct result of the Agriculture Committee's intervention. We wanted more information: we wanted to know when cattle had their last tuberculosis test and better liaison with farmers.

The sophisticated recommendations have been acted upon, which narrows the focus of our concern to issues of money and speed of action. The report's main point remains the most important, nine months on. Bovine TB is a serious issue, and the short-term problem is getting worse, causing increasing anxiety in the farming community. The longer the research is delayed, the more long-term policies and proposals get put back. As the Committee's acting spokesman, my message to the Minister is, "Get on with it".

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): On behalf of the Opposition, I start by congratulating the Select Committee on Agriculture on its report, and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on his introductory speech. He is not renowned for sycophancy and he lived up to his reputation this morning, but I am sure he agrees with my thanking my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), who was Chairman of the Agriculture Committee when it deliberated on the important issue that we are debating today.

I understand that either the Government or MAFF put a great deal of pressure on the House authorities to prevent today's debate from taking place. If that is true, it is a great shame. I regret that our debate is being held in Westminster Hall and not in the Chamber, because, as the Minister said in the Chamber earlier today, the issue is crucial. The former Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), used to say that, as an issue facing MAFF, bovine TB was second in importance only to BSE, and I would not disagree with his conclusion.

I shall refresh hon. Members minds as to the scale of the issue. The Krebs committee, set up by the previous Government, reported in December 1997; it used 1995–96 statistics, which are now out of date because of the spread of the disease since that time. The latest figures, which go up to the end of October 1999, show that, in the preceding two full years, there was a 47 per cent. increase in confirmed cases of the disease in England and a 44 per cent. increase in Great Britain as a whole. Although we welcome it, no one can understand why the figure for Great Britain dropped to 14 per cent. in the first 10 months of 1999.

Equally serious is the number of incidents in herds that have not had breakdowns in the previous 10 years. In what was the county of Avon, 15 of 25 incidents were in herds that had not had a breakdown in the previous 10 years; in Cornwall, it was 103 of 139, and in Devon, 54 of 99. That shows that more than half the outbreaks take place in new locations, among herds that have not had an outbreak for 10 years. The frontier counties into which the disease is spreading show a similar, or worse, picture: in Staffordshire, 29 of the 30 cases were in herds that had not had an outbreak in 10 years; in Shropshire, four out of five cases; and all six cases in Derbyshire occurred in herds that had not had a case for 10 years. The figure on MAFF's website for England, excluding the west region, shows that there were 17 cases in 1995, rising to 57 cases in 1998, in herds in which there had been no previous incidents. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby said, the number of cattle slaughtered rose by 76 per cent. in those four years.

The Opposition support the outcome of Professor Krebs's deliberations, but we must recognise that the situation has worsened considerably since his committee considered it. Wherever I go in the country, there is talk about how helpless farmers feel and their threat—I shall use no stronger word—to take illegal action because they feel that nothing else is being done.

The Government abandoned the previous Government's policy of interim culling as soon as they took office. It is not unreasonable to conclude that that might be one reason why outbreaks in 1998 rocketed by more than 40 per cent. The Opposition do not advocate unnecessary culling, but a sense of proportion is required. The badger population in this country is not under threat—studies have demonstrated that there are between 300,000 and 450,000 badgers—and the animal health issue is an important one. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that it is not a major human health issue—touch wood; we hope that it does not become one—but we must address the animal health issue, which affects not only cattle but other wildlife species, including badgers.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Does my hon. Friend not see a paradox between the Government's attitude on taking a precautionary cull outside the Krebs trial plots where badgers are linked to TB and their precautionary principle in banning beef on the bone?

Mr. Paice: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I shall consider areas outside the trial plots later.

Paragraph 127 of the report says clearly:

"We are also concerned at the lack of urgency displayed by MAFF officials in implementing the trial and other aspects of the programme."

Paragraph 7.8.20 of the Krebs report says of the trial:

"We recommend that it is initiated within four months (by the spring of 1998)."

[Mr. Paice]

Professor Bourne's report, issued 19 months after Krebs, stated that culling had started in three triplets. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby incorrectly said that culling had started in seven.

Mr. Mitchell: I said that it would have started in seven by the end of this year.

Mr. Paice: I apologise if I had misunderstood. There are currently only three, with no more until the end of the closed season—culling will not take place until the summer.

In two years, only six out of 10 triplets at most will be up and running; four have not yet been identified. There are countless examples in the Committee's report and in the Krebs report of problems due to the delays, to which the hon. Member for Great Grimsby referred.

The Opposition believe that the trials are essential and that they should be supported by those on all sides of the debate. The hon. Gentleman was right—we must find out the facts. Even those who are rightly and understandably concerned about the culling of badgers should accept that we must get as near the truth as it is possible to be, given the vagueness of science. We could finally clear up not only whether there is a link between badgers and the spread of bovine TB, but how significant the link is in the spread of TB and whether culling makes any difference.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that farmers' anecdotal evidence should still be considered? It might not be statistical, but it could suggest what is going on.

Mr. Paice: I entirely agree—there is a mass of anecdotal evidence about badgers, which is widely believed in the farming community and outside. As Krebs himself recognised, everything points to that, although there is not the scientific evidence to prove a link. I hope that the trials will either prove it or disprove it.

I wholly condemn any disruption of those trials and any threats to or victimisation of the operators, who are fulfilling a need. I hope that the Minister will assure us that the Government will use every method possible to protect the operators and ensure that the trials proceed as quickly as possible. However, given what the trials involve, it should be borne in mind that the Ministry and its operators are under an obligation to ensure that the trials are conducted as humanely as possible. Last year's television programme clearly showed that the guidelines were not being followed in at least one or two cases, so the Government must ensure that they are.

Conclusion (h) of the Committee's report states of the rate of incidence of bovine TB:

"MAFF should pay more attention to identifying the principal cause of this increased rate. One approach would be to apply models and examine whether the spatial and temporal patterns observed could be accounted for as a consequence of the cessation of the badger cull in 1997."

I entirely agree with that, but it is wishful thinking to believe that the Government would do it. MAFF would worry that such an approach would prove that the cessation of the culling had made the problem worse.

The Committee addresses the issue of vaccines at length. Krebs rightly points out that cattle vaccines would be easier to develop and certainly easier to administer than badger vaccines. We also need to develop a test to determine whether a cow is infected with TB that would not be compromised if the cow had been vaccinated. Thus, a double development is needed. Krebs also says—Professor Bourne said the same—that it will be 10 or 15 years before such a vaccine is developed. Interestingly, that has been the figure given for the past 20 or 30 years: in previous investigations into TB in cattle, a cattle vaccine has always been said to be 10 years away, so it does not seem to be getting any closer. That might not be surprising when seen in the light of one of Professor Krebs' statements. He said:

"Currently no money is targeted at this specific area although 26 per cent. of MAFF's total TB research budget is spent on the related area of badger vaccines."

Will the Minister tell us how much is now being spent on the development of cattle vaccines?

The question of husbandry rightly received some attention from the Select Committee. Professor Krebs made various recommendations, including one that "the possibility of testing various proactive husbandry strategies should be explored with the farming industry."

I am aware that the Government have now set up a husbandry panel, but its first meeting was about a month ago—more than two years after the outcome of the Krebs report in December 1997 and therefore another example of immense delay. The previous Government published advice leaflets that, I acknowledge, were withdrawn more than five years ago; however they were replaced only in the middle of 1999, despite the advice of Krebs and Professor Bourne.

Mention was made of carcase testing and the Health and Safety Executive's prevention of the testing of badger carcases for TB, whether they come from the trials or are traffic accident casualities. I hope, but doubt, that the Minister will tell us that those laboratory tests are to recommence. There is a huge backlog to be dealt with, which will prevent the recommencing of any road traffic accident testing, although that approach has a lot to commend it.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) suggested, I shall turn to the issue of farmers who are outside the trial areas.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): My hon. Friend will be aware of the nine-point action plan recommended by the National Farmers Union in light of the Krebs report. Does he agree that farmers in the control areas are at special risk and remain completely exposed? Does he think that there is a case to be made for comprehensive compensation, bearing in mind the fact that those farmers are quite helpless and—mixing my metaphors like the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—are being made into guinea pigs?

Mr. Paice: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Indeed, I would have made that point if I had kept going for another 30 seconds.

We welcome the Government's decision to increase the compensation rate to 100 per cent. of the animal's value. We have no wish to decry that. The Select Committee referred to the NFU's proposals and urged the Government to give serious consideration to its nine-point plan. The NFU proposals were sent to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food a year ago, but they have yet to be acted on. The Government's latest response is that discussion is in progress. A year on, we are no further forward; in the meantime, as has been said repeatedly, in the Select Committee and elsewhere, breakdowns are continuing at an ever increasing rate.

The NFU told the Select Committee that the average cost per farm of a breakdown is £3,000 a month. The whole process costs the vast majority of those who experience it at least £18,000. On average, about 1,200 herds are under restriction at any time. Therefore, the cost to the industry is more than £3.5 million a month, at a time when dairy and beef sectors are in serious difficulties. The NFU estimate that 50 per cent. of breakdowns may occur outside areas that are covered by the survey or by control areas of triplets in which there is no culling.

The independent study group examined the idea of culling outside trial areas and concluded that that would serve no useful purpose. I hope that that proposition has not been wholly discounted and that it will be re-examined when the Government panels have given the matter further consideration. However, the study groups's report, which was published only on Monday, stated that illegal culling would hamper the trial and would, at the very least, extend it before it had any sufficient statistical power in relation to triplet years. That is another reason why farmers and others, however desperate, will not take part in illegal culling.

Nevertheless, many farmers feel that they have been hung out to dry during the trials, which involve a much greater time scale than was envisaged by Krebs. It will be 2005 before the 50 triplet years are complete, which Krebs said was necessary for statistical power to be achieved. In the meantime, much of the country—involving, perhaps, 50 per cent. of the outbreaks—receives no help at all. The Government should re-examine consequential costs with a view to securing at least some compensation. That would discourage farmers from taking the law into their own hands.

I shall make a few more proposals in the spirit of productivity. There has been no study of the terms of the existing movement restriction rules, which have been the same for many years. They may be too lax, too tight or just right; what is certain is that they have a huge impact on farms, as the NFU figures demonstrate. Under those restrictions, farmers can only move their stock to slaughter, so they require extra housing, possibly extra winter forage and certainly more working capital, which is not easily come by at present.

At least the calf processing scheme provided an outlet for farmers who traditionally sold their calves at a few days old. Now, they are just one more example of animals being shot at birth, which is happening in all too many parts of the country today as a result of the crisis in the industry. I hope that the Minister will also consider introducing a specific calf processing aid programme for farms that are under restrictions because of an outbreak. He might also agree to instigate an immediate study of those restriction orders. It may show that they are perfectly correct, but in view of the huge impact that they have on farms, it is reasonable at this stage to ask that such a study be carried out.

My second point concerns TB testing. Most areas of Great Britain are tested every four years. According to EU directive 97/12, annual testing is required unless less than 1 per cent. of the herd is infected; testing is required every two years if infection is between 0.2 per cent. and 1 per cent. and every three or four years if it is under 0.2 per cent. I understand that, in practice, decisions about the frequency of testing are left to the local office of the Ministry and the State Veterinary Service. Annual testing is done only in the real hotspots. There is a strong body of opinion that says that we should change to annual testing everywhere, because it would identify infected cattle much more quickly, before they developed visible lesions.

I would not go quite that far, but I remind the Minister that, not only is the incidence rising, but it is spreading into frontier counties in the midlands, north-west and south Wales. He should immediately reintroduce annual testing in those areas to try to stop the disease spreading further, even while the Krebs trials are taking place. I know that not all farmers would welcome annual testing, but that would be better than watching the spread going on and on and the breakdowns continuing to rise at their current rate.

I am grateful to you for your forbearance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in allowing me to respond on behalf of the Opposition to an excellent report that covers a number of issues. It is a pity that the Government sent their response to the Committee, because it is not now available to the rest of us as a result of no longer being the Government's property. The Minister kindly said that he would have given it to me if he could, but he could not. He knows what is in it and members of the Committee know what is in it, but hon. Members who are not members of the Committee have not seen it because the Committee itself is required to publish it. That will obviously detract from the debate.

Overall the report is a sad indictment of MAFF and a tale of woeful complacency in taking action on the Krebs recommendations. The Government talk of urgency and all their rhetoric is about the need to address a serious problem, but they are taking years to do what should have been done in months. It is another example of the Government saying one thing and doing another. At the end of the day the Government will be judged on their actions, not their rhetoric.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has an opportunity this afternoon to convince the industry, not only that he takes the issue seriously, but that he will put enough money into all aspects of the independent study group's recommendations. He could say that money is not a problem when addressing such a serious crisis. I hope that he will immediately decide what he is going to do in the rest of the country, which is suffering while these trials are taking place.

I am worried about how disillusioned and dispirited farmers, who are already desperate because of the economic situation in their industry, will react if they feel that nothing is being done to address the problem in the majority of the country. The Government have a lot of questions to answer, and I am not the only one asking them. Farmers the length and breadth of the country, whose livelihoods are under immense threat because of the spread of this scourge of a disease, want answers. I hope that the Government will take heed of the Committee's recommendation and act now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. Before I call the next speaker, let me remind hon. Members that if the Government have replied to the Select Committee but the reply has not been published, the document is still privileged and its contents should not be referred to. So let us stop getting into trouble before we start.

3.14 pm

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall): As I have not seen the document, I shall not be falling into that trap.

Many aspects of this difficult and tragic problem are matters of dispute, mainly between farmers and their representatives and those who rightly want badgers protected. We often find ourselves in the crossfire and it is difficult to provide an objective way forward. I congratulate the Select Committee on its report, which is balanced and well presented. It should be read by anyone interested in the subject.

Three things are beyond dispute. First, delays are not due only to the present Government. I recall that the previous Conservative Government were undecided about what to do, even before the Krebs group was established. Time was lost and we are now many years down the line from when farmers first began to suffer from the problem. There were delays in getting the triplets study set up; the report, dated April 1999, was delayed; and the Government's response in June was delayed. We are now nearly a year on from when the report was first presented and we have heard about many other delays.

Secondly, we all recognise that the situation is complex and that there is no definitive explanation, despite an enormous amount of anecdotal and other evidence. It is not a simple problem and there is no simple solution. Those on either side of the argument who pretend that there is a clear and simple solution are doing themselves no credit.

Thirdly, no one can deny that the incidence of bovine TB is increasing. It is increasing as we sit here debating it today as it has over several years. The disastrous effects should be tackled urgently. We can surely all agree about that.

I am sure that Professor Krebs' proposals are scientifically sound, but they depend greatly on the link with bovine TB in cattle and the clear presumption that badgers are the culprits. The trials have sought to prove that link. However, we know that bovine TB is found in other animals—deer, rats, squirrels and other wildlife. It can be argued that the trials are insufficiently rigorous about causes other than the assumed badger-cattle link, which could prevent us from searching for other potential links.

The Ministry is vague about the impact on animal husbandry, another area of great difficulty. The benefit of improved husbandry on the incidence of disease is not examined fully enough. Are the arrangements in non-trial areas adequate, as mentioned by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice)? It must be worth examining the NFU's proposals about action against small satellite outbreak areas, even during the trial period. It is difficult to envisage how it would affect the scientific data arising from trial areas.

There is a lack of a sense of urgency to develop a vaccine for TB. I did not realise that it had been going for quite so long. However, research and development were always going to take a long time and there seemed no great urgency to begin. Now here we are so many years down the line and still there are no concrete proposals for developing a vaccine. That lack of progress is in a way a criticism. We are always focusing on the badger, which may be right, but if we do not keep an open mind and fail to put money into other potential aspects, the criticism is fair.

A triplet trial is taking place in my constituency. Some of the officers and others have undoubtedly suffered in that their vehicles have been vandalised and some badgers have been released and so on, which is deplorable. That does not assist experimental trials or the preparation of the relevant data. We need to speed up existing trials. Perhaps the Minister will tell us why the trials have slowed down when the matter is clearly urgent.

Farmers who are asked to participate in trials and are part of a control area where no badgers are to be culled are clearly exposed to the continuing effects of the disease. It is difficult to understand why they should not be compensated for their negative role. They feel that they are contributing to the experiment and to information that comes from it, and feel keenly about being made to pay such a heavy price.

Post mortem testing has been mentioned. I have never seen quite so many badgers at the roadside as I have in the past year or two. I do not know whether it is to do with driving or the number of badgers, but there must be enormous potential evidence that should be of great assistance to the data that will be made available. Surely this makes sense in post mortem testing of badgers.

We also feel that the Government should work much more closely with the industry. We are delighted that the TB forum has been set up. It will help farmers to feel more involved in the process. I welcome that and hope that their deliberations and any reports will not be kept secret, because a certain amount of openness will be helpful, even if from time to time it brings emotions to the fore.

The Liberal Democrats are glad that the Government have decided to act on Krebs, and we welcome again the TB forum. The need is urgent, but the current trials are clearly going too slowly. It has been suggested that that is due to a lack of resources, but I hope that that is not so. Perhaps the Minister will say something about it. We hope that the post mortem of badgers will be restarted. The incidence of the disease in the country is increasing; in the far south-west it is an extremely difficult matter. Farmers are faced with it, and there is no slowing down. A sense of urgency needs to be re-injected into the whole process of experiments.

We trust that the Government will reconsider the compenation question, especially for farmers involved in trials and control, as well as—this was again turned down this morning—the consequential loss suffered by producers on account of herd breakdown. This disease has potentially the same devastating effect on the industry as BSE. Part of the problem with BSE was that we did not get hold of it quickly enough. I hope that the same will not occur with bovine TB and that the Government will put resources in at the front end and inject a sense of urgency, to enable us to understand the disease, decide how it is spreading and tackle it as quickly as possible.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, may I make clear my previous ruling? It referred to the document received by the Select Committee yesterday, not to the Government response dated 30 June 1999.

3.25 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I shall be wary about what I read. I am not sure which document we are talking about, because there have been so many, so I shall tread gently.

I am delighted to take part in the debate on what is clearly a complex, detailed and emotive subject. Those of us who have studied it in depth for some time know the conflicts and difficulties of trying to reach a preferred position. It is important to consider the position as a whole. We are here to discuss the Select Committee's report, which follows the Krebs and Bourne reports. This week, we received the report of the independent scientific group, which made many points about the progress of the experiment.

To me, the background is daunting. So prevalent is the disease that I do not think that there is a dairy farm in my area—which is mainly dairying—that has not been shut comparatively recently, or that is not shut now, or that does not live under continual fear of being shut. The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) pointed out that the numbers tailed off a little last year. It is too early to say anything about this year. Gloucestershire is the focus of a major cluster, as the path of the disease leads out of the south-west.

We have to try to understand the complexities. Several hon. Members have commented on what might be deemed to be the cause of the disease, but we must tread carefully because, as the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) said, we cannot be certain about the root cause. I should like to talk a little about the transmission mechanism which in some senses is more important than the cause.

I am fortunate in having within my constituency the Woodchester project, which has been investigating the issue for more than 20 years and probably knows more about it in the round than any other scientific investigation. As for my background, I have only recently joined the Select Committee so I have no ownership of the report. I sat in on some of the evidence-giving sessions and found them illuminating. They gave rise to a debate that was worth while, even if it offered no greater clarity about the cause of this dreadful disease.

The subject is sensitive and emotive, and my knowledge of some of the problems in the field is only second-hand. It is difficult to criticise the Government for things that may be only partly within their control. As anyone who knows anything about the trials is aware, there have been considerable difficulties in attempting to carry them out. Given the pressure to get on with them, we must use common sense when describing what has taken place and in explaining the reasons why the trials have not progressed as smoothly as they might have done.

We agree that bovine TB is apparently getting worse. As it is apparently a cyclical disease, it should by now have begun to wane; there was some evidence of its waning last year, but the disease is spreading. the potential height of the peak causes us to fear what may happen in future, so we want to know what causes the increased incidence. We must look beyond the areas that traditionally suffer—the south-west is the core—and recognise that the disease is spreading outwards and causing alarm in places that have traditionally not feared it.

Although we must discuss animal welfare issues, about which various arguments are made, we should recognise that, fundamentally, we are dealing with raw economics. The suffering of farmers who have to deal with herd breakdowns should not be underestimated. At least one person whose farm is currently closed is present for the debate. I know what closure does: it has an enormous effect on income and expenditure, as well as on human beings. Having witnessed breakdowns, I cannot think of any worse psychological experience than having to sit and wait for your next test—at best a rather rudimentary procedure—and then wait for your results to emerge. Those of us who are not in farming cannot understand that unpleasant experience, but we can at least sympathise.

There is concern that bovine TB is attracting more of a stigma because of increasing knowledge about it. A farm that has been closed subsequently has to go on with its business subsequently. It may encounter problems in selling animals, although I do not want to emphasise that too much. Traceability makes the cause of problems more obvious, which does not make the job of the farmers concerned any easier.

We must start by considering what is ruled in and what is ruled out. For all sorts of reasons, the Government maintain that the wholesale slaughter of badgers should not be considered. In response to Krebs and in other statements, they have said that such a slaughter is not on the agenda, and previous Governments have concurred with that view. We are looking for solutions, and the Committee's report is clearly a part of that process. We are also trying to bring different parties on board: I remind hon. Members that, even with the best will in the world, some of those parties will not necessarily agree—there is a degree of conflict, not only about the practicalities, but about the science and the philosophy of which is the most important animal. We cannot hide from such disagreements.

Every other strategy tried has failed. We can see that by looking back to the early days, when my own county discovered the impact of bovine TB—I should say rediscovered, as the disease is not new. My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) was just whispering to me about a series of programmes on farming in the 19th century. Bovine TB may not have been understood then, but some of its impact was realised. It came back to haunt us with a vengeance in the early 1970s—some would say that it returned even earlier. At that time, various badger control strategies were considered. Farmers were licensed to kill badgers in those days, but that did not solve the problem. They then went through the gassing episode; that option was eventually ruled out, even though some would argue that it was the only effective way of dealing with the problem. Gassing was seen to be too cruel and it did not stop the disease, which came back yet again.

Attempts to tackle the problem included the Zuckerman review; the Dunnet review, which introduced the clean-ring strategy; and proactive culling in Thornbury, in a constituency next door to mine. I do not know whether any hon. Members have read the interesting report on the Thornbury experiment, which changed my mind to some extent. I am told that, although it was not a scientific appraisal, it gave a clear exposition of the impact on cattle of clearing an area of badgers and keeping it clear. The previous Government led us into a sort of moratorium, which, with the best will in the world, has not worked. There is now an even greater incidence of bovine TB.

That is the nature of the problem. Anybody who thinks that there is a quick fix—a strategy that can be implemented and will work within months or even years—is deluded. No scheme yet implemented has worked. That is the difficult background against which we must consider this awful disease. The Government have a clear five-point strategy, the first strand of which is to protect public health. The second strand is vaccine development, even though there is concern that the wholesale vaccination of cattle might mean that you affect TB-free status.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are talking about bovine tuberculosis. The hon. Gentleman's speech contains too many "yous", which refer to me, and I have not been tested for tuberculosis since I was 12.

Mr. Drew: I apologise Mr. Deputy Speaker. I would not say that you were in any way part of the tuberculosis problem.

The Government's strategy also includes the prevention of cattle-to-cattle spread and research trials. We have concentrated on those trials, but they are only part of the overall programme investigated by the Select Committee. That is what we should be discussing.

The basis of my argument is that science has caused the problem and we must use science to sort it out. The background is immensely complicated and the disease itself is unpredictable. The problem involves animal welfare: we need to protect cattle, badgers and other species that might play a part in the spread of disease. Some of those animals—rats, deer, foxes, ferrets and feral cats—are being trapped as part of the Government's programme. I am trying to avoid what might be described as "speciesism", because there are dangers in that approach, but I am alarmed when people say, "It can't be the badger", or, "It must be the badger". Both arguments are wrong. We must learn how science can enable us to find real explanations.

One reason for the delay is that the Government's strategy has been questioned. In clarifying their intentions to the Bern convention, they proved that they are neither involved in the worst sort of animal welfarism, nor culling for the sake of it. There is a rationale and we are in the midst of a long-term strategy. I hope that we will get some early evidence, but it must be borne in mind that it will be years before concrete results emerge. The issues are complicated, involving epidemiology, pathogenesis and immunology, all of which need to be investigated before we decide whether we can vaccinate.

I want to separate the causal features from the transmission features, because it is important that we examine both. Although one can lead to the other, they are not necessarily a sequitur. In terms of causes, we always start with the strong circumstantial evidence that there is a badger-to-cattle infection. However, if that is the case, why not consider cattle-to-badger or cattle-to-cattle transmission, or even a path of transmission involving other live animals? Such issues must be clarified.

People allege that differerent factors are involved in the transmission mechanism, so the Bourne group will test those in an effort to explain why the incidence may be getting worse. One factor is climatic change: the fact that we no longer have a winter has an impact on whether we can kill M.bovis, which is on the ground. Soil conditions, location and the ecology—including, of course, the ecology of the badger—are also relevant factors. Tuberculosis is a stress-related disease: those who oppose culling come what may argue that increasing stress levels could spread the disease, rather than eradicate it. There may be a question of trace element deficiency in what badgers or cattle eat. Are some animals more susceptible than others?

Animal husbandry and the movement of animals also need to be considered. It has been said that bovine TB might have been imported when so many farms had to restock as a result of BSE. I do not know whether that can be proved. [Interruption.] I see that the former Select Committee Chairman, the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), is nodding. I am sure that he will comment on that in due course.

I welcome much of what the Government have done, and I do not want to go over ground that has been covered by other hon. Members, save to say that I am glad that an attempt is now being made to increase data collection and analysis. Everyone seems to welcome the TB99 form and so do I. More support is being given to farmers, which is overdue. It is possible to criticise the two leaflets that have been issued on the grounds that they could contain more information, but at least it has been recognised that information is needed.

I want to discuss animal husbandry in more detail. It is not my way to criticise farmers or to say that their destiny is in their own hands. I do not think that that is entirely true. However, farmers could do more to help themselves if they could be persuaded that the transmission of the disease could be reduced. That is not necessarily a matter of doing anything complicated; it might be achieved by addressing such questions as where troughs are put and whether maize or silage is fed to cattle. The benefits that might be obtained thereby must be explained and demonstrated.

The issue is one of managing risk. Some, at the extremes of opinion, have argued that there should be no dairying in the south-west. That is pretty crass, because dairying is part and parcel of the south-west, but it was mentioned as a possibility in the Select Committee report. That suggestion deserves to be ruled out just as much as removing all the badgers from the south-west. Neither option is acceptable or practicable.

The possible link with human beings must be recognised. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will confirm that, in Gloucestershire, there has been a couple of cases of young people apparently infected with bovine TB of the same strain that has caused the farm on which they live to break down. Although it is very rare, cases occur and the human dimension must never be underestimated, even though pasteurisation of milk seems to deal with that side of the problem. We still—wrongly—allow into the food chain animals that have gone to slaughter because they have been deemed to be reactors. I know that testing has always tended to prove that the likelihood of spread of bovine TB is very low, but that is one risk too many. I should welcome a response on that point. We need better tests that are able to show the path of the disease more accurately. Perhaps, as well as testing cattle, we should revisit the question of testing live badgers. That was ruled out before because the tests were so inaccurate, but it might help us show how the disease is spreading.

During Agriculture questions, I raised a point about consequential losses. Having talked to farmers in my constituency, I feel strongly that they could ask that several measures be adopted, some of which would be of limited effect, but all of which have a monetary value. They would certainly like MAFF to be a little more flexible with the budget, especially in relation to how and when money is paid. They have incurred costs, which there is no way of recovering, unless they are fortunate enough to have an all-embracing insurance policy. However, it must be increasingly difficult to get insurance because the likelihood of risks being realised is increasing.

There is also the cost of having to feed more animals, which is an animal welfare issue. Just as we may have to take action against badgers, it is also cruel to keep animals penned up: there are strict controls on closed herds and farmers, who might be without an income, must feed those animals. Likewise, there is pressure in terms of the milk quota. Farmers might have to milk more animals, but it is doubtful that they will receive any assistance in that. The very farmers who want to collaborate to farm their way out of the current problems may be those who are most disadvantaged: they might want to move their herds to the next-door farm to share milking costs, but they are faced with the terrible dilemma that, for several months of the year, they might be unable to do so because the herd is closed. As I have already mentioned, sale onwards may also be affected.

The tenor of the debate has been that the Government have been slow to act, more could have been done, and my hon. Friend the Minister, who is partly responsible for the matter, must talk to the people involved and try to gee things up but the answers are not as easy as that. Whisper it quietly—and slowly: causation might be as difficult to ascertain as it has always been. However, that does not mean that we should not work on transmission mechanisms as a means of controlling, if not eradicating, the disease.

The issue is one of money and securing the support of farmers. It is also about trying to get the support of those who oppose culling. I wish that badger groups would understand that no one wants to kill badgers—no one goes out, gung-ho, to get badgers. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) made some light-hearted remarks about confrontation, but there is no point in exacerbating such problems. We must find solutions, even if they have to be for the long term. I hope that badger groups will understand what the Government are doing. The Government have the support of all the hon. Members who have contributed to the debate, and anything that they and we can do should be welcomed.

This is an important debate, although it might have taken place some months ago. We can now begin to deal with an incredibly difficult situation.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, I should say that, if all hon. Members take more than 20 minutes, there will not be sufficient time for everyone to make a contribution, so it is up to hon. Members to limit their speeches.

3.48 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): During Agriculture questions this morning, I heard the Minister describe this exercise as an experiment: it is a trial, not an experiment, as we were forcfully reminded by the advisers during the inquiry. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who so ably opened the debate, is, in a sense, on trial himself. [HON. MEMBERS: "He is the experiment."] I shall not respond to that. The hon. Gentleman certainly demonstrated his usual wit and flair, coupled with a new-found sense of responsibility. I am told that he behaved himself well in Brussels earlier this week, which is a surprise to many of us.

Mr. Mitchell: It is difficult to do anything else in Brussels.

Mr. Luff: When I told the hon. Gentleman that he had to lead the Select Committee delegation to Brussels, he suggested that he might go armed. The usual cry from the Conservative Back Benches when a Member behaves so responsibly is, "Give him a job." The Government Whip is in his place and I commend that course of action to him. The time has come to give the hon. Member for Great Grimsby a job.

I approach the debate with mixed emotions. Technically, in the eyes of the House, I am still Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, even though, since I joined my hon. Friends the Members for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) and for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) in the usual channels, I have had to relinquish that responsibility.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that that is not a criticism of me, because with another hat on, I am trying to do something about that.

Mr. Luff: I would not dream of criticising the Chair, especially not the current occupant.

I pay tribute to the Agriculture Committee. Its report was very good and I am glad that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby paid tribute to the authors of the report and to the Committee's advisers. The Select Committee conducted its work in a spirit of genuine bipartisanship and examined issues on the basis of the facts before it. That greatly strengthened its criticisms of the Government and, occasionally, of their predecessors. I, too, pay tribute to Professor Krebs, and to Professor Bourne and his group, who so ably understood the problems and intepreted them. There are real problems, and I am delighted that the Government, at least in their rhetoric, take them so seriously. To the best of my knowledge, this is the first time that the Government, voluntarily, have responded twice to an Agriculture Committee report. I shall not breach the terms of your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the current response may or may not be entitled the first progress report, which suggests that there is a determination to produce further responses, which I would welcome.

If the Minister wants to get such reports published, he has the option of publishing the Command Papers, which would be a speedier process than referring them to Select Committee. If he had taken that option, we would have been able to refer to the Government's response to the report—something that I would not dream of doing. I hope that the Minister will allude to one or two of the more important themes in the response when he replies to the debate.

I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), who was deeply committed to the Krebs and Bourne processes and who spoke with great honesty and integrity, having changed his mind, I suspect, on the basis of the evidence put before him. That is a tribute to him. Baroness Hayman, who is the Government spokesman on the issue, is similarly committed to the process. I do not criticise the Minister, as the noble Baroness cannot be present. The authorities of the House may like to consider inviting Ministers in the House of Lords to reply to debates in Westminster Hall when they have Government responsibility for those issues.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): No.

Mr. Luff: My hon. Friend cries, "No," and, in my new position, I must defer to him, so I withdraw my suggestion.

The issue is urgent. All hon. Members with rural constituencies, whether they are in the south-west or the midlands—I believe that Shropshire is part of the midlands—know of farmers, many of whom are among our personal friends, who are in real difficulties because of the mounting crisis caused by bovine tuberculosis. My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) quoted figures drawn from NFU statistics. It is not just a matter of money: dairy or beef farmers in such circumstances find it an emotionally traumatising experience, and the Government understand that. The welfare of farmers and that of badgers and cows must be weighed in the balance.

Previous speakers have referred to the NFU's suggestions and, in the interests of brevity, I shall not repeat them. However, I hope that the Government will seriously consider the NFU's action plan. It is a moderate, sensible and practical way forward, which has considerable merit. I am sorry that it has taken so long for the Government to consider it.

The Government say all the right things, but do not go far enough in acting on them. I can refer to one document that tests that hypothesis: the second report of the independent scientific group on tuberculosis. The Select Committee hoped that there would be quarterly reports from that group. The National Federation of Badger Groups, in a helpful briefing document, drew attention to that recommendation and clearly hoped that the group would report more frequently. Far be it from me to be cynical, but I note that that response is dated December 1999; it is no small coincidence that the Government's new response document and the document before us were published this week, which shows the importance of debates on Select Committee reports, in principle, and on this issue. The second report is a helpful document, which justifies making further reports on a regular basis.

In his introduction to the report, in a letter addressed to the Minister dated 17 December 1999, Professor Bourne states:

"The field trial, which has inevitably received much media attention, is only one part of the overall research strategy."

We must remember that although debate on the issue focuses only on the field trial, there is so much more to it. It cannot be said too often that it is part of a coherent strategy; an holistic approach is being adopted, and however effective our debate, it is only one part of the process.

In his short letter, Professor Bourne also states that "there have been some delays with implementing field work about which we have expressed concerns".

He acknowledges that there have been delays, about which he is concerned. The report re-emphasises in paragraph 1.0.4 that the field trial lies at the heart of our understanding of the process. It cannot be said too often how little we know about the processes involved. I fondly imagined that we knew all that there was to know, and it was a matter of collating, as a desk research exercise, what was known of the experiments in Ireland, for example; but that is not the case. Professor Bourne helpfully reminds us that the trial is essential to a proper understanding of the subject. The whole project, including the controversial field trial, is essential.

Professor Bourne says in paragraph 1.0.10:

"It is disappointing and frustrating that circumstances have limited the number of triplets put in place."

I say amen to that. The original MAFF response states that the Government recognise that in implementing the strategy there has been "some slippage" compared with the original aspirations, which is quite a popular word in political debate at present. It states that the Government fully accept the Committee's emphasis and the need to keep up the pressure to see the programme through. Keeping up the pressure on the Government to see the process through is what the debate is all about.

The non-compliance issues are important and they are highlighted in the most recent document. However, the act of non-compliance that really matters is the risk that farmers may partake of illegal culling, which would destroy the power of a trial. It is not a laboratory experiment; I have heard badger groups argue that, because all the badgers in a proactive cull area are not killed, it invalidates the process. It does not: it is a real-world trial designed to encounter all the obstacles that may be faced. However, it would undermine the process if farmers took the law into their own hands. The evidence suggests that that is not happening, but I endorse the comments of other hon. Members who say that we should try to find a way of easing the financial consequences for farmers in the control areas who have to bear the knowledge and the fact of being able to do nothing about the problems on their farms. There is a strong case for improving the power of the experiment by considering that possibility.

One of the most puzzling features of the report from Professor Bourne's group is paragraph 4.34, in which reasons for delay are identified. It states:

"Recognised from the outset as factors which could not be managed, terrain and weather have significantly influenced progress on the ground. In particular, surveying work has often been hampered by unyielding geography and inclement conditions."

I know what rural England looks like, and what the weather is like. I find it surprising that the group has apparently only just woken up to the fact that it occasionally rains in Devon and Cornwall, and in Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Gloucestershire and Shropshire.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Does my hon. Friend agree that that statement is insulting to dairy farmers, who have to go out twice a day to get the cows in, regardless of the weather?

Mr. Luff: I hope that my hon. Friend is not suggesting that I was being insulting, but is referring to the report. That is a little uncharitable, but I agree with the spirit of what he says. The matter demonstrates a troubling ignorance of conditions on the ground.

Interference is alarming. A full triplet trial close to my constituency has been delayed as a result of activities by the animal rights lobby. Such interventions go well beyond what people expect and incredible threats have been made. The democratic process is being challenged. The Government have rightly decided to pursue the matter, which has been debated at length. Those who stand up for badgers' rights have had an opportunity to put their case, but the matter has been settled. That is regrettable and extremely worrying. Indeed, it raises important issues that go well beyond this narrow debate. From a local point of view, I selfishly hope that the Government will recommence abandoned operations as soon as possible.

I offer a small apology to the wildlife trusts which, regrettably, were criticised in the report for being non-compliant. I stand by that criticism, which sends farmers an important signal about responsible organisations' capacity for non-compliance. However, some operators of nature and bird reserves also failed to comply. I therefore apologise for singling out the wildlife trusts, but stand by the thrust of the criticisms. Mercifully, non-compliance is not a major issue and the report makes encouraging remarks about compliance levels. Trials that are working appear to be delivering the goods.

I want to emphasise the importance of the road traffic accident survey. Perhaps the most surprising thing of all in Professor Bourne's recent report are his remarks on the road traffic accident survey. I have no recollection of the matter being raised during the Select Committee's extensive investigations. Professor Bourne says:

"During lengthy consideration of the possible ways forward, however, it has emerged that a considerable amount of data were already being generated by the informal, ad hoc collection of badger carcasses by a number of the State Veterinary Service's divisional offices. In 1998, some 1200 carcasses were collected and examined—a similar sample size to that envisaged for the seven counties survey."

That is a reference to the counties most at risk of bovine tuberculosis. Professor Bourne continues:

"MAFF agreed with the ISG that this ad hoc work was of limited value and could be put to better use."

That is hugely worrying. The Government have discussed the road traffic accident survey in the response to which we cannot refer. However, will the Minister comment in detail on the matter in his winding-up speech? Bizarrely, many badger carcases which we believed were going to waste were not.

I shall repeat the fundamental criticism made by my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire and several other hon. Members. Lack of resources seems to be the problem. The delay in getting the triplets up and running is a matter of great concern. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby said in his opening remarks, we are seeing the fruits of MAFF's tight budgetary settlement. Why else is it thinking of closing down the Worcester regional service centre and other service centres?

I see someone screwing up his face. However, I have seen documents from the trade unions showing that there is a direct and genuine threat to MAFF's regional service centres. That is a matter of deep concern and another example of the financial pressures on MAFF. The issue is so serious that those pressures must not be allowed to get in the way of speedy implementation.

I do not know what the trial will eventually demonstrate. Badgers are a significant part of the problem, but other species are involved. Husbandry issues are also crucial, but I shall not elaborate on those matters again. Cattle-to-cattle transmission is of much greater importance than has generally been acknowledged.

The trial must continue. Farmers must sit on their hands and not interfere with the trials' effectiveness. Badger groups and the animal rights lobby must back off, otherwise more badgers than necessary will die as the trial is extended. If they do not do so, they will cause more suffering to the animals they claim to be helping. It is crucial that they allow the trial to happen and the results to come out so that a proper scientific policy can be developed. The Government must show that increased resources are available to enable the trial to be completed speedily.

4.4 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): I will try to be brief. Unlike my contributions to other Agriculture Committee reports, I was relatively light on this one, mainly because the report was excellent and I agreed entirely with its conclusions. What have we learned since? First, I want to bring in a human element by referring to a farmer who works not far away from my constituency whose farm has suffered from TB. He illustrates the problems that farmers face when that happens. He says:

[Mr. Mark Todd]

"I was absolutely devastated when I got the news. They are the words nobody wants to hear. Me and my family were tested . . . Thankfully we were all clear but I was holding my breath. Less than a week after that first case was discovered a badger roadside fatality was recovered near us which was riddled with TB. I had been told by the Ministry of Agriculture not to wash out the dog's bowl in the kitchen sink and make sure that the dogs are kept out of the way. The families should not get too close to the badgers, but tourists coming into the countryside to walk their dogs or for a day out wouldn't think about the possible risks that badgers and their waste pose. The dog could be sticking its nose and paws everywhere and still be petted the same by its owners. I think we are sitting on a time bomb here and unless something is done to control the badger population I think we are going to have a serious problem on our hands."

I do not share every intuition and thought quoted there, but it is a genuine comment and I have heard the same from other farmers. I am fortunate that bovine tuberculosis has not yet reached my constituency, but it is extremely close. My constituency borders that of the hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin). He has the burden currently—and it is a major burden—but I regularly hear from farmers on the Staffordshire-Derbyshire border of their worries about the potential effect of TB on their herds. The problem clearly has dramatic effects on the economics of a farm and I shall speak later about what we should do about it.

The problem also has a wider impact on the rural community: it restricts movement, interferes with the normal social relations of the farming community and spreads considerable alarm and concern among people living in the area. That shows the impact on the locality, but it has a major national impact to.

If we allow TB to continue to spread slowly but steadily across our nation, infecting more and more of our cattle, it will place us in the role of international pariahs once again with respect to our livestock produce. We are gradually working our way out of the BSE problem and we do not want other countries to claim that our herds are riddled with TB and to have nothing further to do with our livestock industry as a result. Unless we take steps to control the problem, there is a real risk of that happening.

Animal health is another issue. It is worth saying that TB is an unpleasant disease for badgers as well as for cattle. We have a duty to seek solutions to the problem. As I said, the approach attempted so far is holistic. We have already debated field trials. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) that some of the flaws are inherent to field trials. Professor Krebs never intended to transport the laboratory to the countryside and precisely replicate the scientific disciplines that would apply. He was testing two particular approaches to controlling TB and was aware of problems of non-compliance, deliberate obstruction and, occasionally, of farmers extending their responsibilities. He saw those problems as part of the trial; they were recognised from the start. The report has been criticised as flawed on that account. We all recognise that, although it was not a precise process, we could learn a great deal from it. I always felt that we should continue with the trial. I will not go into the criticism that has been made, but it concerns the speed with which we proceeded. Clearly, it has been much slower than we would have hoped.

What would I do in addition to the trial to extend the holistic approach? First, it would be useful to extend testing in herds beyond the immediate area affected, which is an approach similar to that suggested by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice). There is merit in considering the frequency of testing and, when there is a TB outbreak in an area, we should consider the scope for an immediate review of the testing arrangements in that area and around the edge of it to discover the extent of the outbreak at the earliest opportunity. There is much to be said for that.

Secondly, there is merit, if we have the resources—and there is an argument for making available the resources for this—in extending the use of the TB99 form to other parts of the country. Currently, it applies in the test areas and where TB outbreaks occur outside the test areas. However, if we are taking a holistic view and wanting to find out more about the incidence and non-incidence of the disease as well as its relationship to animal husbandry, ecology, the environment and other species, that is a legitimate learning process which could also be applied to livestock herds in non-affected areas. Having seen the TB99 form, I know that completing it is a labour-intensive exercise; indeed, the Committee criticised it for that. Nevertheless, it would be valuable if, over a period, we rolled it out in other livestock areas to identify what other issues we might learn about outside the immediate TB-affected areas. I recognise that that would have a lower priority than some other activities, but we might learn a good deal.

Then there is the issue of how better to compensate and motivate farmers. I will not repeat what has been said, but those who are part of the control element within the trial areas deserve something for their forbearance when their living is being destroyed. The 100 per cent. compensation is a welcome step, but we all recognise that it does not cover a farmer's loss of income. A review of that would be welcome. Bearing in mind the fact that TB99 is also applied to areas outside the trials, we could extend that view to those outside the trials whom the law also prevents from taking pre-emptive action against their badger population. We should be encouraging those farmers to see that we recognise their plight. I would extend such compensation to all farmers who are affected by a TB outbreak on their farm, not just to those in the trial areas. In a sense, they are also part of the trial because they are providing data for it.

On road traffic accidents, there was discussion about the slightly inadequate intelligence that we had at the start of the exercise. However, there is evidence that the Government have not pursued with sufficient rigour the need to analyse the outcome of road traffic accidents among badgers. Resources are clearly required, and I imagine that there are health concerns among those who are given the task of examining the corpses. We need to review carefully how we provide the resources—as rapidly as possible—so we can analyse those outcomes as well as the corpses from the trial areas themselves, where there is currently some difficulty in collecting proper scientific evidence.

The Committee strongly recommended that, although there was evidence that badgers were a prime source of infection, research should be undertaken to try to understand the other possibilities that exist in the animal kingdom. I have seen no evidence of sufficient vigour in that respect. I can understand why badger groups think that the finger is being pointed at badgers and that not enough attention has been given to other possible sources of infection—deer, rodents and so on.

Mr. Luff: Does the hon. Gentleman share my slight sense of regret that, by entitling our report "Badgers and Bovine Tuberculosis", we have perhaps given the misleading impression of having prejudged the outcome of the process?

Mr. Todd: That is a fair point, and the hon. Gentleman may be right.

I love badgers, too. As a child, I used to observe them. Indeed, a badger either lives on my property or visits it regularly, and it is a delight to see. I do not hold any brief for the mass slaughter of badgers, and I hope that the exercise is as short term and focused as possible to achieve an outcome.

It is hard to criticise what has happened with vaccines because this country has a long history of vaccine research, both for badgers and cattle, although it has produced relatively little outcome. I am not persuaded that the Government have as yet produced a programme that is robust enough to reach a solution. We realise that vaccines are promising; they are possibly the only long-term solution, so research must be given the highest priority.

Mr. Luff: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is important to emphasise, as did the Committee, that the most promising way to find a vaccine is to piggyback on human tuberculosis vaccine research, rather than to rely on freestanding cattle vaccine research?

Mr. Todd: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that remark, which is certainly true. I struck that comment out of my speech because I thought that I might have been speaking for too long already.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Vaccines are often cited as the hallelujah solution to the problem, but is the hon. Gentleman aware that, as long ago as 1980, the Zuckerman report said that a vaccine would be available in 10 years? Indeed, in 1997, the Krebs report said that a vaccine might take 15 years to develop. A vaccine could be a long way off.

Mr. Todd: I accept that willingly. Indeed, having taken the evidence in the Committee, I am well aware of the longevity of the problem and that the target appears to move further away as time passes.

The Committee was critical of the lack of proper husbandry advice for farmers. Husbandry advice has now appeared, but it has been produced too slowly and additional measures should have been taken. Badger groups have made the point that many common-sense measures could be taken. Farmers could be advised how to keep cattle away from badger latrines and other areas frequented by badgers and how to secure barns so that sick badgers cannot go inside. Those are reasonably obvious points, but they need to be reiterated. The advice documents were simply not available for a long time, which was an omission.

The Committee was critical of the communication about what the Government were trying to do and, at the micro level, about what was being attempted locally, including establishing trials. Those problems have continued. This is a highly sensitive and difficult issue about which none of us is especially comfortable. We must achieve as much openness as possible, consistent, sadly, with the possible actions of a tiny minority of people. This is not an accusation against badger groups in general. In my contacts with them, people have been responsible and have recognised that there is a problem. However, a tiny minority wish to take action that is dangerous to some of the people conducting the work and clearly that must be considered.

One of the reasons why I suggested using the TB99 more widely relates partly to communication. We must try to get it across to the farming community as a whole that this is a collective matter for farming to solve rather than an isolated issue relating to the south-west and parts of the midlands. We must try to share the process of collecting information and data across all cattle farmers, not just those in that part of the country. We also need to improve communications on a wider scale. One step that could be taken is to establish clearer lines of communication between farming and badger representation groups and scientists about how the exercises are proceeding. That is hard because there is a lack of trust within that exercise, but it should be attempted.

My final point concerns human health. I am aware of the cases that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) referred to. There is a human health dimension. We should not be alarmist about it, but it exists. If we do not take firm action to find a solution, we risk human health implications already that exist on a micro scale. We should be aware of them. I was not entirely convinced how the relationship between the Department of Health and the Ministry was operating to ensure that risk to human health was clearly placed in the forefront of people's minds. I certainly would not want to take part in a debate of this kind in five or 10 years' time in which people were surprised that there was a human health implication. It is not a great surprise. It is possible and we should address it.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): One of the problems in approaching any debate about agriculture in the south-west is that one keeps using words like "crisis" and "dire" and saying that people's livelihoods are being destroyed. One runs out of superlatives to describe just how bad it is to a lay audience. Certainly, if it were not for all the other crises in agriculture at present, one would say that this is a crisis of truly enormous proportions. It may say something about the context in which it finds itself that such a major crisis is debated not on the Floor of the House but here in Westminster Hall.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. For all practical purposes we are on the Floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Nicholls: That is why I kept my remarks about that deliberately short.

Moving on to less contentious areas, a great deal could be said to illustrate just how bad the crisis is. I will do no more in view of the shortness of time than to make this point. According to figures from the National Farmers Union, 1,670 herds were placed under movement restrictions in 1996. In 1998 the figure had increased to 2,303 herds, which represents an increase of 32 per cent. The figures up to October 1999 show that that level has increased to 2,221.

When I first became the Member of Parliament for Teignbridge, I knew no more about this matter than any other layman. I was generally aware of the debate, but no more than that. When I had my first meeting with the NFU, I was struck, to put it as neutrally as I can, by the intensity of the feeling of people who were convinced that their livelihoods were being destroyed by a perfectly clear causal connection. They were convinced that the connection between badgers and their cattle caused the disease. We have had experience of TB in my family and, even though the link between animal and human may not be particularly direct, anyone with my background would be worried about it.

In common with other hon. Members, I read such evidence as was available at the time. Having read Zuckerman and Dunnet, it seemed that the case had been made. I say that not as a scientist, but as a lawyer. Sometimes laymen say that evidence is only circumstantial: there is nothing wrong with circumstantial evidence, provided that people realise that it is circumstantial. My reading of the science then, as now, is not absolutely 100 per cent. However, I am left with the conviction that there is a centrality in the argument about the badger, which cannot be denied.

It was sad when the hon. Member for South Derbyshire rightly made the point that tuberculosis is a frightful condition for any animal. Some of the letters that I have received from people who view themselves as the badger's best friend were a model of moderation, balance and concern. However, I have received other letters from people who take it as a personal affront to the badger when it is suggested that that animal might have TB like horrible cows. I cannot understand the thought process behind the view that if a disease is caused only by cows and not by badgers, it is all right. It is a dreadful condition for any animal.

At my many meetings with farmers in Devon the subject inevitably arises. There is both despair and anger about it. There is despair at the devastation that the presence of TB can inflict on a whole way of life. As the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) said, it is not a question of sitting down and waiting for the next test to come through. There is anger, too, among farmers about politicians of all political complexions who have wanted to shy away from the issue. The politicians are reluctant to talk in public about a process that could lead to the death of badgers. The British population, brough up on "Tales of the Riverbank" in an increasingly urban age, do not want to contemplate that. Farmers are therefore desperate about the effect on their livelihoods and about the beliefs of an urban population who simply refuse to face up to what is happening.

I have seen no meaningful evidence of farmers following through their own conclusions and taking matters into their own hands, although there may be isolated incidents. It is remarkable and shows an extraordinary degree of restraint among the farming community, which should make us acknowledge that less law-abiding, less decent and less honest people could have gone about things very differently.

It is easy for us in this marvellous Chamber this afternoon to ignore the experience of others. I used to be interested in fisheries. I am still interested, but it would be out of order to expand on it today, apart from saying that scientists did not believe that fishermen knew anything about the migratory habits of fish. Fishermen would tell scientists that the fish had gone elsewhere, which the scientists found hard to cope with. Similarly, scientists often find it difficult to cope with the anecdotal evidence of farmers. When you live on the soil, and you have been bred on the soil for generations—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is using "you" too much. Although I lived on a farm as a boy, I do not bear out the hon. Gentleman's descriptions.

Mr. Nicholls: I thought that I would be accused of having royal pretensions if I said "one" all the time. However, if one has lived on the land and one has lived there for generations, one comes to realise that one is wholly in tune with nature, does one not? Farmers have experience that may be hard to quantify in scientific terms, but it exists. We owe it to farmers to understand them when they say they believe that the badgers argument has centrality. They are probably right. So what do we do about it?

It is easy to indulge in party-political point scoring, but that is completely against my nature. We could say that the previous Government should have set up the Krebs group sooner, but the key point is that Krebs was set up and that it has reported to the Government. One of the fun things about being a Minister in a Government is that the buck stops with Ministers. Whatever has happened in the past, Krebs has now reported. My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire, who knows more about such matters than I do, reminded us that the trial areas were originally supposed to be up and running in 1998. It was then said that they would be up and running by the end of 1999, but they are not.

I want to hear from the Minister when the groups will be established, and an unambiguous assurance that the Ministry has the money to do the trials properly, comprehensively and speedily. I do not want to hear that he will do his best with the resources available. The job must be done, and we must hear today when it will be completed.

As many hon. Members have said, those in the control areas are putting their livelihoods on the line—there is unanimity on the issue. The matter is not about having another whinge on behalf of farmers of the west country, but about partnership. It must be recognised that such people are in a unique position and should be compensated.

Farmers have shown great restraint. Badgers are central to the argument; the studies may note other matters. Everyone must realise—both those who regard themselves to be "in loco badger" and farmers who might wish to take further action—that Krebs is the only show in town for dealing with the problem. We owe it to animal lovers, and to farmers whose livelihood is being wrecked, to understand that. The sooner that there is a conclusion, the better.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member, I should note that three hon. Members wish to speak before I call the Minister. We have a little less than an hour to go, and the Minister will probably need time to respond, so will hon. Members please keep their contributions as short as possible?

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): So far, we have had a reasoned and responsible debate on a subject that is causing huge concern to the countryside, especially areas in which bovine tuberculosis is present.

I hope that the Minister will explain the situation. The Leader of the House announced the debate some time ago. The Government tell us that they take Westminster Hall and Parliament seriously. It was outrageous that they sent a report on the subject to a Select Committee yesterday, which might have been available to members of the Committee but not to other hon. Members. The fifth report was published last April. We have waited for an opportunity to debate it. We secured a debate and were then informed that the Government sent a report to the Select Committee yesterday.

Mr. Mitchell: That is not altogether fair. We have an advance part of a report on progress and the Committee's reports. It was given to the Committee before the main report—restricting it was a service to the Committee and not an insult to the House.

Mr. McLoughlin: I do not want to spend too long on the matter. I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. The simple fact is that the House has not had the opportunity enjoyed by the Chamber to discuss the report. To find that the Committee has papers giving an update, which are not available to other hon. Members, is a great pity. It has been said that it could have been issued as a Command Paper, so that we could have had such a debate in the House.

Mr. Luff rose—

Mr. McLoughlin: I do not want to get too bogged down on the issue. I have made my complaint and I hope that it will be taken seriously.

The fifth report starts by saying:

"Bovine tuberculosis . . . is a disease with a terrible history in the United Kingdom. In the decade before the Second World War, there were 50,000 new human cases each year and an annual death toll in excess of 2,500 people, largely caused by drinking unpasteurized milk from the national dairy herd where as many as 40 per cent. of the cows" were infected. That is the history of the disease but, in truth, it is recent history for many farmers in my constituency.

The hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) read a moving letter from a farmer from a neighbouring constituency that summed up the worries. The hon. Gentleman knows well that there have not yet been cases of bovine TB in his constituency, but he also knows that there have been cases south of Ashbourne, which is close to the borders of his constituency. The worry shared in such areas is that cases might occur, as they have in mine. The NFU stated in its briefing that, while the disease essentially remained regional and has been confined so far to the south-west, Wales and parts of the west midlands, it is spreading.

I have been especially concerned by the rise of TB in Derbyshire. County-by-county figures of TB cases available on the MAFF website show that, in 1997, an incident of TB had been confirmed in one herd. In 1998, the figure was six. Provisional figures for January to September 1999 show that 16 new herds have been affected by TB. The increase in incidents has been dramatic in an area that has hitherto had none. My hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) noted that, in the south-west, the problem has existed for a considerable period; it has not in Derbyshire.

Mr. Paterson: My hon. Friend touched on an alarming matter. I talked this afternoon to John Newell, the senior policy adviser of the NFU in the west midlands, who said that there were 11 new cases of TB in Derbyshire in 1997, 17 in 1998 and 48 in 1999. My hon. Friend cited MAFF figures, which were remarkably lower.

Mr. McLoughlin: I was going to come on to the issue. MAFF has tended to use a different criterion for its analysis from the NFU. I want to use MAFF's figures rather than the NFU's.

During the recent recess, I attended a special evening in Ashbourne about TB incidents, which was addressed by MAFF officials. I was struck by farmers' deep concern. The issue is one aspect of the severe crises facing agriculture, with declining farm incomes and falling prices for products such as milk. The Minister will no doubt say, "Well, it is all very well for Opposition Members to complain, but we do not have the money." The Government can find money when they want to—they can easily find £32 million to launch an inquiry into BSE when they think that it politically advantageous to do so. I find hard to accept that the Government cannot find the money.

Mine is a large rural constituency. When I was first elected to West Derbyshire in 1986, it was rare to see a badger that had been killed in a road accident, but it is more common now. The points made by many hon. Friends about roadside casualties were serious, and should help the Minister. Although I criticise particular aspects of the Government's approach, I accept that the issue is difficult and that there are no easy or straightforward solutions.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) spoke about testing. One of the problems of testing about which farmers have expressed concerns to me is its effect on a herd. Earlier today, I spoke to a farmer called Des Simms, who farms in Ashbourne. He had to have a test on his herd and the result was clear; it showed that there was no problem with his herd. However, he told me that one of the cows tested was in a late stage of pregnancy and aborted after the test. He referred to the discomfort of cattle, to the obvious inconvenience, to restrictions and to other problems.

[Mr. McLoughlin]

We have heard from many hon. Members about various reports that have predicted that a vaccine will be available by the end of the century, by 2005 or by 2020. I fear that we are being given the same sort of response about when implementation will start and about when the Krebs results will be available. First, it was 2003 and now it is 2005, and I fear that the date will for ever move on. There is growing frustration in the countryside. Nobody wants farmers to do things that may damage the end results of the tests, but some of them are living on a very short fuse. I hope that the Minister will reassure hon. Members that the Government are taking the matter as seriously as people in the countryside.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr.McLoughlin) said, whatever the facts and prognosis on the problem of TB in our national bovine herd, it is compounded by the other difficulties that our farmers face. TB is a serious problem that is deep and far-reaching. Governments have initiated a number of reports, including the 1980 Zuckerman report and the Dunnet report of 1986. The Krebs inquiry was set up by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) because he felt that we needed an update on the latest scientific thinking. He also felt that we needed to act on the basis of scientific evidence to justify embarking on a larger badger cull. I wholeheartedly support him in that prognosis; we must act on the best scientific evidence available.

One cannot deny that the problem is becoming considerably worse. It is especially bad in the south-west and, unfortunately, in Gloucestershire and in the Cotswolds escarpment, which I have the privilege of representing. Whether or not there is a link between bovine TB and the badger population, there is no doubt that the badger population is increasing at a huge rate. We all know that the badger has no natural predator. I like to see badgers and I have sat in a hide, fed badgers with peanuts, watched them come out at dusk and photographed them. They are wonderful animals to watch. However, if there is a link between TB in the bovine herd and badgers, the Government must take it seriously.

I have received many letters from constituents who sadly afflicted with the problem of TB. Sadly, one in five of all herds in Gloucestershire has had TB reactors or is now affected. Although farmers are grateful to the Government for increasing compensation from 75 to 100 per cent., they are faced with all the other pressures to which I have alluded and they have to carry out more testing. Last Friday, I attended a regular meeting with my branch of the National Farmers Union. I was told that carrying out the tests is a huge financial and physical burden for farmers who are doing all the work on their farm on their own, as other people must be brought in to help with the tests. I hope that the Minister will recognise that the tests are difficult, both physically and economically, for those farmers. I urge him to provide some compensation to cover the extra costs that are involved in carrying out the tests. That would ease the day-to-day pain of testing, if not the psychological trauma that is experienced by farmers who are waiting for the next reactor to happen.

Hon. Members commented on the triplet trials that were supposed to be up and running by the end of 1998. Some of those, including the Gloucestershire trial, have been suspended as a result of illegal action. The Minister should urge on all the police services that are involved the utmost seriousness of the disruption of the trials. It is utter folly for them to be disrupted because more badgers end up being culled. I hope that the Minister and, through his colleagues in the Home Office, the police force, will take the matter seriously so that the trials can continue.

As for testing, the Gloucestershire laboratory can see no reason why its safety measures are not sufficient to carry on with laboratory testing of dead badgers. The Minister needs to consult urgently with the Health and Safety Executive to determine why it is not safe to carry out the tests in the laboratory when it is safe for the public to be close to badgers elsewhere. If the laboratory specialists in Gloucestershire are telling me that it is safe to carry out the tests, why does the Health and Safety Executive disagree?

Farmers and their families face great trauma as a result of the TB problem. Officials should take care when they test farmers' animals. I heard of cases on Friday in which officials were not as helpful, sympathetic or practical as they might have been. For example, they carried out tests on one day instead of doing half one day and half the next. The Minister should urge his officials to ensure that the traumatic testing of animals is done with the minimum disruption.

Much has been said about the triplet trials. Important though they are, there is also the issue of research, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) alluded. We should vigorously pursue other areas of research, including molecular models. I am certain that, given the correct resources and the Government's good will, a solution can be found. The Minister will tell us that substantial resources have been put into research, but with a bit more good will and vigour, the solution could be speeded up. There is a perception among the industry that the Government should put more resources into the problem, both in research and the triplet trials. When mink were released on the south coast, MAFF officials who were carrying out badger trials were diverted to retrap the mink. That is nonsense. We should have enough dedicated officials so that the triplet trials continue unhindered by other incidents.

This is a serious problem. I echo hon. Members' concerns about the difficulties of the triplet trials. We need to carry out as much research as possible to speed up the production of a vaccine, which I hope will be forthcoming in fewer than the 15 years that I mentioned in a previous intervention. No one can tell whether that will be the case, but I urge the Government to get the tripartite trial up and running. I also urge them to consider the sensible seven-point proposals produced by the NFU, especially outside trial areas.

Some of my constituents with farms outside the trial areas have been affected up to four times, but even when they suspect that there is a causal link with the badger, the Ministry will not take any action. It seems to me that where tests have been carried out on cattle, the NFU's proposals for a wildlife survey should be carried out and a small proportion of badgers trapped, killed and tested to see whether they have TB. If so, further action should be taken, whether that is selective culling or moving badgers away from the area. Some farmers in hotspots have a near certain conviction that their cattle are being reinfected by badgers in their area, but there is absolutely nothing they can do about it and they see their livelihood going down the drain. That must be incredibly traumatic and frustrating. Therefore, the Government need to carefully reconsider their 100 per cent. no culling policy outside the triplet areas because further action needs to be taken in obvious hotspots. The Government should put more emphasis on completing the trials as quickly as possible, putting money into research and being sympathetic to farmers whose cattle are tested in what are often traumatic conditions.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): I congratulate the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on initiating the debate, which relates to the subject that affects my constituency and those surrounding it.

I should begin by declaring an interest because I am probably the only Member of the House of Commons who kept a badger as a pet when I was young. A cub was washed up in a brook when I was about 10 and, for a brief period from April to October, I kept her until she decided that she preferred the company of badgers and dug her way out under the garden wall, although she used to come back for Polos.—[Interruption.] They are very fond of Polos—and very down on cats. Just like Mr. Benjamin Bunny Senior, she had no opinion whatever of cats. That experience taught me something about badgers and it is very important to get away from the sentimental idea that anyone who likes badgers should oppose the policy. I cannot understand any badger lover wanting badgers to be infected with TB, a loathsome and disgusting disease, which should be eradicated not only from humans and cattle, but from badgers.

No one in North Shropshire dislikes badgers. There is some exasperation at the huge increase in their numbers, but that has been caused by the protection they were given by the Badgers Act 1973, the Badger Act 1991 and the Protection of Badgers Act 1992. I know of no farmers who object to those Acts, but the increase in badgers was enormously accelerated by the spread of maize as a high protein fodder for cattle. There has been a dramatic increase in the amount of maize being grown in the south-west of England and in my constituency. One peculiarity of the badger is that when the sow is pregnant, if her body weight drops below a certain level she can, uniquely among mammals, suspend the pregnancy. The increase in maize has enabled sow badgers to take large cobs of maize down into their sets so that they have a store of food, which maintains the body weight of the sow at a higher level. As they have that source of rich protein, they are breeding more young—a fact that has been established by several experienced farmers in my area. The two factors together have led to an explosion in badger numbers. A farm near me with 4,000 acres of land has 23 new setts. One very experienced dairy farmer, who has been in the trade since his family set up business in the 1930s, estimated that there has been a 400 per cent. increase in badger numbers during the past 10 years. That increase is undisputed, as is the increase in TB in cattle. As Professor Krebs said, we do not know what the link is, but badgers seem to be the most obvious source of infectivity. All the farmers to whom I have spoken regard the badger as the main medium for the spreading of TB, just as the possum is held to be in New Zealand.

I quoted figures from John Newell, the senior policy adviser for the NFU in the west midlands. We have heard about dreadful cases from hon. Members who represent the south-west. There is real alarm in my area as TB is increasing in the north-west midlands and coming over from Derbyshire. I shall not repeat the figures as time is pressing. In Shropshire, there were 11 cases in 1998 and 17 last year. The last census of cattle in my area, which was taken by the Milk Marketing Board 10 years ago, showed that there were 65,000 cows within 10 miles of Market Drayton. I think that I represent the largest milk field in western Europe. The impact of TB is absolutely devastating in my area, as is the sheer uncertainty among farmers about what will happen next year. It is the completely erratic and arbitrary nature of the disease that is alarming people. Many of the farms that have been closed—about 10 per cent. of those in the Market Drayton area have been shut down in the past three to four years—are also closed in the sense that they breed their stock and have pedigree herds. Such farms do not buy in stock from outside, which must suggest that the only source of infection is the dramatic increase in badger numbers.

What is so awful about the disease is the difficulty of analysing it. A farm in my area that is currently closed owned a cow that was inconclusively tested. Sixty days later, the cow was tested again, and the result was again inconclusive. It was then tested yet again, another 60 days later, and the result was yet again inconclusive. The cow had visible lesions and was sent for slaughter. Usually, samples have to be sent off to the MAFF laboratory for analysis for TB, but the lesions were visible to the naked eye. The cow was dramatically infected but appeared to be a doubtful case in three tests. That is why we must push on with the Krebs strategy and continue the process started by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg). Everybody involved in the industry bought into that approach. We do not know the link: there is circumstantial evidence, but everyone is certain that we do not know whether there is a cast-iron link between TB in badgers and TB in cattle.

The Government have not performed. The Krebs report landed on their desk soon after they took power; 30 hotspots were identified and were broken into 10 triplet areas. Today, however, real work has started in only three of the six areas where survey work is going on, which is unacceptable. Given the severity of the disease and the appalling misery that it is causing to farmers, about which we have heard from hon. Members representing the south-west, there is simply no excuse for the Government's straightforward incompetence. They should have grabbed Krebs, which had all-party support and support throughout the countryside and the farming community and got on with it.

I remind the Minister that paragraph 7.8.20 of the Krebs report, which is on page 129, states:

"It is important that MAFF does not delay the start of this experiment. We recommend that it is initiated in four months (by Spring 1998)."

Here we are, in spring 2000; only three of the triplet areas are working properly and the spread has increased. We have heard about Derbyshire, and the spread is approaching Shropshire. I urge the Minister to consider increasing the number of triplets. There is now a clear case for the establishment of triplets on the Derbyshire-Staffordshire and Staffordshire-Shropshire borders. While the dither has gone on the relentless march of TB has pushed across the borders.

I am aware of the time so I ask the Minister to respond to the following in quick succession. I am exasperated by my correspondence with the Ministry about the calf scheme for healthy bull calves that are unwanted by dairy farmers. I talked to one farmer today who did not even get the transport costs of sending three calves to Market Drayton. It is even worse for those who are closed up. They have to feed the animals with no prospect of remuneration. The Government must also consider the problem of farmers going over quota on milk production. Cows continue to produce milk whether the farm is closed up or not.

Will the Minister consider his links with the drug industry? We know that the cost of investigation and research into vaccines and drugs in cattle is huge and is linked to human research, but it is critical. Just like Tantalus constantly reaching for his glass of water, it is always in 10 years' time. We must establish a vaccine for TB in cattle and I suspect that that will have to be linked to research into TB in humans which, sadly, is also increasing in other parts of the world.

This matter is crucial. We are sitting on a human health time bomb. We have hysteria in the media about BSE and the possible link—it is not yet proven—with new version CJD. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) said, the Government have blown £30 million on a report that tries to lay more blame on the previous Conservative Government. Here we have a potentially massive health problem. [Interruption.] If the Minister will just listen, TB is known to have been a killer for many centuries. Gross complacency is being shown here. The Minister has not really grasped the opportunity of Krebs. His heart is not in it. If in the next few minutes he is not prepared to show that he will get resources behind Krebs, he should make way for someone else.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I inadvertently forgot to declare my interest as a farmer. It is in the Register of Members' Interests, although I should stress that I own no cattle and therefore have no direct financial link in this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman. Have any other hon. Members anything that they wish to share with us before we continue?

5.2 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr Elliot Morley): This has been a very good debate. As I would have expected from the Select Committee on Agriculture it has been very detailed. The contributions from all those who have spoken—with the possible exception of the last speaker—have been excellent. We heard from the hon. Members for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) and for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed), from my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) and from the hon. Members for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) and for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). There was a sensible theme to the contributions They dealt with the issue very responsibly and asked reasonable and pertinent questions that I shall do my best to answer.

I should also like to take the opportunity to wish the former Chairman of the Select Committee all the best in his new role in Parliament and to say how much I value the work that he has done. I have appeared before the Committee a number of times and I appreciate the quality of the reports and the contribution made by his Committee. I am also pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) in the role, if only temporarily. He presented the report extremely well. It demonstrates his grasp on the issue and his involvement in the Committee.

This is a serious issue. Bovine TB is one of the biggest problems that we face, perhaps the biggest problem after BSE. BSE is basically under control. It is on course for eradication All the safety measures are in place. We understand it well. Obviously, we still need to be careful about some issues. We must not be complacent about any outbreak. Bovine TB is spreading and increasing, as hon. Members have rightly pointed out.

When we came into government we made it clear that we intended to introduce a moratorium on the interim strategy pending the report from Professor Krebs that was set up under the previous Government. I make no bones about the fact that they were quite right to do that. If they had not set up the report, we would have had to do so. It was useful that the report was in train and was in a position to report and deal with some of these issues.

However, I must emphasise to the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire that the interim strategy was a failure: it did not stop the spread of bovine TB; it simply did not work. Most independent observers would concede that and accept that MAFF clung to that strategy too long. The fact remains that there must be a strategy and Krebs is the only show in town. It will allow us to settle issues that have been hotly debated for more than 20 years. The time has come to test the science and decide on the best way to deal with bovine TB. Does culling work? If so, what sort of culling? What is the link with badgers? Other issues also need to be examined.

Mr. Paice: We all accept that the interim strategy was not working at 100 per cent.; otherwise, Krebs would not have been set up in the first place. My point was that by introducing a moratorium before there was anything further to do—people had no idea what Krebs would say—the Government might have exacerbated the problem. The interim strategy was not working 100 per cent., but it still may have limited incidence of the disease. That could explain the sudden increase when the moratorium was introduced.

Mr. Morley: There is no evidence of that. The Krebs report will help to answer some of these questions. I repeat that large sums were spent on the interim strategy—money that could have helped to compensate farmers. We increased compensation from 75 to 100 per cent., but the strategy did not deliver. The merits of stopping the interim strategy will be part of the analysis of the trials: the issue is being examined.

My noble Friend the Minister of State has responsibility for these matters: I deal with them in the House of Commons and I am interested in the welfare aspect. I emphasise that there is a major welfare issue for badgers and for cattle in relation to the impact of TB. Testing is also relevant. There are also welfare implications for farmers themselves, who are under considerable stress, as I well understand.

Today I had the opportunity of discussing with farmers from affected areas, the NFU and the National Beef Association their anxieties about badgers. I do not accept the simplistic view about badgers; however, I cannot deny that TB is spreading or disregard the report from Professor Krebs, which shows evidence of a link between badgers and bovine TB. Even though there remains much that we do not understand about how exactly it is transmitted, I simply cannot deny that information, so we must follow the trial through: it promises some answers.

I echo the points made about the interference, which is not helping the cause of badger welfare. For those who do not want a culling programme for badgers, it makes no sense at all to interfere with the trial, which could result in even more badgers being culled. Similarly, it makes no sense for farmers taking the law into their own hands and killing badgers. It would be unwise of them to do so, because if the trial is undermined from that side, we shall go round in circles, as we have done for 20 years, trying to determine the problem and the best way to tackle it.

The National Federation of Badger Groups was mentioned. I have much respect for that organisation, but I was most disappointed to read its press release, which contained many claims that are not true. For example, its claim about the study of TB in other species is inaccurate. Two studies have been commissioned as part of the trial: the Oxford university study, which examined other wildlife species and TB, began in May 1999; the Central Science Laboratory's study, which has begun looking into aspects of the trials, started last month, so both trials are operating. The understanding of transmission routes is an important subject which we need to examine carefully, so a study of that is also under way. The independent scientific group is looking at whole herds in relation to the potential link with cattle. All those issues are being covered in the trial, and it is wrong to state otherwise.

The main criticism, which I wholly accept, is about the delay in setting up those studies. There is no denying it, and MAFF regrets it. However, setting up the trial has been enormously difficult. Resources are not the problem: the issue of inadequate resources has never been raised by anyone to whom I have spoken, or in any of MAFF's dealings on the matter. There have certainly been problems recruiting staff and getting access to what, after all, is private landowners' land. We do not have statutory powers, so it must be done by negotiation and persuasion. The weather has caused problems. It is not as though this was not accounted for but, as hon. Members know, the south-west has had exceptionally bad weather this winter, which has delayed this work. There have been serious problems with interference, not only through trapping but because of staff being intimidated. This hardly helps when one is trying to recruit staff for a difficult job.

Mr. Paterson: The Minister blames the weather. Krebs recommended spring 1998 for the trial; it is now spring 2000. If the hon. Gentleman had trouble because of the weather, surely he should have devoted more people to the job.

Mr. Morley: It is not a matter of devoting more people to the job of survey work, although, if the hon. Gentleman had listened he would have heard me say that we have had problems with recruiting, and we are trying to recruit to bring the staff up to strength. In some instances, the terrain has been difficult. There is a combination of factors.

Mr. Luff: The Minister says that he has a problem recruiting staff. I have been concerned about the very low rates of pay offered to operatives. Has that been a factor in inhibiting recruitment?

Mr. Morley: It is a possibility that we might have to consider, but it is not the only issue. Factors such as weekend working also play a part. I concede that terms and conditions also have a bearing on the problem.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: If the Minister is saying that one reason for the delay in the trials is a problem with recruiting, will he tell me why some of my farmers who have offered constructive help have been turned down? They know the terrain and are used to the rough weather. Why was their offer rejected?

Mr. Morley: I do not know the exact details of that, but proper quality controls are needed in such trials. Although farmers might be offering to help, the issue might be how you manage those trials. I do not know the exact details.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have had to pull up other Members for using the word "you." I am not carrying out any such trial.

Mr. Morley: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

All the triplets will be in place by the end of this year.

Mr. Nicholls: This year?

Mr. Morley: Yes, this year. Proactive culling will take place in seven of the 10 triplets by the end of this year.

[Mr. Morley]

We are taking action on surveying, which will help to speed implementation and allow us to make further progress.

Mr. Nicholls: I compliment the Minister on the most attractive speech that he was making until a moment ago. I had accepted at face value what he said about resources, but he seems to be saying that he cannot get people to do the work for the rate that he is prepared to pay. If, on the one hand, he is saying that he cannot find people because no one likes the pay or the accommodation but, on the other, he can give an assurance that the triplets will be in place by the end of this year, what has changed?

Mr. Morley: We have recruited staff. The triplets are under way and we are confident that they will be in place by the end of this year. I have said that wages are a problem, but I do not know whether they are a big issue. I would not rule out pay and conditions as an issue. Nevertheless, we are on target to recruit the staff.

The road traffic survey is important and much can be gained from restarting it, but it has been held up because of Health and Safety Executive recommendations, which require new equipment to be installed in laboratories. Again, resources are not an issue. Money has been found for the new equipment, which is being installed. We hope to start the road traffic survey sometime in the spring, although it is fair to say that the backlog of deep-frozen carcases will have to be dealt with.

Mr. Drew: Does my hon. Friend accept the contradiction that although we can do nothing with the badger carcases, we are still moving cattle that are known to be infected with TB? It is strange that the HSE has taken action only on one side; although I do not want action to be taken on the other, it looks rather ridiculous.

Mr. Morley: The difference is that, if people dissect animals that may have lesions, it is not unreasonable to put proper safeguards in place in the laboratories. That is what the HSE is for, and we must take its recommendations seriously.

We have resolved the Bern convention issue. What we are doing has been found to be entirely within its rules. I was surprised that the Government were criticised by the Bern convention, given that badgers are protected in this country, and especially as they are not protected or hunted in other countries. There is no prospect of the wholesale slaughter of badgers to control TB, and they are not endangered.

I concede that getting the triplets up and running has been a problem. We are on target to get them all done by the end of this year. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby told us—going straight to the point—to get on with it. We are doing so, and intend to ensure that they are up and running.

We are reluctant to take action outside the trial areas because the independent scientific group has advised against it. Some of the National Farmers Union's proposals have not been implemented because the ISG thinks that they could compromise the trial. We share farmers' concerns about the increase and spread of the disease, and we cannot ignore such matters. We are discussing the position outside the trial areas with the TB forum and we will consider carefully what it has to say.

Vaccine development is another issue. I was asked how much the Government were spending. This year we are spending £1.4 million. Once again, however, it is not an issue of resources. The problem with vaccine development is the process of looking for the vaccine, which is very slow. Spending more money will not speed the process up. I can assure hon. Members that the independent scientific group is also examining work on human vaccines to see what can be learned about any potential link.

As was recognised by members of the Select Committee, the issue is not just about badgers, but about vaccine development, bio-security on farms, researching trace elements, better testing procedures, social ecology and animal behaviour. All those issues—and indeed cattle-to-cattle transmission—are being examined as part of the evaluation of the independent scientific group. I have met Professor Bourne and Professor Krebs and I was impressed with the thoroughness of their work.

Mr. Todd: The scientific group was asked to examine the possibility of using the TB99 questionnaire outside the trial and infected areas. It recommended doing that as soon as practicable. Does the Minister agree?

Mr. Morley: We should reflect carefully on that issue. TB99 is a new questionnaire and even within infected areas it is a detailed and large-scale operation. Farmers have welcomed it and we are hopeful that information on TB99 will be helpful for the scientific study. We could contemplate extending it some time in the future.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The Minister denies that it is a question of resources, but paragraph 58 of the Select Committee's report quotes Dr. Hewinson as saying that in the United States $800 million is being spent on trying to produce a human vaccine that would also be useful for cattle. The Minister mentioned £1.4 million, which seems a huge imbalance in relation to United States spending on the problem.

Mr. Morley: We may benefit from some of the research that is financed in America. Nevertheless, I am informed that it is a question not of resources, but of the process, the time and the way in which vaccines are developed.

We acknowledge the costs faced by farmers involved in cattle breakdowns. We recognise the burden on farmers in that respect. As I said, we increased compensation from 75 to 100 per cent. for cattle. There is presently no prospect of extra compensation: it is not within our budget. However, we are consulting the TB forum about what more can be done and we shall continue those discussions.

On rules about movement restrictions—

Mr. McLoughlin: Can the Minister tell us whether the Department is requesting additional compensation for farmers in the current spending review?

Mr. Morley: As the hon. Gentleman said, the spending review is going on now: it is not yet completed.

[Interruption.] No, implications cannot be drawn from that either way. Annual tests are not likely to be applied nationally.

The Committee will know that an animal husbandry panel has been set up and has been given three months to produce its report. It commenced in January.

Mr. Paice: On annual testing, I did not suggest a national basis. My proposal was to consider it for the frontier counties in order to identify quickly where the spread was taking place. It could then be curtailed more swiftly than otherwise.

Mr. Morley: We would not close the door on any suggestion. Perhaps the TB panel could consider that.

I emphasise that the human risk is minimal. In fact, bovine TB used to be far more prevalent in this country than it is now. There is no evidence of an increase in outbreaks of the human TB that is linked with this strain, although there were two recent cases of infection linked with cattle. The pasteurisation of milk protects the consumer. There are also procedures in slaughterhouses to inspect carcases and identify animals showing signs of TB infection so that the appropriate steps can be taken to ensure that there is no risk in the food chain. Those procedures have been in place for a long time and there is no evidence of any risk to the population. Nevertheless, there is no room for complacency; we are careful to ensure that these matters are monitored and we are in touch with the Department of Health in that regard.

I shall bear in mind the point about issuing reports through Command Papers. However, I think that the hon. Member for West Derbyshire misunderstood what was going on with the Government's response to the Select Committee. The usual Government response was made in June, but we have taken a new approach, in that as well as that response, we have also drawn up a report on the progress that has been made. That is a positive step forward. I should have thought that hon. Members would welcome being updated on what we are doing in terms of this important matter.

Mr. McLoughlin: All I was saying was that, bearing in mind that we knew of this debate about two weeks ago, if the Committee had had that report a little earlier, no doubt it could have been published so it would have been available to everyone. We are talking about freedom of information; some of us know that a report is being submitted to the Sub-Committee which may contain information that the rest of the House has not had the opportunity to digest.

Mr. Morley: The point that the hon. Gentleman misunderstands is that the publication of the report was not linked to the timing of this debate. This debate could have taken place earlier or later. It was just a matter of making the information available.

Mr. Luff: I congratulate the Minister on keeping a straight face during that last remark.

Mr. Morley: I have a great deal of affection for the hon. Gentleman, but that was unfair. I would point out to hon. Members that, for example, the independent scientific group's report was received in typescript just before Christmas. We managed to get it printed and out by January, which is not a bad achievement. There is no evidence of delaying reports to ensure that people do not get them.

I understand that the collection of badgers continued under the interim strategy where farmers requested it until the Bourne advice was received in August 1998. Plans to stop it and launch the Bourne seven counties road traffic assessments were in place when the post mortem facilities at the Veterinary Laboratories Agency were suspended in the August. Information from that has been made available to the independent scientific group.

In terms of what we have been doing to implement the triplets, the independent scientific group in its report considered the programme sufficiently robust and felt that we were making progress.

I have to say that the hon. Member for North Shropshire rather exaggerated; he should not use words such as an "explosion" of badger population. I have heard that expression from time to time, but it is not the case. Our figures suggest that badger numbers may be up in some areas of the country, but there is no evidence of an increase at a huge rate. Moreover, where there is an increase, a population will stabilise at the carrying capacity of the habitat concerned. Indeed, in the proactive culls that have taken place so far, there seems to be evidence that badger populations were not as high as envisaged.

I must bring my remarks to a close. It has been a good debate which has raised some important issues. The Government take them seriously and I hope that I have convinced hon. Members that we are making progress.

Question put and agreed to.

Ilisu Dam

Motion made, and Question proposed. That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Robert Ainsworth.]

10 am

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): I am grateful to Madam Speaker for granting me this debate. The Ilisu dam is of considerable interest to many hon. Members, so I shall be as brief as possible to give my colleagues an opportunity to speak in the debate.

I wish first to deal with the Government's often repeated rebuttal of the criticisms of the project, which is that we in the United Kingdom do not have the right to tell Turkey what to do within the confines of its own state. That is true, but the United Kingdom has legitimate concerns at stake. There are serious doubts about the way in which the Turkish authorities have gone about this project, which would be a cause for concern even if the United Kingdom had no direct interest. Secondly, we are discussing United Kingdom taxpayers' money. Those who express concerns about the dam are not trying to tell Turkey what to do. We are asking only that our Government act responsibly. Given all the grave problems involved, the United Kingdom should not support the project.

In recent weeks, the Minister for Trade has advanced two basic arguments about the dam in support of the Government's policy. He claims that there is much misinformation about Ilisu and that critics do not understand that it is a hydropower project rather than an irrigation dam and, as such, will not divert water from downstream states. I assure the Government that I am well aware of that but, as I shall outline in a moment, I still have grave concerns about the potential for manipulation of water flows.

Secondly, the Minister for Trade argued that the dam is the least harmful option and that, otherwise, Turkey would be building fossil fuel plants or nuclear power plants. That is a strange argument, given that Turkey is at present negotiating with Westinghouse about the possibility of a nuclear plant. It raises important questions about the alternatives to Ilisu. That issue has not been addressed by Turkey, by any of the proposed donor countries or by the various reviews that have been carried out. It is fundamental that it is, a point to which I shall return later.

I shall outline what I believe to be the important criticisms of the dam project. First, there are the international implications and the prospect of water wars. The dam is a major installation. It will not affect just one country, but three—Turkey, Iraq and Syria—and it will impact significantly on the water politics of the entire area. We must remember that water is already a focus of conflict in that region—for example, around the Nile and the Jordan. The United Nations has warned us that, in the coming century, water is likely to be a major cause of instability and conflict, and that the next war in the middle east will be fought over water. It is interesting to know that, in the current negotiations over the Golan between Israel and Syria, control over water is an important issue.

I know that the Ilisu dam is an hydro-electric power project, not an irrigation project, and that the dam will not divert any of the water of the Tigris. All the water in the river will continue to flow through the dam and downstream to Iraq and Syria. My concern is the potential for manipulation of the flow of water. The Ilisu dam is an integral part of the 22-dam Guney dogu Anadozu Projesi, the south-east Anatolia development project. There are strong grounds for fearing that Turkey will use the dams to exert pressure on Iraq and Syria, the downstream states, by restricting the flow of water. The spare storage capacity of the Ilisu reservoir alone could block the flow of the Tigris entirely for two or three months, which would put Iraq and Syria under siege.

Despite assurances from the Export Credits Guarantee Department and Balfour Beatty that adequate downstream flows will be maintained, I have been concerned at reports that an official of the Turkish state hydraulics works department, the DSI, has threatened that if, for example, Syria continues to support Kurdish rebels, Turkey will cut off the water. The downstream states are understandably concerned. Syria has protested several times to the United Kingdom about the proposal to use ECGD facilities for the dam, and the League of Arab States protested in writing to the Foreign Office last year.

Turkey has not consulted Iraq over the building of the dam. That is in direct violation of article 5, protocol 1, of a 1946 treaty of friendship and neighbourly relations between the two states, which explicitly requires that Turkey should keep Iraq informed of its plans for construction works on the Tigris and Euphrates rivers.

One of the four essential preconditions for ECGD support for the project that were stated on 21 December 1999 by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was that Turkey should "give an assurance that adequate downstream water flows will be maintained at all times".

However, there is no clear data about existing water flows or how they will be affected by the dam, and the UK requirement is for only "an assurance". Therefore, what means will we have to ensure that the assurance is honoured?

The United Kingdom Defence Forum has warned that the GAP is "one of the region's most dangerous water time bombs. The dispute has not erupted yet because the project has not yet reached its full potential. By the time of its planned completion in"—

I was about to say 20010, but that would be a long time even for British construction workers—

"2010, the vital interests involved give it the potential to become one of the region's most dangerous flash-points".

That will have significant implications for western security, as Turkey is a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and is now beginning the process of accession to the European Union. The project's security implications could extend far beyond Turkey's borders, and could affect our security interests as a member of NATO and Turkey's future in the EU. UK support for the dam, a project about which the neighbouring countries have protested, would therefore be not only unethical, but plainly foolhardy.

[Mr. Kevin McNamara]

The dam has implications in Turkey for the treatment of Kurds. Turkish Government publicity for the GAP says that it will "dramatically change the social and cultural make-up of the region".

I am sure that that will be the case, and we all understand that that sounds sinister to the Kurds, who make up 95 per cent. of the population of the Ilisu dam area. For many decades, Kurds in Turkey have suffered a systematic and concerted campaign by the Turkish state to wipe out their identity that amounts to ethnic cleansing. The Kurdish language is forbidden. The Turkish Government's record on human rights in south-east Turkey is appalling.

From 1984 until recently, there was civil war between the Kurdish PKK—the Kurdistan Workers party—and the Turkish army. Despite the project's location in what is essentially a war zone, no conflict impact assessment has been made of the Ilisu dam or the GAP. The United Kingdom Defence Forum has highlighted what it calls the "profound security implications" of the construction of the Ilisu dam. The dam will

"transform the geography of Turkish Kurdistan", cutting off guerrilla escape routes into the mountains and forcing the rural population out of the countryside, where it may be a support base for the PKK, and into the slums of the cities, where it can be more easily controlled by the Government. The forum concluded:

"an underlying motive of the project is to deny the Kurdish guerrillas the environment in which they operate."

Basically, whether there are guerrillas there or not, that is ethnic cleansing.

The potential clearing of 16,000 people is a recipe for disaster and agitation in not only Turkey, which has an appalling record as regards the treatment of the Kurds, but the surrounding regions and the rest of the Kurdish nation. The Kurds are divided between four states: Syria, Iraq, Turkey and parts of Russia. They have been agitating for self-determination for countless years. Again, that has significance for our security policy. We are entitled to ask what has happened to the ethical dimension of our foreign policy. For the United Kingdom to assist in what amounts to ethnic cleansing is intolerable. The dam is not merely a dam; it has enormous political and cultural implications to which we cannot turn a blind eye.

Hasankeyf is of enormous cultural significance, particularly for the Kurds, and was designated a protected site in 1978. Thousands of years of human settlement and history are there, layer upon layer. Sadly, they are being excavated at a snail's pace. If the city were flooded, it would be lost for ever. The Kurdish community understandably sees the flooding of Hasankeyf as part of a wider strategy to eradicate Kurdish culture. Local people believe that, if it were a historical site in western Turkey, it would not be submerged.

There is still considerable confusion over the number of people who will be affected by the project. The ECGD's stakeholder report says that 16,000 will be displaced and a further 20,000 partly affected. The Kurdish human rights project says that the true figure is higher. Whatever the numbers, many thousands will be affected and at least 16,000 displaced—a polite way of saying that they will be forced to leave their homes and their lands. Yet there has been no consultation between the DSI and local people, and no resettlement plans have been drawn up.

The ECGD's stakeholder report expresses grave concern that the open, consultative and participatory process necessary for resettlement is not part of the Turkish political and institutional culture. The authorities simply do not have the capacity to approach resettlement in that way. They already have a momentous problem trying to rehouse and resettle people after the two recent disastrous earthquakes.

Although Turkey has a legal framework for resettlement that looks good on paper, there have been numerous serious problems in its implementation. Compensation is institutionally inadequate. There is a system for setting payments, but most people take the DSI to court to claim more. Cases can take two or three years to settle in the courts, and inflation is high—running at up to 100 per cent—so that by the time families receive their compensation any increase has been eaten up.

Those who eventually get compensation are the fortunate ones. Many families, in particular the poorest, do not have legal title to their land and, without the documents, they receive no compensation at all. Only 60 per cent. of rural people in the Ilisu area have land registration deeds. Resettlement, even if done appallingly badly, is an expensive business. The cost of Ilisu alone is estimated at $500 million, nearly one third of the total project cost of $1.6 million, and experience shows that it is likely to rise.

Who will benefit from the dam? Balfour Beatty says:

"Ilisu will bring new wealth and employment prospects to the population of this impoverished area".

However, more than two thirds of those who have been resettled after other projects undertaken as part of the GAP now wish to return to their former communities. There are no guarantees that local people will be employed, even in constructing the dam—particularly if they are Kurds—and no stable employment is planned for the area.

Export credit agencies' concerns about resettlement have led them to stipulate that an independent monitoring body must be established, but to what extent could such a body operate independently? The head of Turkey's dam building programme has said that he will not give an independent monitoring team the powers that it would need for effective oversight. All observers of the project so far have been denied access to certain areas and followed everywhere. They have been unable to talk to the local population. How can the project be independently monitored in the prevailing political climate in that part of Turkey?

Balfour Beatty claims that even if the ECGD did not support the project, it would go ahead, and other countries' export credits agencies would pick up the business, and the United Kingdom would lose out. We hear the same argument in relation to arms sales—presumably we must prostitute ourselves, on the basis that, if we do not, somebody else will put his daughter on the streets. Balfour Beatty also claims that the United Kingdom would have no further influence on the project, that not supporting the project would damage UK-Turkey bilateral relations and that the United Kingdom would acquire

"an international reputation for unreliability and unpredictability in the handling of these matters, with consequent long-term damage not just to Balfour Beatty but to all British-based major project contractors".

Balfour Beatty is over-egging the pudding. Evidence given to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry shows that industry is happy with the way in which ECGD works and praises it as innovative. If we innovate by refusing to fund this deeply damaging project, I am sure that it will do us good in the long term, and it will certainly do no harm. In any case, as I have said, there are wider considerations than the needs of just one British firm, important as they are.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) asked a parliamentary question about whether details of, and reasons for, Balfour Beatty's application for export credits guarantees could be put in the Library. He was told that that was not correct practice, because of commercial confidentiality. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we should know what lies behind the application?

Mr. McNamara: I do. I have always found the arguments for commercial confidentiality strange, because they ask us to accept one company's word. In the United States—the biggest and richest capitalist country in the world—commercial confidentiality does not apply to defence contracts, business contracts or anything that involves the Government. It must be part of the secretive nature of the Government—by which I mean any Government of our country, because we are talking about a continuing problem. Of course, my hon. Friends are as open as possible, as we can see from the Freedom of Information Bill. We should have the details, and perhaps the Minister will be able to reply to the hon. Lady.

What are the alternatives to the dam? Ilisu is an expensive project. Independent energy consultants from Turkey and elsewhere have stressed the fact that the same amount of power as that which would be generated by the dam could be saved, at a lower cost, simply by modernising the transmission system, which has a reputation for inefficiency. There is also considerable scope for improving end-use efficiency—the efficiency of appliances and so on. If we want to support Turkey in tackling its energy problem, we would do better to support other means of energy generation. Tackling the demand side—improving energy efficiency—is an obvious first step. If we do not do that, new power stations, whether Ilisu or others, will lose a significant proportion of their power merely through transmission.

In the longer term, we should look to supporting clean generation. I am not an energy expert, but I know that the choice is not merely between fossil fuels, nuclear fuel or big dams. Plenty of other options are available, if only they are taken seriously. The environmental impact of Ilisu might be mitigated by measures such as reducing the height of the dam, but no analysis has been carried out, so we do not know. I should be obliged if my hon. Friend the Minister would assure us that, before a decision is made about ECG support for the dam, all the options will be examined and a report outlining the pros and cons will be made public. It is incredible that a project of such scale has reached the stage that it has with, apparently, no examination of costs and benefits, and no consideration of alternatives. No wonder so many question marks hang over its purpose.

I have spoken for longer than I had intended, and I realise that other hon. Members want to speak. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider carefully the anxieties expressed this morning, and that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will decide that he is not, after all, minded to support the project.

I reiterate my key anxieties about the preconditions for approval. The language that the Department of Trade and Industry uses is deliberately weak. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State did not even refer to them as conditions, but merely said that granting export credit would be conditional on the Turkish authorities "agreeing to address" anxieties about resettlement, water treatment, downstream water flows and the preservation of Hasankeyf. En passant, we notice that the Government are anxious that they cannot get anything more precise out of the IRA than an agreement to address the anxieties of disarmament. If we demand specificity from the IRA, as we should, we should also demand it from the people involved in the construction of the dam.

Nor has my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State fully faced the problems of resettlement, water treatment, downstream water flows and the preservation of Hasankeyf. What does "agreeing to address" those anxieties mean? The UK Government need to make a clear and unambiguous statement of what guarantees they need from the Turkish authorities before we consider granting support. A clear definition of responsibilities and rights of redress must be provided before allowing the ECGD to proceed, and it should be possible to withdraw support if conditions are not met.

The Ilisu dam cannot be compatible with protecting human rights and the environment in south-east Anatolia. UK support for Ilisu would be incompatible with our commitments to sustainable development and an ethical dimension in foreign policy. We should on no account support the project.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): Only two weeks ago in this Chamber, we debated export credit guarantees and arms sales. The Ilisu dam provides yet another example of the questionable use of ECGs by a Government who continue to claim to have a foreign policy with an ethical dimension.

On 20 December last year, I was told in answer to a question on ECGs and the Ilisu dam project that the project

"has given rise to a number of social, political, environmental and cultural issues requiring further consideration between ECGD, the other export credit agencies involved, the Turkish authorities and the contractors. A decision on the application will not be taken until the issues have been satisfactorily resolved."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 20 December 1999; Vol. 341, c. 380W.]

[Dr. Jenny Tonge]

The following day, the Secretary of State told the press that he was minded to grant the ECGD cover of £200 million for Balfour Beatty's participation in the project, and was waiting for reports on several matters, including consultation with and compensation for the local population involved in the settlement programme. Fifty-two villages and 15 towns will be flooded, and 20,000 people will be displaced, the majority of whom are, as we have heard, Kurdish. A plan is being discussed for the preservation of as much as possible of the archaeological heritage of Hasankeyf, including the provison of upstream water treatment plants to ensure water quality and an assurance that downstream flows will be maintained at all times. That is all good stuff, but major concerns remain.

I accept that the project provides much-needed electricity for Turkey. A young Turkish student whom I met in Oxford some weeks ago forcefully explained to me that the project is necessary because Turkey so desperately needs hydro-electric power. I accept that, and publicly acknowledge that that is the case. However, the ECGD has not, in considering the environmental and social impact of the project, applied even the World bank's best international practices. The World bank has refused to have anything to do with the dam, stating that it violates the UN convention, which seeks to prevent border disputes between states that share water resources. In its assessment, the ECGD presumably used the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's guidelines—which are not, in any case, legally binding—as a benchmark. There seems to be some confusion about the guidelines and parameters that are being set.

When the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry gave evidence to the Select Committee on International Development earlier this month, he said this is not an aid-funded project, as was the Pergau dam—another notorious example—but a commercial operation. Surely, however, export credit is a form of aid, and should therefore abide by the same principles as other aid projects. The Secretary of State has admitted that work on drawing up the international procedures that all OECD members will follow remains unfinished. In that case, why is Britain using as yet ill-defined guidelines instead of the recognised World bank guidelines, to which I understand that we are already committed?

We have seen too many cases of multinational malpractice throughout the developing world. It is encouraging that the Government are taking an active part in reaching agreed international procedures on environmental standards, but there must be a European code of conduct for export credit guarantees and incentives, which are consistent with the World bank and the OECD social, environmental and conflict prevention standards. In the case of the four areas of concern about the Ilisu dam that the Government listed, it is essential that there should be binding obligations that the UK can withdraw the guarantees if agreements break down. Assurances are simply not enough. The hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) graphically pointed out the weakness of Britain's commitment in making those guarantees.

Turkey needs access to hydro-electric power. The Ilisu dam is not for irrigation. Turkey currently suffers from an energy deficit, and there are fears that it may use nuclear energy to close the energy gap. If it is to join Europe and grow, Turkey certainly needs energy, but environmental and political concerns cannot be ignored. The dam is only 40 miles from the borders of Iraq and Syria, and could be used to cut off their water supply from the Tigris. Although Balfour Beatty argues otherwise, surely while the reservoir behind the dam is filling, flooding a huge area of land, the water flow of the Tigris will be much less. However it is done, there will be a significant effect on the water that flows along the Tigris.

It is said that tributaries of the Tigris, especially in Iraq, supply more water than comes from the Tigris through Turkey. However, what about times of drought? Although I have not seen the Tigris, I am reliably informed that it is a huge river. It must have some effect on the flow of water into Iraq and Syria, and in future Turkey could manipulate water supplies to Iraq and Syria. Fears of water wars are not completely misplaced. Furthermore, there is little evidence that Iraq and Syria have been consulted about the matter.

On the issue of human rights, Turkey's record vis-a-vis the Kurdish people is not good. Of the 20,000 people affected, 95 per cent. are Kurdish. I must declare a family interest because my husband lived among Kurdish people in Iraq for a while as a small boy. For 30 years, he has regaled me and my family about the goodness and decency of those people, and about how welcome they made him feel. I have, therefore, always had very warm feelings towards them, because of his advocacy.

Turkey's record on human rights is still a matter for huge concern, and the Kurds rightly feel that the flooding of the ancient town of Hasankeyf is another attack on their cultural identity. In that area, the Kurds are mainly farmers working on agricultural land. Will the Turkish Government ensure that all the Kurdish families on the land that is to be flooded are given equivalent agricultural land, so that they can carry on farming, or will those families become raggle-taggle people living in slums on the borders of the cities in Turkey? The latter outcome is the more likely. How will the United Kingdom Government ensure that the Kurds are properly resettled, and able to benefit from the energy provided by the Ilisu dam and other projects in the area, such as the GAP? Are we to accept Turkey's word on the matter, or will there be continuous monitoring?

My concerns are shared by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell), who, in September last year, called for a cross-departmental control mechanism for the ECGD to ensure sustainable development and an ethical foreign policy. There have been many recent examples of the DTI and the ECGD appearing to overrule the advice of the Foreign Office and the Department for International Development—investment in Sudan, arms exports to Eritrea and Ethiopia and the sale of Hawk jet parts to Zimbabwe. I could continue, but I shall spare the Minister's blushes.

At the Select Committee for International Development hearing to which I referred earlier, the Secretary of State said:

"The DTI are not responsible for human rights assessments for areas of export credit."

Indeed, the Department of Trade and Industry is not responsible. However, if that job belongs to the Foreign Office and the Department for International Development, why does not the DTI listen to, and act on, their advice? I hope that the Minister will have some answers.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on initiating the debate. I shall be brief for two reasons. First, both he and the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) have covered the issues thoroughly. Secondly, I was somewhat over-exuberant in my cheering when Aberdeen football club managed to get through to a final for the first time in five years, and, as a result, my voice is not at its best.

Why are we raising concerns about the Ilisu dam? It has been suggested that great benefits will be gained from it, such as providing jobs in the area and in the United Kingdom. It has also been suggested that there could be environmental benefits, such as removing the necessity to build a nuclear power station in an area known to experience earthquakes, and that the project could be seen as sympathetic from the point of view of global warming. Certain figures in the stakeholder report might even suggest some public support for the project. Will the Minister tell us how many jobs would be gained in the United Kingdom as a result of support for this project?

The environmental review expresses concern that not nearly enough study has been carried out into the potential damage to flora, fauna and wildlife habitats and states that there has been insufficient analysis of alternative ways in which to produce and conserve energy—a matter with which my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North dealt thoroughly.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park dealt with cultural questions. Grave concerns have been expressed about the archaeological heritage, and not merely in the city of Hasankeyf. I defer to the hon. Member for Richmond Park on the precise pronunciation of that. Of course, much of the surrounding region is unexcavated, particularly the cave areas, and a rich archaelogical heritage could be permanently lost.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North said, according to Government briefings, a dam built primarily for hydro-electricity, rather than irrigation, should not substantially affect downstream water flows. However, am I right in saying that the building of a previous Turkish dam affected water flows even though Turkey promised its neighbours that it would not? Moreover, is not Turkey still in dispute on that with Syria, which has taken it to the International Court? Is not it also true that the Turkish contractor for the Ilisu project was reported on a BBC Radio 5 Live programme as saying that downstream water flows will be reduced by 45 per cent. for at least the first three years.

The stakeholder report highlights a possible cumulative effect, particularly in the light of a proposed further dam, which would be used for irrigation. Again, my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North mentioned the problem of water control and spoke in detail on diplomatic relations in the region. I recently visited most of the front-line states that are involved in the middle east peace process, and grave concerns were expressed about the possible effect of such projects on that process. Access to water is an important issue in discussions between Syria and Israel on the Golan heights. Many people look to Britain to support a process for which there is cautious optimism. Given the current desperate shortage of water, it would be particularly unfortunate if we were to have a deleterious effect on those delicate negotiations.

At least 16,000 and perhaps as many as 25,000 Kurds will be compulsorily moved, and a further 20,000 may be affected, although the stakeholder report makes it clear that it is difficult to be precise. Under Turkish law, compensation would be offered, but the report also makes it clear that the history of compensation in relation to Turkish dam projects is not encouraging. Many people claim to have received no compensation, and often compensation has been too little, too late. In Turkey, where inflation can run at 100 per cent. per annum, too late automatically becomes too little.

The stakeholder report refers to the damage done to social structures. Balfour Beatty has made extravagant promises on consultation but, according to the report, there has been no attempt at consultation. It has been said that the project has been under consideration for some 20 years but, in fact, it has been under consideration for 50 years. Not a single person was found first to have heard of the project from the companies involved.

Proper consultation has not taken place. There is virtual martial law, and the stakeholder report states that security conditions make it difficult to obtain proper access. The reporter had limited time and was unable to visit many areas because of security difficulties. The report states, with fairness, that the figures about support should be treated with considerable caution. The translator in the Kurdish areas was a Turkish Government official. How freely would people speak in that situation? It has been suggested that the area will benefit from additional electricity, but it is alleged that most of the electricity that is produced by the existing dam projects is used not in the Kurdish areas but elsewhere in Turkey.

The Government should be careful not to repeat the situation that arose in relation to the Pergau dam under the previous Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North mentioned that this dam—I need to be careful about how I use that word—project is called the GAP. I shall not try to pronounce the Turkish that the acronym stands for, but I fear that the word "gap" is appropriate in this context. There may be a gap between the airy reassurances that we have received and what appears to be the grim reality on the ground. I fear that, if the Government are strongly minded to approve this project there could too easily be a gap between reassurances that we might receive on human rights, environmental, cultural and diplomatic matters, and what really happens.

[Mr. Malcolm Savidge]

I am not given to Joan of Arc experiences—I do not often hear voices—but when I was coming to the Palace on the tube this morning, I heard loud and clear a warning that I hope the Government will heed: "Mind the gap."

10.41 pm

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on raising the subject. The speeches of Labour and Liberal Democrat Members make it clear why the project is a matter of concern.

On 21 December last year, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry issued a press release outlining his approach to the matter. That happened to be the day that the House rose for the Christmas recess, and the Department of Trade and Industry slipped out several press releases in the full knowledge that Members of Parliament would be packing up to go home and so would pay them less attention than if they had been released in the middle of the week when the House was sitting. That is a somewhat cynical approach to this important matter.

In the press release, the Secretary of State referred to "The two reports: one examining the resettlement issues and the other looking at the environmental impact", and he explained that they were

"commissioned to help Ministers decide whether to grant export credit backing to the scheme."

He continued:

"I have carefully considered both reports and I am minded to grant export credit."

I have read both reports, but it puzzles me that the Secretary of State came to that conclusion. The report on resettlement is a weightier document than that on the environment, but there is little in either report that would lead one to think, "Yes, let's go with those proposals," not least because the project is not new—it has been around for 20 years—although, interestingly, the Ilisu dam already features on Turkish tourist maps. I applaud such commitment, but placing the scheme on a map does not answer the many questions that hon. Members have raised today. I agree with some of the concerns that have been raised.

In giving his judgment on those two documents, the Secretary of State added four caveats—things that needed to be done before he could proceed. If the Government are to go ahead with ECGD money, it would be helpful if the Minister could give us some detail about the action that is being taken and what is being put in place, to ensure that the criteria are not only met but are monitored and enforced. To recap, the four caveats were, first, the need to "draw up a resettlement programme which reflects internationally accepted practice and includes independent monitoring".

We all accept that that is a laudable aim, but what will be done in practice to ensure that that is done? The second was, to "make provision for upstream water treatment plants capable of ensuring that water quality is maintained".

There is a great concern in the environmental paper about water quality. the third was to "give an assurance that adequate downstream water flows will be maintained at all times".

I understand that since the environmental report was produced more work has been done on that issue. Perhaps the Minister will update us on the solutions that have been found to that problem.

The fourth caveat was the need to preserve archaeological sites. I notice that the press release includes the words "as possible", which is a bit of a cop-out. We all want to preserve such sites, but can the project go ahead even if it is not possible to preserve them? Will the Minister clarify what is meant by that statement?

We have heard from other hon. Members about the impact on neighbouring countries, and I want to emphasise the huge political row and instability that could be caused in the region if the scheme proceeds without due consultation with neighbouring countries, particularly Iraq and Syria, and if the views of the Arab League, which has made official representations on this matter, are not taken into account. It is not clear from the Government's press releases or the documents that they have put into the public domain how they intend to respond to complaints from third parties. Certain lobbying groups—for example, Friends of the Earth—have issued press releases saying that the Government could be taken to court if they proceed with the scheme. Presumably the Government have taken legal advice on their position.

That brings me back to a point that was made earlier concerning the international legal basis on which the Government will now proceed. We have heard about the involvement of the World bank. I understand that it was approached as early as 1984 when it turned the project down. When I look at the parameters and conditions that have applied since 1984, my instinct tells me that the World bank is less likely to say yes in 2000. Presumably the Government have taken advice on their position in relation to other international bodies, which clearly would have a view on the scheme.

We seek more information from the Minister today. Much of what one reads in the newspapers is comments by Ministers and commentary on them, but I have the clear impression that the scheme is being driven personally by the Prime Minister. There appears to be a huge row between the Foreign Office and No. 10. One wonders what pivotal role the Department of Trade and Industry plays in all this, but as the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is "minded" to proceed, one assumes that he is on the side of No. 10. Clearly the scheme flies in the face of the Foreign Office's stated ethical foreign policy, not only for all the reasons that hon. Members have so ably demonstrated, but particularly because of the question of the Kurdish population, which must be addressed.

This is a big issue for thousands of people. Any big civil engineering project such as this anywhere in the world, even in our own country, would cause a great deal of concern to those living in the immediate vicinity. As Members of Parliament, we all know what happens. In the past seven years my constituency has faced the prospect of a new town, a gas-fired power station and a quarry. When such matters arise, all those who are immediately affected lobby against them. It is right that they should raise their voices, but the issue that we are considering is of enormous humanitarian concern. As the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) rightly said, the population in the vicinity of the proposed dam has not been consulted. Nothing in the report assumes any preparation or consultation on how the community would be rehoused and remain as a community. Is the failure to address the resettlement issue the result of a formula to disperse the community to the fringes of many cities, as the hon. Lady said? If that is not the case, work needs to be done rapidly, and assurances given.

Dr. Tonge: Does the hon. Lady agree that in other countries and contexts that might be referred to as ethnic cleansing?

Mrs. Browning: Indeed. There is great concern about the way in which Kurdish communities have been treated in the past. We are therefore cautious about the possibility of dispersing a community.

Other hon. Members have ably outlined the problems, but I want to add a further point. If the Prime Minister is the driving force behind the proposal, he is in a strong position to ensure that, if the dam proceeds and is supported by the UK taxpayer, the criteria outlined by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 21 December are met. He has a strong card to play. Turkey wishes to become a member of the European Union, and the Prime Minister will have many opportunities to influence that decision and the speed with which it happens. As a negotiator, he should ensure that, if Turkey's membership of the EU proceeds, the conditions for ECGD funding outlined by the Secretary of State are met. That does not need to be done in a bullying way; it is purely a matter of straightforward international common-sense negotiation.

Mr. McNamara: I asked the Prime Minister whether the matter had been raised at the Helsinki summit, when the Kurds were invited to attend. He said that it had not; nor had it been raised in side meetings or with European Union officials. I agree with the hon. Lady that the matter should be addressed.

Is the hon. Lady aware that Balfour Beatty is part of a consortium currently being prosecuted for bribery in relation to a dam project in Lesotho? Should the ECGD be funding the company in those circumstances?

Mrs. Browning: I do not know the background to the legal affairs of Balfour Beatty. I would expect that to be explored by the appropriate agencies, to ensure, if that is the case, that it is exposed. I am aware, however, that it is not just a Balfour Beatty UK project; an international consortium is involved. Many other countries, including European countries, are involved in the project.

I hope that the Minister will be able to give us the answers and assurances that we seek. In particular, I hope that she will shed some light on from where, within the Government, the driving force is coming. If it is No. 10, I hope that she will assure us that the Prime Minister will use his high office to ensure that our concerns about resettlement, environment and the effects on neighbouring countries are addressed. Resolution and enforcement will be necessary if the project is to proceed.

The Minister for Small Business and E-Commerce (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on securing a debate on a matter that is of great concern to him and to the other hon. Members who have spoken. I fully understand those concerns because the Government share them.

I begin by reminding the House in some detail of the statement that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made shortly before Christmas when he published the two reports commissioned by the Government—one on the resettlement issue and the other on a review of the larger environmental impact assessement which had been commissioned on behalf of the Swiss contractors. In that statement my right hon. Friend said:

> "I have carefully considered both reports and I am minded to grant export credit. This will be conditional on the Turkish authorities agreeing to address the concerns we have about the environmental and social impact of the project."

He went on to say that copies of both reports have been given to representatives of the Turkish Government and the other Government export credit agencies considering support for the project, and that the Government are discussing with them the details of the areas in which changes would be required and action taken before the Government could consider export credit support. They include the need to draw up a resettlement programme that reflects internationally agreed practice and includes independent monitoring; to make provision for upstream water treatment plants capable of ensuring that water quality is maintained; to give an assurance that adequate downstream water flows will be maintained at all times; and to produce a detailed plan to preserve as much of the archaeological heritage of Hasankeyf as possible. The matters of concern that were raised by my hon. Friend and other hon. Members this morning reflect the concerns that my right hon. Friend raised with the publication of the two reports just before Christmas.

Underlying the debate is the question of whether the British Government and, in particular, the Export Credits Guarantee Department, should remain engaged in discussions about the project or should pull out completely. The reality is that Turkey is in any case likely to proceed with the dam, using Turkish companies or contractors from other countries. As the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) made clear, for the past 20 years the Turkish authorities have been planning on the assumption that they intend to proceed with the dam, which, as she said, is noted on their maps. By remaining engaged with that process we can try to ensure that international standards are met and that if and when the dam is built it has a high standard of construction, which is particularly important in a country that has suffered two major earthquakes in recent years, to tragic effect.

The hon. Lady also rightly said that Turkey is a candidate for accession to the European Union, that candidate status was confirmed by the Helsinki Council last December. Like every other candidate for EU membership, Turkey has to meet the EU's political membership criteria on democracy, the rule of law, human rights and the treatment of minorities before accession negotiations can begin. All those issues are directly relevant to the concerns that the Government and other hon. Members share about the Ilisu dam project.

However, it is also worth remembering—I am glad that the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) stressed the point—that the dam project offers the possibility of major economic benefits for Turkey. Turkey's economy is growing rapidly and, as a potential member of the EU, can be expected to continue to do so. It already has an energy deficit of 5 per cent. and has to import to meet its current energy needs. Moreover, its per capita energy consumption is only 15 per cent. of the OECD, making it clear that, whatever other measures it takes to promote energy efficiency and, thereby, hold down the growth in demand for energy, it will have to increase energy supply.

Hydro-electric power is a clean and renewable source of energy. It would help Turkey to continue to diversify its sources of power. It clearly would help to reduce reliance on imported energy and it would reduce the likelihood of Turkey deciding to build a nuclear power plant to meet some of its energy needs. Again, given the recent earthquakes, there is particular concern about any prospect of nuclear power plant construction in Turkey.

It is also worth saying that, if Balfour Beatty becomes one of the contractors for the Ilisu dam, it will bring to the project high-quality and highly experienced British construction. I remind hon. Members of the recently completed British-constructed Izmit water project. It withstood last year's earthquake, despite the fact that it was extremely close to the epicentre of the quake. There are real advantages in our engaging with Turkey in developing the plans for the project before a decision is made about whether to offer an export guarantee.

Dr. Tonge: Is the Minister truly satisfied with Balfour Beatty's record? We have heard already that Lesotho is prosecuting for corruption the project contractors in that country, of which Balfour Beatty was one. I understand, too, that BICC—Balfour Beatty's parent company—has been barred by Singapore from bidding for Government contacts for five years, following bribery. Is the hon. Lady entirely satisfied that we can rely on the company to do the right thing on the Ilisu dam project? Do the Government have any plans to take on the company under the OECD guidelines and ensure that it does not do the same again?

Ms Hewitt: The consortium of which Balfour Beatty is a member has been accused of corruption in relation to the Lesotho highlands water project. Balfour Beatty vigorously denies any such wrongdoing and I am sure that, like me, the hon. Member for Richmond Park believes that one is innocent until proven guilty. The case is expected to begin in the South African courts in the summer and we shall see what emerges. We do not intend to put current applications on hold until a verdict is reached in that case.

Mr. Savidge: I am concerned that, with the suggestion of the alternative being a nuclear power station in an area of earthquakes, we might be guilty of precisely what the report criticises in its reference to the way in which the Turkish Government have dealt with the matter. It seems to have introduced oil-fired power stations with a view to making them a paper tiger to knock down. The report suggests other possibilities that have never been considered seriously.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Clearly, it is up to the Turkish Government to decide on an energy strategy by which to examine the comparative risks, costs and benefits of the Ilisu project, and so on. The update of an environmental impact assessment report may deal with those issues, but, as we and all developing countries know, with economic growth tends to come an increase in the demand for energy. Given that Turkey's per capita energy consumption is a small portion of the OECD average, it seems sensible to assume that the Turkish Government are right to anticipate a need for a significant increase in energy supply if they are to enjoy the benefits of economic growth and those that will be delivered to their population through that growth.

There are only so many possibilities for any Government to consider about meeting significant increases in demand for energy, one of which is clearly nuclear power plants. To follow a course of action that might increase the likelihood of a nuclear power plant being built in a country that has recently suffered two major earthquakes is not necessarily sensible or in the interests of its people.

The hon. Members for Richmond Park and for Tiverton and Honiton raised the roles of different Departments. The hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton became rather overexcited about a conspiracy that she appeared to see within the Government.

Mrs. Browning: I certainly was not accusing the Government of conspiracy in this instance, although I might in others. I was more concerned that there seems to be a difference of opinion between Departments.

Ms Hewitt: I am happy to reassure the hon. Lady about that as well. The Department of Trade and Industry works extremely closely on the matter with several other Departments, such as the Department for International Development, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and, especially, the Foreign Office. There is a range of interests, and the DTI leads on the support of exports. Issues of sustainable development, human rights, the treatment of minorities and so on are not the preserve of any single Department. DFID has given us extremely helpful advice, especially by putting us in touch with Dr. Morvaridi, who carried out the analysis on resettlement that we published in a report shortly before Christmas. I must stress that Turkey is not one of DFID's key partner countries, and the project is not one of aid. DFID's involvement has declined since the commission of the report.

Dr. Tonge: The Minister must accept that DFID is interested in and does a tremendous amount of work on conflict prevention. Time and again, it seems to those of us who are not party to Government thinking that its advice is overruled by other Departments and by No. 10 Downing street, as the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton suggested. We are concerned that commercial interests are always put before the promised ethical foreign policy.

Ms Hewitt: There is no question of DFID being overruled. It has assisted us in properly analysing resettlement, which is a major human rights issue relating to conflict settlement. We have been able to tell the Turkish Government that we think that a great deal more needs to be done if an effective resettlement programme is to be carried out. Turkey is not one of DFID's key partner countries, so it is appropriate that the DTI should use its role as the sponsoring Department for the ECGD to promote human rights issues and environmental and sustainable development issues within the context of what is a commercial project.

The DETR maintains an interest in sustainable development, as do the ECGD and the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office is especially interested in the human rights issues as well as relations with Turkey and other states in the region. My Department and the ECGD have worked extremely constructively with those Departments, and will continue to do so as the process continues until a decision is made. The DTI is in the lead because the request is for commercial support through the ECGD.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge) asked whether the project would have an impact on the middle east peace process, but such anxieties are not well founded. The project will have a minimal impact on Syria and no effect on the other front-line states. It is on such issues that we work closely with the Foreign Office.

Mr. McNamara: My hon. Friend passed lightly over the major anxiety about water flows. She did not deal with the dam's possible impact on Syria and Iraq, or with the general comments of the United Kingdom Defence Forum. Will she go into more detail, rather than merely repeating what we have already read?

Ms Hewitt: I shall discuss those issues in a moment, but I want to deal with the issue that my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North raised about the middle east peace process. Of course I shall discuss in some detail both upstream and downstream water flows.

The hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton referred to the World bank—

Mr. Savidge: I visited Syria and spoke to its Foreign Secretary, who has considerable influence in the regime. He expressed grave concern at the dam's possible effect on water supplies to Syria. What consultations have been entered into with Syria, now that we are trying to encourage better relations with it in moving the middle east peace process forward?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend should ask that question of a Foreign Office Minister involved in detailed discussions with the Syrian Government. My understanding is that, precisely because the dam is a hydro-electric project, rather than an irrigation project, it will not have a major impact on the water supply to Syria. I shall return to that issue in a moment.

One of the reasons for ECGD engagement in the process is to influence for the better the enivronmental impact of water projects. In introducing the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North elaborated well on the broad context of water projects and the genuine danger of serious conflict over an apparently or genuinely scarce resource. ECGD has been able to deliver positive action to influence the environmental impact of several recent power projects, including the Shandong in China, the Sual in the Philippines, the Manjung in Malaysia, and the Vizag in India. In all those cases, rather than putting commercial interests above environmental and other interests, as the hon. Member for Richmond Park implied, we used commercial leverage to achieve environmental goals. I hope that my hon. Friends support that. In this case, we are doing that through the pressure that we and other export credit agencies are bringing to bear in discussions with the Turkish authorities.

Several hon. Members referred to the reduction in water flow that will occur while the dam fills up, as distinct from what will happen once the dam is full and the hydro-electricity project starts. The DSI, which bought, or commissioned, the dam, has discussed the problem with engineers for the United States agency Eximbank, the United States' equivalent of our ECGD. We are waiting for confirmation of the minimum flow agreed to be maintained while the dam fills up, after which we shall be able to judge whether what has been agreed will be adequate to maintain the downstream flow into other countries. We are continuing to discuss the rights of neighbouring states, and it is for the Foreign Office to take the lead. The real responsibility lies with Turkey to communicate its proposals to neighbouring states and to reassure them that the project will not have an adverse impact on the downstream flow. As it is not an irrigation project, that should not be a problem once the dam is fully operational. As I said, we have yet to receive the information that Eximbank will obtain on the level of flow to be maintained while the dam is being filled up. However, half the flow of the Tigris joins the river below the dam and below the Turkish border, so by no means all the flow of the river will be affected by the construction of the dam.

Dr. Tonge: One has only to look at the map, as I did carefully last night, to see that the tributaries of the Tigris, which come from Syria and Iraq, are a long way from the sources of the Tigris. It is conceivable that a drought in either of those areas could lead to minimal flows of those tributaries and the people would be dependent on the flows from the Tigris. That puts Turkey in a prime position to influence and, if necessary, wage a water war against those two countries.

Ms Hewitt: Those concerns are being addressed, but again I stress that, if it were an irrigation project, there would be a risk of inadequate water flows into Syria and Iraq. However, a hydro-electric project such as this depends on a continuous flow of water, not on stopping and diverting the water in the way that an irrigation project would.

Mrs. Browning: The environmental document states:

"Some of the potential downstream impacts, eg reduction in floodplain fertility for agriculture, channel erosion, loss of downstream riverine fisheries, are largely discounted since it is assumed that Cizre Dam will be constructed and a reservoir environment created downstream."

We have not heard much about that second adjunct, on which the dam now appears to be conditional. Is that going ahead?

Ms Hewitt: A major point in the environmental report was that other scenarios had not been properly addressed in the environmental impact assessement. That main environmental impact assessment, which has been commissioned by the Swiss, is now being updated. We hope that it will take account of the criticisms expressed in the report that we commissioned, which we published before Christmas. Clearly, we need to understand, as do the Turkish Government, the implications of building the second dam and what would happen to water flows and other environmental issues in either of those scenarios.

Upstream issues also arise. The water treatment plants that will be constructed in the main towns must be operational before the dam starts to fill, because the environmental impact assessment has made it clear that, otherwise, there is a risk of pollution in the reservoir. It is a serious issue and it is being addressed.

The other serious issue is the resettlement of villagers whose land would be flooded as a result of construction of the dam. Here again we are working closely with the Foreign Office. A full resettlement plan must be drawn up, taking account of the people's wishes. In other words, we need a process that involves their participation, with proper support provided to all those affected. It is clear from Mr. Morvaridi's excellent report that we are taking those issues seriously, and we expect the Turkish authorities to respond equally seriously.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn: (Islington, North): I apologise for not having been here earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I had a previous engagement.

I fully accept that the British Government are concerned about the treatment of people displaced by the dam, but Turkey's record on displacing people from the Kurdish region is nothing short of abominable and apalling. Given the way in which those people have been treated by the army and civil authorities, does the Minister have any reason to believe that the situation will be different if the construction of the dam goes ahead?

Ms Hewitt: Real concerns exist about Turkey's human rights record, and those, among other issues, must be addressed if Turkey is to succeed in its desire to become a member of the European Union. However, there are signs of progress. The Turkish authorities have appointed independent local consultants who have carried out assessments for the World bank in respect of other projects, and have agreed to the appointment of an international expert. Furthermore, progress is being made on the consultation exercise and the survey. The Turkish authorities are taking the matter seriously as a result of the international pressure that we have helped to bring to bear.

Dr. Tonge: Will the Minister then explain why the World bank refuses to support the project?

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for restating that point, because I should have dealt with it earlier. The World bank has not been asked to support the project. Discussions took place between the Turkish Government and the World bank, but the bank said that those discussions did not constitute a request for support. We have discussed the project with the World bank, and have not received any indication of the kind of opinion to which the hon. Lady referred.

Several hon Members referred to the archaeological and cultural heritage of Hasankeyf. That has been the subject of research by the Middle East technical university, and a presentation that was given in Ankara a couple of weeks ago—of which we are awaiting full details—will give us a better idea of how much can be preserved and what can be catalogued. However, it is worth pointing out that much of that archaeological heritage is not in good condition, and several experts have expressed the view that, if the dam were not to be built, much of it would continue to decline and disappear.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North and other hon. Members asked whether, if export credit guarantees are to be granted in this case—the decision has not yet been made—it would be possible to enforce any conditions in relation to the contract. The ECGD enters into agreements with the exporter and the bank that determine the terms on which support is made available, and is also involved in the negotiation of the loan agreement between the bank and the borrower. It is normal for such loans to include undertakings by the borrower which, if they are not observed, may lead to the suspension of the continued availability of the loan. If we were to give cover, and conditions attached to that cover were not fulfilled, we would be able to pursue diplomatic and legal forms of redress. The time for detailed consideration of any such conditions would follow the Secretary of State's decision as to whether to proceed. That will not happen for some time, because we have not yet received the full updated environmental assessment report.

I assure hon. Members that, if support were to be offered, it would be possible to consider making requirements under the terms of the loan agreement that certain events shall have occurred, or that the Turkish authorities shall have carried out certain acts, before the agreement becomes effective. It would be possible to require undertakings by the authorities that they will carry out certain acts in certain ways, and to provide that if the undertakings were to be breached, the whole amount of the outstanding loan would become immediately payable and there would be no further advances to the contractor under the loan.

Similarly, under the construction contract, the contractor should be able to cease work in the event of a breach of undertakings by the Turkish authorities. The ECGD contract with the contractor could include a provision whereby, in the event of a breach of undertakings by the Turkish authorities, the ECGD would have the right to direct the contractor to cease work.

I hope that I have made it clear that the Government share the concerns that hon. Members have expressed—my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North did so eloquently—and that we are using our influence through the ECGD to reach more satisfactory outcomes in relation to the environment, interstate relationships and questions relating to human rights and resettlement. We expect a decision about support to be taken some time in the summer, by which time we will have considered the updated environmental impact assessment report and had responses to our other concerns. We and the export credit agencies that are involved will take account of the need to establish a resettlement action plan that reflects international practice and ensure that it is put into effect properly.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving us an opportunity to debate this important issue. If my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State decides, after consideration, to grant export credit cover, a statement will be made to the House, which will provide a further opportunity for debate and questioning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): The right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shepard) and the Minister are present in the Chamber, so although we are a little ahead of our timetable we may start the next debate.

Care Homes

11.26 am

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): I am extremely grateful to have an opportunity to raise this matter, which is of enormous interest and great concern to my constituents.

It is my intention not to pre-empt consideration in the House of the Care Standards Bill, which is passing through the other place, but to focus on the impact on privately run care homes in Norfolk of the draft rules for such homes, which are contained in the consultation document "Fit for the Future". That document was commissioned by the Government from the Centre for Policy on Ageing and published in September 1999.

I emphasise from the outset that I fully support the objective of achieving higher and more uniform standards in care homes. The Minister of State will know that all the relevant bodies share that objective, including the National Care Homes Association, Help the Aged, the Registered Nursing Homes Association and the Royal College of Nursing. People in such care homes are, by definition, among the most vulnerable in society and they deserve the protection of verifiable standards.

It would be hard to overstate the anxiety among private care home owners that has been provoked by the rules that are proposed in "Fit for the Future", especially those regarding physical accommodation. The Minister will be aware that their anxiety has been in no way allayed by the fact that, for reasons that are best known to the Department of Health, many care home owners were unable to get copies of "Fit for the Future" until after 3 December last year, which was the closing date for consultation. I am glad that the Department took the welcome step of extending the consultation period.

"Fit for the Future" states that single rooms in care homes must have at least 10 sq m of usable floor space, and that there must be 12 sq m for wheelchair users. New single rooms must have at least 12 sq m of usable floor space, rooms should not be shared by more than two people and people should have made a positive choice to share. Communal space must amount to at least 4.1 sq m per resident. Those requirements sound extremely reasonable. Of course, those of us with experience of care homes, or who have relatives or friends in such homes, want people to be comfortably housed in rooms that are sufficiently large, and which equate with the people's choices. However, the rapid—or, worse still, retrospective—imposition of such standards would impact on the vulnerable members of society whom the Care Standards Bill is designed to protect.

Staffing requirements would include one member of staff to every five residents for morning work, one to every seven for afternoons and evenings, and one to every 10 at night, with a minimum of two remaining awake. Additional staff would have to be on duty at peak times, and at least one third of care staff would have to be registered nurses. In my experience of private care homes in Norfolk, staffing ratios and the requirement for additional staff at peak times would present little difficulty. In fact, most homes already work in that way, and it is clearly sensible to have more people on duty when they are needed. However, the requirement for registered nurses presents some difficulty in respect of costings, and so on.

In Norfolk, there are about 415 private homes. The majority care for the elderly and the remainder look after people with learning disabilities, mental health problems or physical disabilities. In its response to "Fit for the Future", a consultation document that was sent to the Department of Health last month, Norfolk Independent Care Homes calculated that the average-sized home registered in Norfolk has about 20 residents. It is interesting to note that, although there are about 1,000 places in local authority homes in our country, there are 4,800 places in private care homes. That gives added point to private care home owners' anxieties, and must be of concern to Ministers. Although there are some new purpose-built care homes, given the rural disposition of a county such as Norfolk, the vast majority are evenly spread throughout the county in converted manors, halls or old rectories. Therefore, one home might serve three, four or five small village communities within a five-mile radius.

Norfolk care home owners have calculated that they employ one member of staff for each resident, which is another issue of concern. By definition, many of those staff are women, who work flexible hours and frequently walk or cycle to work. Given the even spread of provision, the homes form a source of employment that is easy for people to access. Each home is well known in its locality, and it is important to prospective residents to know that, on entering residential care, they will meet local friends and acquaintances. It is not putting the matter too strongly to say that the choice of a residential home is one of the few freedoms left to those who enter them.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid Norfolk): I wish to support my right hon. Friend. In my constituency I have shared a similar experience. Does she agree that it is not merely the owners of small homes but residents and their families who feel vulnerable, and that we must not only enhance standards in care homes but protect their local nature?

Mrs. Shephard: I agree with my hon. Friend, and I suspect that the Minister, who has taken a good deal of trouble to meet associations and proprietors of care homes, is also well aware of the problem. He, too, represents a rural and far-flung constituency, so he will appreciate the force of my argument. In rural counties such as Norfolk, requiring the removal of two, three or four beds might render the home in question unviable as a business. It would have to close down, and the geographical relevance of the home would be gone. The home would cease to serve the locally based needs of the residents. The magazine Caring Times, in its edition of 2 February 1999, quoted an anonymous source as saying that if the Centre for Policy on Ageing were to succeed in introducing the standards, the only people who would be able to meet them would be those running 100-plus bed purpose-built homes, thereby restricting individuality and choice. I agree with that comment. In Norfolk, there are a number of well-run large purpose-built homes. Although those would be the choice of many, at least as many people would choose smaller, more individualistic accommodation for their relatives, especially if it is close at hand, as frequent visiting would be easier. Many people entering residential care prefer a homely atmosphere to more institutional care.

Norfolk social services responded to the Government's consultation, and in a letter dated 20 November 1999, it stated:

"Norfolk is a geographically large and predominantly rural county. The current stock of residential care homes is diverse in terms of both size and location. In a county where elderly people still predominantly have their family roots within a particular village or small cluster of villages, the location of a residential care home is a critical element of choice . . . The proposed standards are likely to speed this trend and cause significant disruption to existing residents as small businesses fail as well as limit choice to prospective residents. There has been a need locally to formulate specific strategies to redress the forced migration from villages of young couples—the forced migration of our elderly people through the lack of local residential care homes must be avoided."

Since the Government took office, residential care home owners in rural areas have had to deal with a number of difficult issues. They have had to deal with the impact on their businesses of the working time directive, and the Government's reduction of council grant to shire local authorities, which has resulted in social services cuts. Hikes in fuel taxes have affected all rural businesses. Pay increases for nurses, which were richly deserved, mean, of course, that more care homes are being forced to provide only residential care, as they simply cannot afford to pay the staff to provide nursing care. All that is within the context of rising numbers of frail, elderly people in society, and falling numbers of hospital beds. Instead of piling further pressure on care homes, the Government should be seeking to demonstrate that they have understood the impact on frail and elderly people and their families, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) pointed out, not to mention that on the NHS and local authorities. By forcing the pace of improvements in the private care sector, they might push hundreds of private care homes out of business.

We need to be aware of the findings of the Forum of Private Business care sector survey dated July 1999. Seventy-five per cent. of respondents claimed that if the "Fit for the Future" proposals were carried out, their businesses would no longer be viable. What would happen to the 500,000 or so frail people who would have to be rehoused? Extraordinary distress would be caused to the families. Who would re-employ those thrown out of work? The Norfolk Residential Care Homes Association welcomes the introduction, in principle, of mandatory minimum standards. Mr. Colin Gething, the association's chairman, points out in a letter dated 12 January 2000, that "it does appear to our membership that, whilst the emphasis may not be biased towards physical standards, the degree of variation of the physical and measurable aspects from that which is currently required by many authorities will impose unrealistic demands both practically and financially, and yet not improve the standard of care one iota."

For many small to medium-sized homes of 10 to 18 registered places, the imposition of standards such as minimum sizes for rooms and communal space will be unattainable, and the loss of two or three rooms to a financially marginal business will culminate in the closure of a home and the loss of not two or three, but all. Sadly, such a closure has already taken place in my constitutency, even before the end of the consultation period. The proprietor of the former Lion House residential home in Downham Market wrote, on 16 October 1999:

"The national standards room size of 10 square metres for existing homes will leave us only 5 registered rooms, from 15. This will bankrupt us. Therefore, I am closing Lion House at the end of November . . . Two years ago, it was valued as a business at £345,000 . . . Now, as a house with vacant possession, it is valued at £200,000. So not only have we lost a good business which we have spent 15 years building up, we have also lost £145,000."

The arrangements for finding alternative accommodation for the frail, elderly residents were handled by social services with extreme difficulty, although that is not a matter for this debate.

That example illustrates the difficulties posed by the present approach. Mr. Barry Hartley of the National Care Homes Association said, in the October 1999 issue of Caring UK:

"I'm very disturbed that the Government has missed a golden opportunity to look at the true values of care and whether people are being cared for appropriately. One of our prime reasons for wanting national standards was to ensure a system which measured those things which are important rather than those things which can easily be measured. We are disappointed that standards have not been developed which relate to individual personal quality of care . . . The 'apparent intention to cull between 12 and 23 per cent. of the sector' is alarming."

Those and other matters will be thoroughly debated when the Care Standards Bill comes from the other place to be debated in the House. However, I want to demonstrate that the Government's handling of the consultation process on this vital issue, in addition to their apparent lack of concern about the fate of 12 to 23 per cent. of the sector, does not bode well. I am talking not only about the businesses but about the frail people for whom they care.

I hope that the Minister will dispel some of our fears in his response to the debate. Will he make it clear that the Government have understood, from the response to their consultation, the disastrous effect on the sector of over-hasty implementation of the accommodation requirements? Will he also make it clear that there is a need for careful consideration of the effect on the overall availability of residential care places of imposing the new standards? Will he also consider the alternatives that the public would expect the Government to provide in the event of large numbers of homes going out of business? Will he give an estimate of the cost to the sector of implementation? Will he set out a timetable, first for publishing the final standards so that home owners will know what is required, and, secondly, for the implementation time proposed, so that they can begin to plan the development of their businesses? Does he plan to compensate private care home owners for the loss in value to their businesses, or for the loss of their business altogether?

I believe that the Minister understands the importance of the role played by the private sector in residential care, and the problems that the Government would have if they ignored the sector's difficulties in maintaining the current number of places under the "Fit for the Future" proposals. I hope that the Minister also understands that behind my concern is the knowledge that to enter residential care is a massive step for anyone and their family. To plunge the sector into anxiety or uncertainty, for an unspecified period, is unacceptable. I hope that he will be able today to dispel some of that uncertainty for the sake of everyone concerned.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I warmly congratulate the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) on choosing this subject for our debate today and on the way in which she has addressed her concerns.

I am particularly grateful to her for accepting the argument for national standards, because we should not allow that issue to go by default. We are not trying to do any of the things that she suggested: we do not intend to cause concern, anxiety or fear for the future in this major sector of the social care industry. The services provided by private care homes, both nursing and residential, are hugely important in our country, and the Government do not intend to jeopardise the sector's ability to respond to our population's social care needs. We would be crazy and stupid if we were to develop national minimum standards from that starting point. We do not intend that the "Fit for the Future" proposals should have the unforeseen consequences suggested by the right hon. Lady. Therefore, I shall try to reassure her and her hon. Friends about some of the concerns that she has raised today.

The right hon. Lady is right to say that Norfolk and Cumbria, the county in which my constituency is based, have many similarities. Although my constituency is not predominantly rural, the county of Cumbria is, and she is right to say that in rural counties there is a particular dimension to the argument about the provision of long-term residential care services, to which the Government are sensitive and of which they are mindful.

The right hon. Lady raised a number of detailed points, and I shall return to some of them during my remarks, but today's debate also gives me the opportunity to correct some of the misconceptions and misunderstandings about the "Fit for the Future" proposals and to address the legitimate concerns expressed by many in the industry over the past few months. As the right hon. Lady was gracious enough to point out, I have made every effort to resolve those concerns in my meetings with representatives of this crucial industry.

We start from the point that the development of national standards for care homes and other social care services is long overdue. Enforceable national rules should ensure that poor standards and shoddy treatment are rooted out for good and that, regardless of location, all residents in care homes will be afforded the same protection and access to decent facilities.

National minimum standards for care homes are, therefore, part of the Government's plans for reforming the current regulatory arrangements for social services, nursing homes and the private health care sector. The reforms, first announced in the White Paper "Modernising Social Services", were put in train on 2 December, when the Care Standards Bill was introduced in another place.

The Bill will introduce new systems that will help to deliver our aims for a modernised regulatory framework. The current system has long been the subject of criticism by regulators and care providers for lacking independence, consistency and coherence.

[Mr. John Hutton]

The Care Standards Bill will establish an independent National Care Standards Commission responsible for regulating social care and private health care. The commission will be responsible for laying down standards of care and ensuring that those standards are met through a system of registration, inspection and enforcement. In addition, in line with the recommendation made by the royal commission on long-term care, it will also have responsibility for monitoring and reporting on trends in the provision of long-term care, investigating complaints and taking tough action where necessary, reflecting the views of service users and encouraging better services through reporting on service performance.

We want the National Care Standards Commission to be a powerful new body which will make a major contribution to improving standards of care and informing and empowering consumers. Raising the standard of social care provision and increasing the protection of vulnerable people are paramount considerations for the Government, and the main reasons for having national standards.

National standards will be central to the commission's responsibility for ensuring minimum standards of care. They will form the basis on which the commission's inspectors judge the fitness of the homes and agencies that they regulate and make decisions about registration and cancellation. The standards will be applied consistently to service providers across the country. At the moment there is often a wide variation in the standards required by different local and health authorities, leading to confusion and frustration between providers and regulators. National standards will mean that providers will be clear about the standards that they have to meet and that users and their carers will be clear about the standards that they can expect.

I think that the right hon. Lady referred to the National Care Homes Association. It welcomes the Government's commitment to national standards and notes, in its response to "Fit for the Future", the importance for the public of knowing the minimum level of service that they can expect to be provided. The Independent Healthcare Association also welcomes the principle of national standards and notes that many of those proposed are standard practice already. Counsel and Care, another major organisation, welcomes the establishment of national standards as part of the determination to modernise social services and engender confidence for older people and their relatives in the home that they have chosen.

The consultation document "Fit for the Future" sets out the proposed standards of the Centre for Policy on Ageing for older people in residential and nursing care homes. It was sent to all major interested organisations on 8 September and has been widely circulated. The right hon. Lady correctly referred to some of our earlier problems with distributing the document. We eventually produced 10,000 copies of it, distributed it widely and also exended the consultation period by six weeks. I shall come to the consultation responses later. It turned out to be one of the largest consultation exercises that the Department of Health has organised for a long time. We took great efforts, as the right hon. Lady will be aware from her time as a Minister, to ensure that everyone with an opinion and an interest in this subject could comment on the proposals.

The proposed standards are aimed at promoting better quality care and helping to prevent abuse by grounding practice in the important principles of dignity, choice and respect. Older people and other adults in residential care are especially vulnerable to abuse and poor practice because of their physical and mental conditions. The proposed standards in "Fit for the Future" seek to protect residents more effectively in a number of ways.

First, they will guarantee residents access for the first time to an effective complaints procedure, which will be monitored by inspectors who will have the power to investigate unresolved complaints and take any necessary remedial aetion. Secondly, the standards will ensure that vulnerable people are cared for by reliable and trustworthy staff who have been carefully recruited and properly trained to do this difficult and sensitive job. Often at present, inspectors find that staff have been casually employed and are engaged in providing personal, intimate care—sometimes, sadly, with no check on their suitability and no induction or training. That is not acceptable.

The standards will ensure that residents have the right to choose the way in which they live their lives, as do you or I, Mr. Deputy Speaker—for example, when they get up or go to bed, what they would like to eat, when their relatives can visit and so on, all the details of life that go to make up one's sense of identity and individualism.

The consultation period for "Fit for the Future", as the right hon. Lady said, ended on 21 January. We have received more than 1,400 responses to the consultation document, which provoked a large response from care provider organisations and individual care providers. While there is widespread support for most of the standards proposed, it is clear that there is real concern about some of them. In particular, the physical standards, such as room size, and standards on staffing have attracted criticism from some sectors of the care industry and certain parts of the country. Again, the righ hon. Lady referred to her concerns in that regard as well. The varying levels of concern illustrate graphically the current variation in standards across the country.

We are determined to set standards that promote better quality care, but they must be realistic and affordable. We do not intend to impose unreasonable or heavy financial burdens on providers and we intend to keep the number of enforceable standards to a minimum.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): The responses to the extended period of consultation on "Fit for the Future" will be important to inform the debate on the Care Standards Bill, which is being discussed in the other place. Will the Government publish the findings of that consultation? If so, will they do so by the time the Bill is debated in this House?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for making that point. I intend to refer to it. The document "Fit for the Future" identified as many as 260 possible national minimum standards. It is highly unlikely that we shall need as many as 260. Some of the proposed standards are unnecessary and may have only a marginal impact on promoting good-quality care, which must be the main purpose of the entire exercise. I cannot specify today which standards we shall adopt because we are still considering the matter. We have 1,400 responses to go through and the consultation period expired only on 21 January.

I hope that I can give the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk an idea of our initial thinking on two of the issues to which she referred. I refer first to staffing. I confirm that we do not accept that fixed ratios are the best means of specifying the number of qualified nurses who should be employed in nursing homes. That should relate instead to the assessed needs of the residents in each home at any one time and we are considering what models of assessment should be recognised by the commission for that purpose. Similarly, we are considering how nursing needs are defined initially, so that staffing levels can be best set accurately and realistically. Nor am I convinced that ancillary staffing levels, including catering and domestic staff, should be specified by fixed ratios. Instead, they should take account of the degree of efficiency and effectiveness shown by operators in managing such tasks, as observed in the outcome of the quality of the care that is provided.

As the right hon. Lady would expect, we are considering carefully the standards concerned with the physical characteristics of a home. In doing so, we must take account of the high levels of physical frailty of many older people when they enter residential and nursing homes. Room size is an important aspect of the quality of life. Hon. Members have only to think about the significance to them of their own home and work environments to know the importance of a minimum standard of space. It is also an important aspect of safety for staff and residents, when special aids and adaptations for lifting and handling must be used.

While I cannot yet make an announcement, I can assure right hon. and hon. Members that we do not intend to impose on existing providers physical standards that are not already being met by their competitors. They will be standards that they should be able to meet over time. I can also announce today that any requirement to meet new standards on room sizes in the future will apply only after the end of the transitional period and not, for example, on the sale or transfer of an existing home to a new owner.

None of the standards will be implemented until at least 2002 when the National Care Standards Commission takes on its regulatory role. Some standards, particularly the more challenging and those relating to the physical environment of a care home will not be introduced until some time after the commission has started its work in 2002. In deciding on the time scale for introducing the finalised standards, we will ensure that providers are given sufficient time to meet those requirements. We aim to publish the finalised standards and their implementation timetable later this year. But—to respond to the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman)—I intend to make an announcement about room sizes during the spring, which may be of use to those who debate the Bill in Committee.

The right hon. Lady alluded to other issues to which I shall not have time to respond fully. Naturally, I stand ready at any time to discuss such matters in greater detail with the right hon. Lady, who has certainly shown that she has a sound grasp of the subject. She referred to Lion House in Downham Market in her constituency. It is unfortunate that people have read the standards in "Fit for the Future" and assumed that they will be the final minimum standards. I have tried to make it clear today that that is not the case. In any event, the standards could not apply until after the National Care Standards Commission is set up in 2002. There will then have to be a transitional period before some of the more demanding standards could realistically be implemented. We are talking about years, not weeks or months. Decisions by inspection units to move to adopting those standards now or by care home owners to change the ownership of or close a home, taken simply on the basis of the consultation document, would be premature. We will respond fully to the concerns expressed.

Jazz

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Before I call the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) to speak on the subject of support for jazz, I hope that I may be permitted to say what a pleasure it is to welcome the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to respond to the debate.

12 noon

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North): I am most grateful and pleased to have this opportunity to speak on behalf of jazz in our country, with its audience of millions and its wonderful musicians. Jazz is a significant contributor to the world of the arts and, as a lover of jazz and a former musician, I want jazz to prosper and grow and to bring its joys to many present and future generations.

Jazz has a vigour and life of its own but, like virtually all art through the ages, it requires additional support to reach its full potential to sustain and nurture its musicians and audience and to make a full contribution to our world. Jazz requires financial support and benign governmental sustenance. Art requires subsidy, and always has. Historically, religious institutions, monarchs, aristocrats, the wealthy and the corporate world have always realised that if one wants to see and hear the best, that costs. Great architecture, craftsmanship, visual art and music have to some extent always been patronised, sponsored and subsidised; so it has to be with jazz.

In a democratic age, it is right for the state to subsidise the arts. The arts should receive more support in our country than they do at present if they are to be for the many and not the few. Within the arts family, underfunded as it is, jazz is a poor relation. Jazz needs and deserves support, as a legitimate and distinct art form, along with opera, the visual arts, theatre and cinema. Our museums and art galleries are publicly financed; were they not, much art would be the preserve of the rich. Our public libraries have also brought literature to countless millions. Jazz receives some public funding but it is too little and sometimes derisory.

I should perhaps declare an interest, as secretary of the all-party parliamentary jazz appreciation group, which has some illustrious members, including the Deputy Prime Minister, the previous Chancellor of the Exchequer, as well as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I am also a member of the all-party opera group, a supporter of the Globe theatre and was, in my youth, a modest performer of Mozart. I therefore speak for jazz within a broader arts perspective. Jazz does not have its fair share of the arts budget, which is itself too small, although I should point out that I appreciate and admire my right hon. Friend for his own love of the arts and acknowledge that he operates within certain constraints.

My case for jazz needs some facts and statistics to support it and I am indebted to Jazz Services Ltd. for providing much background information for this debate. That organisation was formed 16 years ago to promote the growth and development of jazz and is funded by the Arts Council of England. Musicians throughout the country play jazz. Many UK jazz musicians have developed international reputations and have committed their works to recordings that are eagerly sought by a worldwide audience. No major city in the UK is without a jazz scene. Mature musicians of established reputation and young musicians, many with great flair and originality, seek a serious audience who can understand and enjoy their music. They perform in a variety of settings: concert halls, arts centres, village halls, ballrooms, restaurants, coffee houses and public houses. Every summer there is a profusion of jazz festivals all over the country, many attracting some of the finest jazz musicians in the world.

One of the features of the British jazz audience is its size—some 3 million people patronise such events and four to five times as many again have a definable interest in jazz. It is interesting that the jazz audience is very much the same as that for opera.

The prime characteristics of a jazz audience at a typical small-scale venue are that it would have a 3:2 ratio of males to females, 70 per cent. of the audience would be aged between 16 and 35, 30 per cent. would be full-time students, and 50 per cent. would be from the ABC1 social groupings. Of course, that means that 50 per cent. would be from the C2, D and E groupings, which means that jazz has a wide appeal.

From 1993, Jazz Services Ltd. has advocated increased public support for jazz in the United Kingdom. The jazz on a shoestring campaign was launched in 1995, and an early-day motion about it attracted the support of more than 100 Members. A 10,000-signature petition in support of the campaign was presented to the then chairman of the Arts Council of England, Lord Gowrie, by Humphrey Lyttleton, John Dankworth and my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), who organised the petition.

Jazz Services Ltd. made representations to the then National Heritage Committee, the first report of which on the funding of the performing and visual arts in February 1996 stated:

"We do not believe that the different level of overheads in the performance of jazz and opera explains the massive discrepancy between the subsidy per member of the audience in the two forms of music; the Arts Council should look again at the funding of live jazz played by British musicians, in particular the National Youth Jazz Orchestra"—

NYJO—

"and local youth jazz orchestras".

NYJO is a jewel in our national musical crown and a marvellous training ground for hundreds of young musicians over the years. This year, NYJO has lost vital sponsorship funding, and has been offered an additional £500 by the Arts Council. That is an example of the derisory funding that I mentioned earlier, and is indicative of the regard in which jazz is held by some in the arts establishment.

In 1999–2000, Arts Council subsidy per attendee for jazz is 25p. For classical music, it is £2.26, and for opera, £12.75, which is 51 times the subsidy for jazz. I fully support the opera subsidy. I do not want to rob Pavarotti to pay Courtney Pine, but jazz deserves more. I am sad to say that the jazz subsidy has fallen by 4p per head since 1996–97, while opera funding has increased by 52p per head.

If we add Arts Council funding to support for jazz from the regional arts boards, the spending in 1997–98 of £1.9 million fell to a budget for this year of £1 million, which is in round terms a cut of more than 40 per cent. That is shabby by any standards. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will try to secure better funding for jazz.

Another restriction on the performance and accessibility of jazz is the so-called two-in-a-bar rule, which means that only two musicians can play in licensed premises without a public entertainment licence. That denies employment opportunities to jazz musicians. Many styles of music suffer from the rule, but jazz is hit especially hard. Licensing is not the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but I hope that he can use his influence with fellow Ministers to seek the necessary legislative change. I understand from the Musicians Union that the Government have accepted the argument for change, and I look forward to proposals in the forthcoming White Paper.

The jazz community congratulates the Government on their new deal for musicians, which is aimed at getting young musicians off the dole. The success of the project depends on young musicians being able to form and join bands and find venues in which to play. Pubs, clubs and restaurants are key, and 100,000 such venues are restricted by law to two musicians in a bar. Even if 10 per cent. became additional venues, that would mean 10,000 more places in which jazz groups could play.

I must conclude, but I would like to say more about jazz in other spheres, such as education and the media, and the need to make jazz more available to all from a young age. Appreciation of all arts depends to some extent on early familiarity. Britain is an intensely musical nation, bursting with talent, and in jazz we are second only to the USA. We have produced many world-class musicians as well as millions of discerning listeners. We have a proud jazz tradition and stunningly good young musicians, but jazz needs and deserves more support from Government.

Jazz was given to the world by black Americans, but is now an international multicultural music that knows no class boundaries and is a force for friendship. Like my political party, it has recently completed its first century, and promises more joy and exhilaration in the new millennium. I hope that the Government can show how much pride we have in Britain's great jazz tradition with more support for jazz at every level for the future.

I have often spoken about jazz in the past, but this is the first occasion on which I have been unable to accompany my talk with recorded musical contributions. That is a shame because jazz can, and does, speak for itself, and I have seen many in my audiences over the years whose eyes have shown that they have fallen under the spell of great music. My children grew up to the sounds of jazz and are as at home with Count Basie as they are with the Beatles or J.S. Bach. I would like everyone to have such choices and to experience the full richness that all music, including jazz, has to offer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) I inform hon. Members that he has, as is proper, received the permission of the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) and the Secretary of State to participate in the debate.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): It would be remiss of me not to speak in the debate, as I am the chairman of the all-party jazz appreciation group and something of a fanatic in my pursuit of the jazz medium. I must compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) for obtaining the debate and for the business like way in which he has approached his role in the jazz appreciation group. He has not only encouraged people to listen to the medium and to appreciate the wide diversity and tremendous colour of the jazz scene, but worked generally on behalf of jazz.

Sadly, this is not a good time for the funding of the jazz world. I am also a member of the all-party opera group, and was the founding secretary of the Scottish opera group, which contributed to the solution that saved Scottish opera a few years ago. We have had the aid of some important people, including Lady Smith, the widow of the former Labour leader, who is very active in that group.

I must correct my hon. Friend on one point. Believe it or not, the Belgians not the Americans, gave us the saxophone. A gentleman called Dr. Sax invented the saxophone as a marching instrument for military bands; obviously it lends itself to being carried and played. Thank goodness—

Mr. Hopkins: I know that very well. The Americans gave the world jazz and taught it how to play the saxophone properly.

Mr. Connarty: Indeed, I was going to pay a compliment to one Ornette Coleman, who was probably the first practitioner of jazz and bebop as we know it. He was sacked from some big swing bands that liked a nice rhythm and did not like him to go off and freelance as he did, although that has of course become the stock of most good jazz concerts.

I was thinking about this debate on Saturday when I went to hear the Scottish National Jazz Orchestra, which is led by Tommy Smith, a young boy from an impoverished background in Edinburgh. He was encouraged at the age of 12 to take up the saxophone at the Wester Hails community centre; he went on to Berklee and now writes some of the best pieces. Joe Lovano, who is of European extraction but plays in New York, played with him on Saturday night. They performed a beautiful, inspirational piece called "Torah", which was written by Tommy Smith and which is based on the first three books of the Bible. To those who turn up their noses at jazz, as something that happens in bars, I can say that the performance matched anything in the classical field.

However, I want to speak about the crisis that affects NYJO. We must compliment people such as Bill Ashton, who has kept NYJO alive by begging and seeking sponsorship for 25 to 30 years. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North mentioned the massive loss of sponsorship.

UNISON has kept NYJO on the road for the past three years by giving it £30,000, which is remarkable for a trade union. The union also gives substantial sponsorship to a brass band in my constituency, the former Kinneil colliery band. Clearly, it has supported a wide range of music on behalf of its members and has been fundamental to keeping NYJO alive.

NYJO now has a serious problem that £500 from the Arts Council will not solve. We must look seriously at an orchestra that has been the breeding ground for some of the best young jazz musicians—now probably mature jazz musicians—around the world. I hope that the Minister will give particular consideration to the plight of NYJO.

I have always found it strange that Humphrey Lyttleton, one of the great founders of British jazz, is not knighted—in fact, he is not even a lord. It is about time we had people to join John Dankworth in the pantheon of jazz. I hope that the Minister is listening. Bill Ashton may also deserve a small honour for his sterling work on behalf of jazz.

Those matters are important. By giving not only cash but support, the Government show that they appreciate the cultural diversity encouraged by people who lead orchestras such as the Strathclyde youth orchestra, or the school orchestras with many brass players who play jazz. Clearly, we can do a lot through education. If we could recognise some of the work of individuals, we could put jazz on a respectable footing. I hope that the two-in-a-bar rule will change. That would be important as it would provide 10,000 new venues. I also hope that the Minister will seriously consider encouraging the Arts Council to recognise jazz. Perhaps he might think of using some form of direct funding. Jazz has certainly enhanced my life.

I have met young people in London who used to come to my home, such as Stephen Hamilton, a young jazz pianist who has played on many CDs that have been released in Britain and who used to play the old battered piano in my front room. Sadly, I have to say that my son, a software engineer in London, earns three times as much in a year as he does. Stephen could clearly have done that job, but he chose to pursue his love for jazz instead. He is a great talent, but his annual takings do not add up to a good salary, and he receives only slightly more than the average wage, because of what he calls his art. We can support him only by giving money to that art to show that we recognise his giving, and the giving of many talented jazz players in Britain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that I speak on behalf of all hon. Members when I say how grateful we are to the Secretary of State for coming to give encouragement to debates in Westminster Hall, and for finding time to reply to this debate on jazz. His action is a great fillip.

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Chris Smith): I am delighted to be here today, because it is fascinating to see for the first time the proceedings in Westminister Hall, which are eminently more civilised than those in the Chamber. Furthermore, jazz is of great importance, and by replying in person I want to show the significance that I attach to it.

I must congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) on his choice of tie, which is extremely appropriate, because it is the parliamentary jazz group's tie. It is a pleasure to listen to my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty), who had a distinguised year as parliamentary private secretary to my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) when he served as a Minister of State in my Department. It was a pleasure to work closely with my hon. Friend during that period.

I have listened carefully to what my hon. Friends have said. The starting point has to be that it is important to recognise that the funding system reflects the diversity of musical genres, whether they be jazz, folk, African-Caribbean, early music or any of the more traditional styles that have been supported from public funds. It is also important that those funds help to support and generate a great diversity of audiences, because the same audience does not appreciate all types of music.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North is aware, the arts are subsidised using the arm's-length principle. Decisions on funding for individual art forms or organisations are taken by those with the relevant expertise in the Arts Council of England or in the regional arts boards. It is important that Ministers do not intervene directly in those decisions. The Government should set the framework within which arts funding operates. Support for the full diversity of music in England is an important principle. However, decisions about grants to particular organisations, and even the balance between different genres of artistic activity, must be for the Arts Council and, increasingly, the RABs, to which much decision making is rightly being devolved. The Arts Council and the RABs include experts who can make decisions about particular arts organisations. Politicians and civil servants simply do not have that expertise. It is important to set the principle, which must be that jazz deserves good support from the public funding system.

Before I discuss funding, I shall touch briefly on the public entertainment licensing regulations to which my hon. Friends the Members for Luton, North and for Falkirk, East referred, and in particular the two-in-a-bar rule. I am pleased to say that, together with colleagues in other Departments, especially the Home Office, we are actively reviewing the constraints that the licensing system places on musical performance in such venues, and I hope that in due course we shall be able to introduce deregulatory measures to assist the broad picture.

I cannot deny that opera and classical music account for the bulk of Arts Council funding. The statistics that my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North cited speak for themselves. That is perhaps not surprising given the nature of both art forms. Opera and classical music cost more than other forms of music. They employ large numbers of people, such as musicians, choruses, designers, riggers and technicians, for example, to achieve their effects. In addition, the cost of hiring soloists is often dictated by the international market.

Classical music has a history of private patronage, which translated in the post-war era into public subsidy, which continues to this day. Jazz, on the other hand, has a different heritage. It is rooted in the musical traditions of Afro-Caribbean Americans. West African and black folk music forms developed in the Americas.

The word "jazz" has a variety of meanings, encompassing a broad and changing stream of styles. Within those styles, each jazz performance represents an original and largely spontaneous creation, as an essential element of jazz is improvisation. Jazz music is a unique art form. It stands alone in its use of improvisatory practices as the focal point of the music. It provides great scope for individuality and creativity. Its vitality stems from the spontaneity of the improvising musician.

In its turn, jazz has influenced the development of new styles of popular music and the work of symphonic composers. The interaction of different styles and genres of music is one of the most welcome developments in modern musical tradition. We are witnessing the fusing of different traditions and types of creativity, which is extremely welcome.

Subsidy acts as investment, provides continuity, allows artistic risks, sustains the best of tradition, develops new talent and feeds, but does not replace, the commercial entertainment economy. That is not to say that jazz should not be supported from the public purse; it must be. It would struggle without that support. However, a mixture of funding sources is appropriate for jazz, which is an important part of the UK contemporary music scene.

No one would doubt the existence of a jazz economy, as evidenced by the number of private sector jazz clubs, concerts, festivals, dedicated record labels and, indeed, in Jazz FM, a commercial radio station specifically devoted to jazz. The Arts Council's funding for jazz is currently about £1 million in grant in aid, which includes support from the new audiences fund. Jazz has also benefited from lottery funding, and is a key part of the work of the National Foundation for Youth Music, an organisation that we established, with £30 million over three years of lottery support from the Arts Council of England, and which is designed to support all types of musical development and activity, including jazz, among young people. As my hon. Friend mentioned, the new deal for young musicians, enabling people who are otherwise unemployed to develop their musical skills and experience, is particularly appropriate for young jazz musicians.

In addition, awards have been made to organisations that are developing the jazz musicians and audiences of tomorrow. JazzDev, for example, formed over 15 years ago to promote the growth and development of jazz in the UK and primarily funded by the Arts Council of England, works closely with other UK organisations to give voice to jazz. JazzDev has recently been awarded money from the new audiences fund to work with four arts marketing agencies in Leeds, Birmingham, Manchester and Liverpool on measurable exercises to increase arts audiences across all sectors, including jazz. JazzDev's grant in aid increased by 8.5 per cent. this year and will increase by 5 per cent. in the next financial year.

My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North mentioned the work of the National Youth Jazz Orchestra. I am pleased to tell him that, after an admittedly tiny increase in funding in the current financial year, that orchestra will receive a 24.4 per cent. increase in 2001–02. The grants of the Arts Council of England to the English regional arts boards will in 2000–01 be nearly 20 per cent. higher than in the current financial year. The regional arts boards are free to develop music policies appropriate to their different regional contexts and audience needs. Many jazz organisations will look to those boards over the coming months to use some of their substantially increased funding, which is designed to increase support for jazz. Money is available, much of it through the RABS, for new and not so new programmes which are designed to benefit applicants from outside the classical mainstream.

The Arts Council of England published its policy for the support of jazz in November 1996 and both it and the RABs remain fully committed to its recommendations. Much has been done since that report, but much remains to be done. My hon. Friends have today done us a great service in reminding us of that. We have encouraged the Arts Council to reform itself and the funding system it operates. Gerry Robinson as chairman and Peter Hewitt as chief executive of that body have achieved much in the past two years. There is still much to do, however.

The Arts Council is keen to ensure that all forms of art and music receive support and funding, but it must make the final decisions; I cannot do so. I recommend that both my hon. Friends and all in the jazz constituency maintain their dialogue with the Arts Council, particularly with the RABs. They should point firmly to the principle that we have established throughout the past two and a half years that diverse musical types and activities deserve support and should give as much encouragement as possible to those parts of the funding system that rightfully ensure that jazz is supported and continues to play a major part in the musical and artistic life of this country.

Legal Aid

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I am pleased to secure the debate as a way of highlighting an issue that has been brought to my attention by several constituents. I am not, nor have I ever been, a lawyer, so I seek the Committee's indulgence if I use wrong legal aid terms. Several cases have been brought to my attention by people who believe that those taking action against them are doing so on the basis of legal aid funding that has been secured fraudulently, and I shall refer to one such case. I accept that the Minister cannot address the specific details of the case as it is still on-going. I am looking for a general response to this and similar cases.

I hope that the Government will say that they are serious about investigating claims of fraud in the system and will offer some encouragement to my constituent that his experience will not be repeated. I am sure that many other hon. Members have had similar experiences in their surgeries of listening to the frustration felt by people who are paying for their own costs while defending themselves against someone whom they believe is receiving legal aid through misrepresentation or trying to change the circumstances of the case to take advantage of loopholes.

The frustration to which I refer comes from several features of the operation of the system. First, it often appears to people that the Legal Aid Board does not act swiftly or effectively to take legal aid away from claimants when evidence is produced that suggests that their claim is ineligible. Secondly, the sort of evidence that must be produced to prove that someone's claim is invalid seems to go well beyond that which is required in other areas of means-tested public funds. Thirdly, I draw attention to the lack of feedback to the complainant about what action has followed the allegations. The fact that the law often requires that there is no feedback certainly compounds the frustration felt by people in such situations. The legal protection against revealing information is understandable and I shall not challenge that in this debate. I shall focus instead on the delay and the ineffectiveness of the system for responding to the allegations that someone is ineligible for legal aid.

A case was brought to my attention by Mr. Barry Whitworth, the chairman of T. W. Ward Machinery Ltd. in Sheffield. It concerns a former director and shareholder, Mr. William Gerrard. The case has a long history; it was raised with my predecessor before the 1997 general election and it deals with matters that go back about 14 years to 1986. In 1995, my constituent wrote a letter to the then Lord Chancellor which opened with the comment that he believed that the Lord Chancellor had expressed concern at how legal aid was being administered and that reforms were in prospect. The Government may be able to claim that some reforms have been made since then, although there may be a dispute about their nature. However, things have certainly moved on.

Mr. Whitworth said that his small company and its employees were being seriously threatened by what he believed to be a shocking and blatant abuse of the legal aid system. A former director and shareholder was dismissed from employment with the company in November 1986. He had failed on three occasions through court proceedings with claims against the company. He then obtained a legal aid certificate with which to go to the appeal court to pursue the claims further. My constituent believed that his objective was, and always had been, to cause as much aggravation and cost to the company because of the circumstances of the dismissal. He cited as evidence in support of that view the fact that the individual had turned down several attempts to settle the claim out of court.

My constituent accepted that there was a valid dispute and had attempted to settle it. He believed, however, that the individual continued to pursue the case because he wished to continue to cause aggravation to the company against which he felt some grievance. My constituent cites as primary evidence for his belief that the individual should not have had a legal aid certificate the fact that the individual was operating as a machine tool dealer, which was a similar line of business to his own. He believed that the individual obtained the legal aid certificate by putting his company into receivership and then continuing with what was effectively the same business from the same premises with the same stock, but had moved it into his wife's name with only a minor change of trading identity. My constituent believed that that was a technique to obtain significant legal costs.

My constituent believed that the individual was enjoying a reasonable life style, earning in excess of £50,000 a year, that he had stock in his warehouse with a retail value of more than £500,000 and that he was advertising machinery with a stock value in excess of £1 million. He had evidence that the person involved was holidaying in places such as Australia and New Zealand, and felt that that would be sufficient to disqualify him under the constraints of the legal aid system, which requires that people should be in need before having access to public funds. My constituent felt as though he had a gun to his head in relation to the court proceedings, while the other person involved had a blank cheque to underwrite his ability to continue the court case well beyond what my constituent thought reasonable.

The Legal Aid Board's reponse took three months to arrive. My constituent made his claims in December 1995, and in February 1996 he received a letter from the policy and secretariat of the Legal Aid Board that detailed the relevant considerations. The letter informed my constituent that section 38 of the Legal Aid Act 1988 prevents the disclosure of information and said that the information supplied to the Cardiff area office, where the application had been made, met the statutory tests and that the Benefits Agency had determined that the assisted person was financially eligible for legal aid.

My constituent thought that strange, given his information. He supplied the information that I cited from the original letter about why the person involved should be considered ineligible, and was told that it would be sent to the Benefits Agency's legal aid assessment office in Preston. He was assured that an investigation would take place and that a report would be made on the investigation. No response arrived, but in August 1996 my constituent was informed that the legal aid certificate had been revoked for other reasons to which he would not be privy. However, by 4 September 1996, the legal aid had been reinstated and the case was due to resume. My constituent could not be told why.

My constituent's solicitors expressed their anger at that turn of events, which they felt was highly inappropriate and placed my constituent in a difficult position. They wrote to the Legal Aid Board's legal department, saying that the net effect of the decision to revoke the certificate and subsequently reinstate it was that substantial work done over the years by the first firm of solicitors would be for nought, and that further public funds would be used to employ a second firm of solicitors to spend many working days reading through the boxes of papers at a cost of thousands of pounds. They pointed out:

"All this is done to benefit a . . . litigant who has turned down a payment into Court made on commercial terms and who openly leads a quite extravagant lifestyle" and clearly had access to funds. My constituent's solicitors felt that that was not an appropriate use of legal aid funds, and made significant representations on that basis.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that his constituent in Sheffield is not alone in suffering from a lack of proper scrutiny and accountability in the allocation of public funds? I pay tribute to the Reading Chronicle, which has assisted in exposing the lack of scrutiny in the Reading legal aid office.

Mr. Allan: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for alluding to the breadth of the problem. Many hon. Members will have had similar experiences. I know that she has a constituency interest in tackling the problem. I hope that anyone who works in the legal aid system will be able to take action and deal effectively with such matters in future.

The saga of my constituent continued throughout 1997. In September 1997, my constituent's solicitors finally received a response to their original allegations of December 1995 about the claimant's merits. The letter acknowledges the fact that the response was delayed. It notes that the board failed to inform my constituent's solicitors of the conclusion of its investigations. It contains an apology, made on behalf of the board, for that error and for any inconvenience caused. However, the response makes it clear that, having investigated the claims that had been made, the information did not materially affect the grant of legal aid. Legal aid was therefore continued to support the appeal even after the information had been supplied. The letter confirmed that my constituent could not be informed of the reasons for the decision, and that litigation was due to continue following that award. I hope that the Minister will deal with the provision of timely information by the Legal Aid Board, as that is an especially disturbing aspect of the case. My constituent has been trying to run a business and plan his legal costs, and it has been difficult to obtain information about what was happening.

In February 1999, my constituent contacted me again to express his ongoing frustration that the situation had still not been resolved. He informed me that he was "appalled to hear from the news this morning that the auditors for the Legal Aid Board have qualified their accounts for the seventh year and state that no less than 13 per cent. of recipients of legal aid are not qualified to receive their support."

I would be interested to hear the Minister's response to that. All hon. Members can imagine my constituent's frustration on reading that in his daily paper when he felt that the person against whom he was conducting his legal business should have fallen into such a category. He said that the continuing scandal was unacceptable bearing in mind that the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Government had promised to deal with any corruption and ability to defraud the system. A new selection of papers that he sent to me made it clear that his business was suffering because of his problems. He had lost count of the number of legal firms that had represented his opponent during the 13 years, and said that his opponent was able to continue only because of the legal aid system's support. He again said that he believed that the individual had means and continued to run a machine tool business. Anyone in the trade has access to information about other people in it, and he is sure that the individual is carrying on a substantial business.

I wrote to the Lord Chancellor's Department in response to my constituent's letter and received an explanation of the situation and some qualifications of it. I sent it to my constituent, who was disturbed to read that "To qualify financially, an applicant's disposable means must be within certain limits. These are currently £7,777 per annum for income and £6,750 for capital."

My constituent felt that the capital limit might be exceeded, in view of the representations that he had made about the business holding £500,000 of goods. He sent me several advertisements and the accounts for Severn Machine Tools Ltd., with which he believed that the claimant was involved. Advertisements from magazines such as Machinery Market in September 1988 and January 2000 set out a catalogue of valuable equipment that my constituent believes is in the control of the individual against whom he is claiming. He again sent me company accounts for the firm to show me that it had substantial assets that he believed should qualify.

Action was taken by the Legal Aid Board in 1999 to remove the legal aid certificate from Mr. Gerrard, presumably based on information that my constituent supplied about the means . My constituent became even angrier when he found that mistakes were made in that process, and his frustration was understandable. A letter from the Legal Aid Board in November 1999 explained the situation. It said that "Mr. Gerrard ceased to receive legal aid on 20 April when his legal aid certificate was revoked", but it could not give

"any further information . . . due to the provisions of Section 38 of the Legal Aid Act".

It states that an individual can appeal, and that therefore a hearing took place

"on 5 August 1999 when the Area Committee resolved to dismiss the appeal and to confirm the revocation of the certificate. However . . . regrettably an administrative error was found in the appeals process necessitating the reinstatement of Mr. Gerrard's certificate. However, this office is still actively investigating the matters".

[Mr. Allan]

There was a further period of uncertainty. To its credit, the Legal Aid Board took the opportunity to apologise to my constituent

"for the unfortunate administrative error" and to assure him that

"matters . . . are being actively considered . . . and a final decision should be available shortly".

However, the administrative error allowed further adjournments of the case, and while the uncertainty remained my constituent continued to incur legal costs because his solicitor had to deal with the situation.

I close with a final letter from my constituent written in January this year. He sent me further documentation, told me about the catalogue of errors and mismanagement and then explained again his situation by saying that he is "in limbo whilst the system appears to provide little or nothing in the way of support or sympathy of any kind for our case whilst clearly bending over backwards to help this individual".

He again sent me the latest company advertisement which, as usual, involves several million pounds of machine tools and equipment in a business with which he believes the individual is involved. My constituent feels that he is in limbo and that the case needs to be resolved.

I have had other cases that give me cause for concern, where what I believe to be credible allegations of fraud do not seem to be properly followed up. In particular, spouses or partners are used in such fraud; in some cases, spouses are said to hold assets and in others it is denied that someone is a partner where doing so provides a good loophole. I have had a case of someone who told the Legal Aid Board that the house he lived in, the car he drove and everything else belonged to his landlady with whom he had no personal relationship; he was just a lodger who paid rent. Yet I was given other information to suggest that there was a relationship. I question whether the Benefits Agency would decide in such circumstances to pursue the individual to see whether he was being supported and had access to assets because of a relationship.

I hope that the Minister will state that the Government are committed to a fair legal aid system. I do not wish the scope of legal aid to be too restricted because legal aid is essential for some people to obtain access to the legal system and claim their rights under the law. However, I wish to see it available to the genuinely deserving, if one can use that phrase—those who are otherwise too poor to go to court. I wish the Legal Aid Board to act vigorously to ensure that that is the case when making grants of legal aid. I look forward to a positive response from the Minister to the concerns that I have raised about the general issues of my constituent's case.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. David Lock): I congratulate the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) on securing the debate and thank him for raising the matter today. I was grateful to hear about the problems that he perceives in the legal aid scheme. As he knows, the Government take welfare fraud extremely seriously and are determined to tackle it in any form, including legal aid.

As the hon. Gentleman said, at the moment people are entitled to receive legal aid only if they qualify financially and if their case has enough merit to warrant it. It is vital that public funds are not wasted by being committed to weak or trivial cases, when the money could be better used elsewhere. The Legal Aid Board is acutely aware that granting legal aid has important consequences for both sides. It gives one party the access to justice that he needs and otherwise might not get, but at the same time it can greatly affect the balance of power in a case. The board therefore takes very seriously both the process of granting legal aid and the requirement to keep people's legal aid under review.

I shall briefly address the points raised about the individual case. As the hon. Gentleman said, legal aid was granted only in October 1996, to support an application to the Court of Appeal. Mr. Gerrard was a director, [illegible]reholder and employee of T. W. Ward Machinery Ltd. and his case against the company began in October 1986. Legal aid was granted only in December 1994 when the case went to appeal. The Court of Appeal allowed that appeal and as a result Mr. Gerrard was granted a full civil legal aid certificate, following his success at the Court of Appeal. In August 1996, following representations from T. W. Ward's solicitors about the merits of Mr. Gerrard's case, the area office decided to discharge his certificate. Mr. Gerrard appealed to the independent area committee, which reinstated his certificate.

Such cases will not get legal aid in future. Publicly funded help needs to be focused on cases where substantial but limited resources can do the most good. So some types of case will come out of the scheme altogether—including business cases. The Government do not believe that those warrant a share of the limited funding that will be available. However, a suitable alternative exists, in the form of conditional fee agreements, that still gives access to justice. The Government have recently said that the rules will change in April to allow insurance premiums and the success fee to be recoverable, thus making a conditional fee agreement a real possibility in the type of cases that we are discussing. Someone facing a conditional fee agreement, particularly backed by an insurance policy, will be able to litigate, confident that if he successfully defeats the claim, a fund exists against which the costs of meeting the litigation can be claimed.

The Legal Aid Board took over responsibility from the Benefits Agency for means assessment during 1997. The first time that it considered the representations in the case was in October 1998. The case was referred to the newly set up special investigations unit in December. The unit investigated the matter promptly and Mr. Gerrard's certificate was embargoed in March 1999 and then revoked in April. I accept, as the hon. Gentleman said, that there were some procedural errors during the revocation progress, but I stress that the embargo remains in force so that Mr. Gerrard's solicitors have not been able to take his case further on legal aid.

Mr. Gerrard has appealed, so I cannot say any more about the status of his certificate. That is a matter for the independent board. At the time of his original application, responsibility for means assessment in civil legal aid cases lay with the Benefits Agency. During 1997, the task was transferred to the Legal Aid Board and a special investigations unit was set up to deal with applications from people with particularly complex means. The SIU carries out a thorough investigation when the applicant has complex finances and perhaps an aura of wealth. Its aim is to detect any non-disclosure of assets and to provide an accurate means assessment in accordance with the legal aid regulations.

I shall refer to two matters in passing. Transferring assets to one's spouse will not assist a legal aid application because, rightly, the regulations require applicants to disclose the assets both of themselves and their spouses. I can say to the hon. Gentleman that, if anyone is considering transferring the yacht, the business, the shares and the pension fund to his spouse, it will not do any good. Secondly, he rightly referred to the qualification on the Legal Aid Board's accounts. That came about because the category of people that the auditors could not accept as eligible arose in criminal cases when legal aid is granted by the court, not in civil cases when legal aid is granted on evidence provided by the applicant's solicitor.

However, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that, through the recovery of defence cost orders provisions that will come in force later this year, the issue of who is or who is not eligible for legal aid in criminal cases and how proper contribution is obtained from those who have assets for their criminal defence will be dealt with properly. We are confident that the new system will meet many of the objections raised about the previous system.

The hon. Gentleman referred to representations. Last year, the board received 5,500 representations relating to means. That compares with more than 6,000 in the previous year. I expect the figures for the present year to show a further reduction as, for the first half of the year, only 2,292 were received. Merits representation also show a slight decrease. The majority of representations are considered by the board's area offices. Last year, 68 per cent. of them led to no change in the certificate. Of those that did result in a change, the most likely outcome was either discharge or revocation, which was 28 per cent. of the total.

In October 1998, new guidance was issued that aimed to ensure that all claims are dealt with within three months of receipt of representations. When there are complex financial circumstances to investigate, it may take longer, but the aim is to respond within three months.

Merits challenges raise particular difficulties. I have already mentioned the effect that the granting of legal aid has on the power structure betwen the parties in a case. People with legal aid have protection against paying costs that private clients do not enjoy. Even though legal aid costs are carefully controlled, they can still have a daunting effect on the other party to the litigation. The board takes representations seriously and considers them carefully.

Often at the core of representations are disputes over the facts that are a matter for the court to try. It is not for the board to try those issues, nor can it refuse or discharge legal aid purely because the other side would be put in a difficult financial position if legal aid were continued. Its role is to decide whether the applicant has a good case to put before the court, one that a reasonable person of moderate means woud back with his or her own money.

The board is also conscious that advice about the merits of a case comes from the applicant's solicitor or barrister. Lawyers owe duties both to the client and to the legal aid fund, and those duties can conflict. We accept that there may be a temptation for solicitors to overstate the merits of an applicant's case. That can be done in an effort to improve the cleint's bargaining positon or because the solicitor wishes to see the case progress and knows that, if the board is advised that the case is weak, it is likely that legal aid will be discharged. We are conscious of the fact that the same solicitor will be paid from the Legal Aid Board, should legal aid continue.

In the past, the merits test did not give enough recognition to that conflict. The stricter funding code and the Government's intention to target funds where they can do the most good will enable the new Legal Services Commission, which will come into effect in April, to monitor and ensure that the conflict is properly recognised in the granting of legal aid. If there is doubt about the merits of a case, the Legal Aid Board can refer the application to an independent barrister for an opinion. A pilot of those arrangements is under way at the Cambridge office and I expect it to be used more in the future.

The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that the SIU has been successful to date. It has conducted about 500 investigations on civil legal aid and, of those, 82 per cent. led to a change in the certificate. A little under 50 per cent. of the total were revoked, so, for all purposes, the applicant would be treated as if he were never granted legal aid in the first place and would not receive cost protection from the beginning of the case. Of the remaining 32 per cent. the majority were discharged or refused. A small percentage resulted in a change to the contributions payable. Since 1998, the SIU has also prepared reports to help courts to determine applications for criminal legal aid and, during its one-year pilot operation, it received 100 referrals. Its success in those cases was even more impressive; in 98 per cent. of them, it recommended to the court that it should refuse legal aid or change the contributions payable.

The hon. Gentleman referred to confidentiality. The problem under the present rules is that, when information is received about an applicant's status, it is rightly protected by confidentiality. The Government are committed to combating welfare fraud and, under the existing Legal Aid Act 1988, the Legal Aid Board can pass information to other agencies only when there is suspected fraud under that Act. I am pleased to say that, as a result of section 20 of the Access to Justice Act 1999, which will come into force in April this year, the commission will be able to disclose information for the detection of any offence to any appropriate body, not just those under the Legal Aid Act 1988. The message must go out to anyone who is considering applying for legal aid by providing false information that the legal aid authorities have the right to refer that to the Benefits Agency or the police or to take any other steps to highlight welfare benefit fraud. Anyone who provides false information when applying for legal aid is likely to be found out and I am sure that that will affect the balance between the parties in litigation.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the many issues concerning legal aid. I hope that the framework of the Access to Justice Act will result in a much better, tighter and appropriate use of public funding in cases where it is merited.

Question put and agreed to.

Social Security Fraud

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mrs. McGuire.]

9.30 am

Mr. David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden): This is my first visit to this institution; I am fortunate to have found it. I crave your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for any parliamentary solecisms that I may commit this morning, but I am not used to the Chamber's procedures. I assume that they are the same as on the Floor of the House.

The matter before us today is the Government's counter-fraud strategy. The Public Accounts Committee has made a number of reports on the subject, but I do not wish to speak about them. Many of the questions that I want to raise today are relatively new and have not yet been debated by the Public Accounts Committee. Some of them cover elements of policy, on which the Committee conventionally does not comment. I am not speaking on behalf of the Conservative party; what I have to say today will be said entirely as an ordinary Member of Parliament.

I shall put the subject in context by considering the level of fraud. First, it is almost impossible accurately to measure social security fraud. If we knew where all the missing money was going, we would, at least in theory, be able to get it back; we would not then have a problem. Every estimate made of fraud is just that—an estimate. I believe that it is often an underestimate. Social security fraud is estimated to be between £3 billion and £7 billion. Departmental estimates allocate sums to individual categories of fraud, which add up to as much as £2.5 billion. The primary figures within that estimate are as follows. Income support and income-based jobseeker's allowance fraud costs about £1,530 million. The jobseeker's allowance fraud costs about £47 million; child benefit costs £184 million; instrument of payment fraud costs £119 million, and housing benefit fraud costs £600 million. Hon. Members may have noticed that I did not include disability living allowance fraud, but that is because I believe that the Department has lost confidence in its figures. It does not mean that there is no fraud, it is simply an underestimate. More accurately, the total is between £3 billion and £7 billion. During the past two years, the Prime Minister has spoken of a total of £5 billion.

No one can imagine such sums. Billions of pounds is a meaningless phrase, but here it is equivalent to between £300 and £500 per family per year. That money is ripped off, stolen, by fraudsters. It is equivalent to between £100 and £300 per taxpayer per year. More important, it is a massive loss to the public accounts. I am that peculiar person—a right-wing Conservative who believes in high levels of public service delivery—and I see it differently. The minimum estimate of £2.5 billion would pay for 100 district hospitals a year, or for 5,000 teachers, nurses, policemen and firemen, who are sorely needed. The £5 billion estimate of the Prime Minister would pay for both. The highest estimate would pay for both and leave money over to make massive improvements in all our public services. It is enormously important.

The next question is: in what direction are we going? The Government obviously take the matter seriously, as did the previous Government, but how effective is their strategy? To be fair to the Government, it is too early to judge. The problem with social security and Benefits Agency accounts is that they are published fairly late; we have only just received the two sets of accounts for the first two years of the Government's tenure, which show little sign of improvement.

We must be wary of some of the figures; as I said earlier, they are estimates and bigger changes in the apparent fraud figures result from changes in estimating procedure than from changes of policy. To say that there is no apparent change is to say that there is no change in the estimate, not in the outcome. The numbers as published do not show a material improvement.

A better indicator from the point of view of the House is to consider the number of errors, which are more accurately assessed by the National Audit Office. Errors are important because the drivers that lead to an increase in errors in social security—weaknesses in control systems, poor administration, high levels of complexity and so on—lead to fraud. The estimate of error in income support and jobseeker's allowance rose by £80 million to £637 million in 1998–99.

The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) will be considering in more detail the administration of local government expenditure. The Audit Commission's figures show significant increases in some areas of local government-related housing fraud, which led to contention in recent evidence to the Public Accounts Committee. There is no reason to be complacent; the issue is massively important and, at present, there is no sign that we have got a grip on it. It is not that the Government do not take it seriously, or that they are not trying to do something about it, but we have not yet made a bite into it.

To assess the problem properly, we must consider what it consists of. It is easy to talk about billions of pounds; it is also easy to pick off individual cases, such as the ram raider who made £46,000 in addition to millions of pounds of criminal income out of the disability living allowance, despite the fact that he was a scuba diver, skier and private pilot with a variety of other interesting physical pursuits. What is important is to focus on how such fraud comes about.

The most serious cause of fraud is the complexity of the regulations. More than 150 statutory instruments have been made under the social security banner in this Government's Administration. That does not tell us anything itself, but it is indicative of the complexity involved. The Benefits Agency admitted that, without simplification of the regulations for income support, about 10 per cent. of all payments will be wrong. That is a huge sum of money. It is not just fraud but poor administration that creates confusion and uncertainty for those most in need. It results in extra costs and high levels of debt, much of which is not collectable and thus makes fraud easier to execute and the perpetrators much harder to catch after the event.

[Mr. David Davis]

The award of housing benefit is beset with problems of the same complexity as the regulations, as the right hon. Member for Birkenhead will explain later. I shall deal with complexity in the working families tax credit, which will come into effect this year.

Technology is also a difficult matter. The Department has admitted the inadequacy of its computer systems, which is a key constraint on the detection of fraud. The matter will arise again and again in my speech. Insufficient capacity, poor programme design, lack of state-of-the-art processing procedures and the inability of systems to interact all contribute to the problems.

The Department tells us that it is making progress with data sharing and with the insulation of remote access terminals in local authorities. I hope that that is progressing, as it will assist in the fight against housing benefit fraud. Under the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act 1997, data matching will be extended where possible to include information held by the Inland Revenue. That should assist in identifying working benefit claimants. I do not, however, hold my breath on the prospect of a Department of Social Security computer helping to solve the problem. The Department's past record with information technology has had all the elegance and effectiveness of a horse-drawn hang-glider, and I should not like to rely heavily on it. The Department is clearly making its best efforts and we hope that it succeeds, but I doubt whether the new system will solve the problem.

The Government have recognised the problem of benefits as passports. A claimant who has fraudulently or erroneously been awarded a benefit such as income support can use it as a passport for a range of other benefits, including housing benefit, council tax and relief from national health charges. Such activities create a ripple effect throughout the system that is funded by the public purse. Methods of payment also create problems. Paper-based systems of delivering social security benefits are not especially secure against smaller frauds. I hesitate to call those frauds amateur; non-organised fraud is perhaps a better expression. They are evidenced by the more than £100 million a year that is lost to the fraudulent encashment of order books and giro cheques.

The conventional wisdom is that automatic credit transfer will be much more secure. I am not entirely convinced by that view. I think that it is perfectly possible that automatic credit transfer will make organised fraud much bigger, once the system is penetrated. We have only to consider the west African gangs and others who work as cleaners in offices to gain access to security codes to wonder whether our bank security arrangements would stand up to such assault. I have some doubts about that. The proposals may deal with unorganised fraud, but they may also open up the risk of mega frauds, about which we must also concern ourselves.

The benefits system clearly offers opportunities to those intent on defrauding it and the lack of a stringent prosecution policy makes the risk of defrauding the system much more attractive. Ineffective recovery legislation and visibly poor debt management and recovery will add to that attraction. When the Public Accounts Committee considered housing benefit fraud in local government, it found that the risk of prosecution for identified and proven fraudsters was less than one in 100; fewer than one in 100 cases were pursued. The Government are addressing the issue, but to what extent? I have heard of improvements of between 30 per cent. and 40 per cent. Okay, so the Minister is thinking of a one in 60 chance of prosecution, but that is not a deterrent.

Culture is another important issue. I am concerned about the culture in modern society, some of whose members see the system as a legitimate target. In some respects, it is easy to understand that attitude, as it feels less bad to steal from a big organisation than from the corner shop, and so on. It is, however, still stealing. At the end of the day, the victims are the people who do not receive the services about which I spoke at the beginning of my remarks, which could include schooling, proper welfare support or proper health treatment. The fact that the target is diffuse does not make such stealing any less immoral.

I shall comment briefly on types of fraud before I move on to the two main strategic issues that the Government face. I have mentioned the west African gangs, but they are not by any means the only ones. Fraud can take a variety of forms, the most obvious of which are multiple claims, hijacked identities, massive theft of instruments of payment and organised counterfeiting or alteration of documentation. Very serious amounts are involved, running into millions. That must be stamped out.

A rather more systemic problem is collusive fraud, involving, for example, landlords and tenants or employers and employees. Similarly, landlords can create bogus tenants and claim for them, or tenants can create fictitious addresses at which they purport to live.

Identity fraud is another category. Lack of security over national insurance numbers can lead to their being misused to make claims under several guises at different locations. Frauds involving forged or stolen birth certificates are not uncommon in relation to claims for family benefits. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead has made a major issue of that in the past and may want to comment today.

Fraud involving residency and attendance particularly affects claims for child benefit. Residency is a key qualifying condition for the benefit, as it is payable for at least 16 years, often by automatic credit transfer, and claimants or their children can leave the country and still receive benefit. Each year, £184 million or more in child benefit is lost. More than half of that is for children over 16 who are falsely claimed to be in further education.

Working while claiming is perhaps the best known kind of benefit fraud. It is one of the main kinds of fraud in regard to income support and jobseeker's allowance. Claiming as a single person while living with someone is a key component of the loss to public funds from income support and jobseeker's allowance fraud.

Fraudulent claims for disability benefits are also an issue. As I said earlier, the relevant figure was not included in the estimate of £2.5 billion, but the fraud is serious. The detail of some of the frauds that I am concerned about shows that they are carried out ruthlessly. They are an offence against all people who are properly entitled to disability living allowance.

The first of the general issues that I want to discuss is that benefits should be simpler to understand and administer. Complex cases cause confusion and error. They deny proper benefits to deserving cases and open the door to fraud. They are morally wrong on all counts. Dealing with that problem has become known in the parlance as designing fraud out of the system. I remember an exchange that I had with the right hon. Member for Birkenhead on that when he was a Minister. He took a measured and sensible approach.

The second issue is the design of effective anti-fraud mechanisms to catch and punish offenders. I propose to review the Government's reaction to the Scampion report as an example of that. I shall not discuss the third important issue, as I believe that the right hon. Member for Birkenhead will do so, but it relates to the standards of administration and co-operation in the system, particularly the introduction of targets and incentives to reduce error and fraud.

The best written example of what I am talking about is, I say immodestly, the Public Accounts Committee's report on housing benefit, to which the Government responded reasonably constructively. The aims that have been set out may reap benefits if the relevant design and execution is good. That deserves debate.

Working families tax credit, like its predecessor, family credit, is means tested. Critics of means testing argue with some force that such benefits are inherently susceptible to fraud. As working families tax credit has increased the eligible numbers, and as the awards are more generous—both direct policy intentions of the Government, with good reason—it is argued that the number of fraudulent claims will increase. From April 2000 onwards, employers will pay working familes tax credit and offset the amount paid against tax and national insurance liability. That has led some—the most eminent of whom is the right hon. Member for Birkenhead—to argue that employers and claimants may collude. Shortly after he ceased to be a Minister, which gave him a great deal of internal knowledge of the system, with his usual authority he said:

"But the whole of the working family tax credit is fraught with great dangers . . . It offers huge bonuses for dishonesty for both employers and workers . . . It strengthens the employers hold over people—'these are the conditions: cheat and both of us will be better off' . . . It thereby pulls employers into a spider's web of corruption . . . It rewards employers paying low wages."

That is a perceptive insight into what might happen if the system is allowed to get out of control.

In addition, we have the experience of the earned income tax credit in the United States, on which the working families tax credit is based. An article in Fiscal Studies based its criticism on a study by the Internal Revenue Service—the American Inland Revenue—that was released in early 1997. It found that taxpayers claimed $4.4 billion more in EITC funds than they were eligible to receive.

The counter-argument is that the United Kingdom proposals were developed to be aligned wtih the pre-existing in-work benefit system rather than the tax credit system in the United States. For example, eligibility for the EITC was originally checked retrospectively, in line with the policy on tax measures. The IRS now verifies eligibility before payment. Such a process is built into the UK proposals because they are based on existing structures for in-work benefits.

The Minister might say that we need not worry about the evidence on the EITB, but he would not be correct. The Social Security Committee examined the potential for fraud. Although it acknowledged the differences between the systems in the UK and the United States, it was concerned that the increased generosity of the tax credits could exacerbate existing problems of fraud in family credit and that the transfer of functions to the Inland Revenue would create new problems. In particular, the Social Security Committee criticised the decision of the Benefits Agency to abandon a full review of family credit to estimate the level of fraud.

The agency undertook a pilot study on the operation of family credit with the intention of generating a larger and statistically more significant study. The results of the pilot study showed that the Social Security Committee was right to be concerned. In its report that accompanied the pilot study, it said that of the 300 cases that were sampled, 20 were "selected at random in 1997 from each of 15 centres from Dunfermline to Penzance, which were closely examined by trained investigators. Several of the cases had more than one 'outcome', resulting in 326 'outcomes' from the 298 cases actually examined. The raw sample results showed that there were only 141 'outcomes' in which no frauds or errors were found as a result of the visits, interviews and adjudication reviews."

Less than half of the family credits evaluated were free of fraud or error. It continued:

"Confirmed fraud was found in 32 'outcomes' and... suspicion of fraud in another 91 'outcomes'. It can be seen therefore that in a careful pilot study conducted of this very small sample, 123 out of 326 'outcomes' involved possible or actual fraud."

The results from the pilot study are too small to be extrapolated,

"so they could equally be an under-estimate as an over-estimate of the amount of fraud in the full Family Credit caseload", in which more than 750,000 cases amounted to expenditure of £2.5 billion in that year.

The Social Security Committee went on to list the problems that were raised by the examination of cases in the sample study. They were:

"failing to delcare capital above limits allowed... a child having left full-time education... incorrect declaration of own earnings... incorrect declaration of partner's earnings... living together as husband and wife... but claiming as a lone parent receiving other income."

It remained

"concerned that these indicative findings did not lead on to a full Review, which could have analysed the probable extent of each of these types of fraud."

I could not agree more with that conclusion.

As the working families tax credit is based on family credit, all the Committee's examples of ways in which claims had been identified as potentially false could apply under the new system. Claimants must still record details of the family's income and capital, the number of adults in the household, and the age and status of each child. False information about any of those variables could lead to an incorrect working family tax credit award.

I worry that, in introducing a new policy, with clear aims with which I do not disagree, such as creating an escape from the poverty trap, that survey was not carried further to enable us to design fraud out of the system. We know that the returns to individuals are much larger, and that more than a million additional individuals are eligible for the working family tax credit than were eligible under the previous system. Further, the mechanism is operated by employers and not directly by benefits offices.

The result is a potentially problematic system—we do not know whether it will be because it has not yet been implemented—which could lead to serious increases in fraud, above and beyond those of which I have already spoken. As an indicator for hon. Members, I have picked out a newspaper article from late last year. It states:

"Fewer than one in 10 tax inspectors would be capable of correctly filling in the form that many of those claiming the working families' tax credit will have to complete, the profession's main umbrella group claimed yesterday. In a rare public attack on ministers, the Chartered Institute of Taxation—the leading body for tax experts, including inspectors—accused the government of breaking promises over consultation and repeating many of the errors that dogged the Child Support Agency."

That is possibly one of the most frightening things that I have ever heard about a prospective policy. I worry about the matter, and would be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about the way in which he will deal with what will be a serious matter during the many years for which the system will, no doubt, stay in place.

Secondly, I wish to deal with the assault on the fraudsters—the Government's approach to catching and dealing with them. I applied for the debate because of the Government's apparent treatment of the Scampion report, written by John Scampion, a social services commissioner. The inquiry was official, Government ordered and independent, but the report appears to have been shelved. I hope that the Minister will tell me that that is not true. The report came out on 24 January and we have heard little about it other than one thing to which I shall refer in a moment.

I can understand Ministers being uncomfortable with the comments in the report, and I shall give hon. Members about 10 quotations from the report so that they can understand why. First, it states:

"The fact is that BASIS (Benefits Agency Security Investigation Service) is not resourced to do all the work it is called upon to do".

Secondly, it states:

"There is insufficient flexibility in the total response to serious frauds".

Thirdly, it states:

"There is an unevenness of response to serious and organised fraud in different parts of the country".

Fourthly, it states:

"There are no strategic discussions between BFIS (Benefit Fraud Investigation Service) and BASIS. Their work is fragmented resulting in organised frauds not being pursued".

Fifthly, it states:

"One immediate issue is the provision of a basic hands-on information system dealing with actual or live frauds. Investigators both in BASIS and BFIS do seem handicapped by a reliance on exchanges of information derived manually".

Sixthly, it states:

"The amount of data that is held within the benefits system is immense. It is at present being garnered and assessed by a number of discrete organisations without a readily observable strategic framework".

The report went on to comment on some of the local organisational effects. It states:

"Each of the 400 or so [local] authorities is autonomous—lessons learnt by one may never be passed on to another . . . there is obviously no obvious route by which . . . practical use of good preventative intelligence may be disseminated more widely".

It also states:

"Equally there appears to be little intelligence interchange between local government and the BA.

WBS [Weekly Benefit Savings] stifles initiative, and creates a culture in which easy hits are encouraged to the detriment of professional investigative work".

It goes on:

"Against Housing Benefit fraud they [local authorities] are much less focused. Many authorities do not recognise it as a serious problem for them and others are not impelled by the financial regime or indeed enabled by the appropriate skills to actively pursue it as a matter of high priority".

Finally, it states:

"Organised fraud, especially the most serious is not a current priority of local government and in any revised system needs to become one. There is inconsistent and insufficiently co-ordinated practice on the use of intelligence to support the pursuit of organised fraud".

Those last half dozen quotes overlap with some of the Government's ideas, as the Minister will no doubt confirm later, but I thought that the first half dozen or so probably showed why the Government are uncomfortable with the report.

The thrust of the report's recommendations are aimed at consolidating fraud intelligence and investigation activities in a national structure, reporting to the Department of Social Security fraud strategy director rather than to Benefits Agency management. Such a co-ordinated approach to the fight against fraud should be seen as a welcome innovation, as under the current arrangements, potential frauds are often cross-referred between fragmented units of the Benefits Agency, with little or no action being taken due to conflicting priorities. That supports the recommendation that fraud intelligence should be removed from the Benefits Agency because that would permit national priorities to be set. Those are eminently sensible aims. To that purpose, the Scampion report's principle recommendations were as follows.

First, the report recommends the establishment of a single benefit investigation agency for Great Britain. The BIA would be created by merging the existing complement of BASIS with part of the existing complement of BFIS.

Secondly, the report recommends the establishment of a benefits intelligence directorate to bring together the intelligence work carried out within the Benefits Agency. The Secretary of State's response to that was to announce that a national intelligence unit was being created, but I understand that that is only a pilot body in the north west of England. It is difficult to see how the real benefits of a national intelligence unit will be achieved, or even tested, on a pilot basis in one part of the country. It will be interesting to hear what the Minister has to say about that.

Thirdly, the report calls for the establishment of regional anti-fraud partnerships between local authorities, the BIA and the BID. The Minister's original response to the Public Accounts Committee report touched on only a fraction of those ideas.

Fourthly, partnerships would be required, within a given time scale, to submit proposals to the DSS for dealing with organised fraud. Again, it will be interesting to hear what those proposals are.

The report then lists several supplementary recommendations, which are sensible and practical, so I shall put them on the record because it would be interesting to know the Government's opinion on them. It suggests that details of payee, amount and personal identifier should be added in coded form to girocheques, unless there are compelling reasons to the contrary. That seems to be a sensible idea. It suggests that a common baseline application form for council tax and housing benefit should be introduced. I know that some simplification of those forms is being undertaken, so perhaps the Minister will say something about that.

The report also recommends that a debate should be started on the balance between people's right to privacy and the state's need to protect public funds. Both this and the previous Government sidestepped that knotty issue. As something of a civil libertarian, I do not think the issue easy to resolve, but it is a great shame that the card system that the Government were to introduce crashed, and we were unable to have at least a voluntary smart card for benefits claimants. I would not force anyone to carry a card, but such a card would provide many honest people with a simpler, more straightforward mechanism for collecting their benefits, and it would have the added advantage of eradicating some fraud.

The report goes on:

"Investigation should be carried out into the possiblity of the DSS/BA joining the Credit Industry Fraud Avoidance Scheme."

That is a simple, sensible idea. After all, fraud is not confined to government or to welfare systems, and many private sector techniques, driven by englightened self-interest, may be of use in the public sector. The report also advocates

"a common prosecution policy between the Inland Revenue and DSS following the introduction of the Working Families Tax Credit."

I suspect that it would be rather a shock to the DSS to have an Inland Revenue style prosecution policy, as the latter is not known for its leniency. The final recommendation is that "Consideration should be given to the expansion of asset recovery and confiscation of crime proceeds."

That seems sensible, although I am not sure of the Government's view.

Finally, I shall pre-empt one argument that the Government might put forward. The matching of Scampion's recommendations for a benefit investigation agency and a benefits intelligence directorate with the existing role of the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate is at issue. The Scampion report makes little reference to the work of the BFI, but I do not believe that its recommendations, if adopted, would result in a duplication of effort. The BFI was created to undertake inspections of social security benefit adminstration and counter-fraud activity, and to identify, encourage and promote good practice. The proposed benefit investigation agency would provide a single institution dedicated to investigating all forms of fraud against benefits administered by the Benefits Agency. The benefits intelligence directorate would have responsibility for supporting prevention and detection of fraud through the collection, analysis and dissemination of intelligence across the Benefits Agency.

Although there is some scope for exchange of information between the BFI and the two proposed new bodies, the BFI's predominant focus is on local authorities, rather than on the Benefits Agency. Under these proposals, the three organisations would complement one another, rather than duplicate functions. I hope that the Government will not argue that there will be duplication.

I thought it a good thing that the Government initiated the Scampion inquiry. The outcome, uncomfortable as it may be, is a rather good report. I hope that the Department will show a willingness to take on board those issues. Some of the proposals involve quite serious reorganisation, with parts of the Department and agencies losing some of their empires to other parts. As an ex-Minister, I know how hard such battles can be fought in Whitehall.

I ask the Minister, for whose forthright and practical approach to these matters I have great respect, to take these recommendations on board and to try to ensure that the best parts of the Scampion report—that is, most of it—comes into being. This is a big issue; it frustrated the previous Government, and will frustrate the present Government and many in the future. Initiatives have not always worked. However, that is not a reason to give up trying or applying pressure, because the benefit of succeeding will be better public service throughout, which we should all support.

10.8 am

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis). Now that he has found this Chamber, I hope that debates examining the evolution of the Government's counter-fraud strategy will be a regular feature of the rest of the Parliament.

I begin by recording my thanks to the Chairman and members of the Public Accounts Committee for the information that they regularly provide to Parliament on the administration of public moneys, and to Sir John Bourn and his staff for the role that they play with the PAC in making that information available. For proof of their assistance, one would have only to consult tomorrow's Hansard to see how dependent we have all been in our contributions on the information that the Public Accounts committee has made available to the House of Commons and the wider public.

I join in the debate for the same reason as the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden and other hon. Members who wish to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker—because it is not a simple debate about those who are in favour of people claiming benefits as opposed to others who are against people claiming benefit and try to focus all their attention on the question of fraud. The British attitudes survey revealed that the vast majority of the electorate think that a considerable number of people who are eligible to claim benefit are not doing so, and are concerned about that, while almost an equal number believe at the same time that in large parts of the system it is too easy to defraud taxpayers. Like the right hon. Gentleman, I not only believe in public services, but believe that unless one garners taxpayers' support by assuring them that their hard-earned money is not being squandered, wasted or fraudulently claimed, one allows attitudes to rock the very basis of the welfare state.

I welcome the fact that the Minister of State will respond to the debate, because in previous Parliaments he and I raised the issue of countering fraud. While it is, of course, good for people to change their views and join what is now the majority position—that countering fraud is a major issue—he is one of those who raised it when it was not fashionable and sought to strengthen the previous Government's counter-fraud strategy. The Minister may not always be supported by the Department in the way that he should be. He is nothing but a total professional as a Minister, and will of course deny that and say what wonderful support he has from his officials. However, the recording of certain views in public debate can help strengthen the position of those whose position we wish to see strengthened.

With that in mind, I shall refer to the Green Paper on countering fraud—"Beating Fraud is Everyone's Business"—in which the Government signed up to four benchmarks. I hope that the Minister, if he cannot reply to my questions immediately, will give a public reply at a later stage. The four benchmarks in the Green Paper were as follows. First, it stated that the Government would be committed to measure fraud to a high degree of accuracy and report annually. I and many taxpayers would be interested to hear from the Minister what progress has been made on that front. Secondly, it gave a commitment to check and to clear bogus national insurance numbers. What is the timetable for the completion of that benchmark? Thirdly, it stated that the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate and the Audit Commission would ruthlessly work together to counter fraud. What progress has been made on bringing together those two important organisations in furthering the Government's counter-fraud strategy? Fourthly, it promised a review of the criminal and civil law and the extent to which it helps or hinders tackling fraud. The White Paper was totally silent on that, as on many other of the benchmarks in the Green Paper. What progress can the Minister report in that respect?

When, as a Minister, I discovered that there was not to be a benefit review of family credits, on the basis that the Department was getting shot of the benefit and the Treasury would be assuming responsibility, I counter-ordered that decision and asked that the benefit review take place. When I appeared before the Social Security Committee, I realised that that decision had been countermanded. Was the matter brought to the Minister's attention? Did he take that decision, or was it taken by officials without his knowledge? On leaving office, I assumed that the review would take place for the very reasons that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden listed.

Reports from counter-fraud officers demonstrated the problems associated with family credit fraud. In respect of new benefits, the Government aimed to design out opportunities for fraud. To prevent working families tax credit fraud, it was important to discover the extent of family credit fraud and the means by which it was being conducted.

I was closely involved with the security of the national insurance number system, so I asked that we should check the references and identity of some key members of staff. Has that programme begun? Did the Minister know of that decision, or was he bypassed? Although it is important to engage people to shop cheats, and so on, I hope that the Government do not think that merely starting another such campaign in the months ahead would constitute a proper counter-fraud strategy.

I realise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that many others wish to catch your eye, so I shall deal briefly with the question of housing benefit. Thanks to the efforts of the Public Accounts Committee, it is estimated that fraud costs £840 million, but that estimate may be 30 per cent. out in either direction. The Government promised to report on fraud annually and measure it accurately, but the error rate has increased from 16 to 29 per cent. Two thirds of local authorities do not make proper efforts to recover wrong payments, and one third make no effort at all. For example, 161 authorities have yet to participate in the "do not redirect" service for housing benefit cheques. According to the Public Accounts Committee, perhaps as many as £50,000 a week per local authority could be saved if a non-redirect policy were implemented, which could constitute a saving of as much as £400 million a year. What progess have the Government made on that?

In respect of housing benefit forms, the BFI states:

"We also found examples of more serious problems, such as claim forms not being designed to record a national insurance number, claimant's income or liability to payment."

We are talking about a means-tested benefit, yet local authorities are issuing forms that do not record the income of those who will be paid benefit. That beggars belief. We know that 143 local authorities made no prosecutions for housing benefit fraud during the year on which the Public Accounts Committee reported. Of those, 57 could not be bothered to tell the Government whether they had a prosecution policy. There is also evidence of councillors or workers in another 57 authorities fraudulently claiming housing benefit, not one of whom was prosecuted. If that does not send out a powerful message that the Government are not serious about countering fraud, what does?

I end by suggesting nine reforms, simply on housing benefit, that I would like to see. First, time has run out for local authorities voluntarily to sign up to the policy of not redirecting to safe addresses fraudulently claimed housing benefit cheques. Either a tough national policy should be implemented within a couple of months or the Secretary of State must ask district auditors to surcharge councils that continue to send on cheques to fraudsters.

Secondly, how long will the Government allow local authorities to administer a means-tested benefit such as housing benefit without being sure that we are properly collecting income from those claiming the benefit?

Thirdly, will the Government give a timetable in which they expect every council seriously to recoup overpayments? Again, will the Secretary of State ask district auditors to surcharge councils if no policy is in place to recoup taxpayers' money on that front?

Fourthly, we know that local authorities have limited time in which to follow up some of the overpayments. What progress are the Government making to ensure that the private sector is used to help to recoup taxpayers' money that should not have been overpaid?

Fifthly, will the Government give a commitment that councillors or council workers found to be fraudulently claiming housing benefit will automatically be prosecuted?

Sixthly, the BFI's recommendations are not fully implemented in regard to housing benefit contracts. Where they are not, will the Government ask the Secretary of State to consider taking the operation of housing benefit away from those local authorities and putting it out to tender? The Government are, thankfully, developing public service agreements in national government. Is there not a case for trying to build on that success to ensure that there is a public service agreement with local authorities about the running of housing benefit?

The eighth suggestion is to make landlord benefit fraud a key fight. When the permanent secretary appeared before the Public Accounts Committee, she said that Scampion would deal with that. He does not make the sort of recommendations that are required. The Green Paper made three. It suggested, first, that there should be a register of landlords, secondly, that the Government should report as part of their annual audit measuring landlord fraud and, thirdly, that specialist teams should be set up to tackle landlord fraud. Will my right hon. Friend be able at some stage to report progress on that?

My last suggestion is this. My right hon. Friend is one of the most able of our Ministers at judging the public mood. Does he agree that a way to gain further support from the public would be to link specific gains from countering fraud to public programmes that taxpayers wish to see advanced? If that is his view, will he soon make progress in public on that front?

I look forward to the contribution of other hon. Members and the reply of my right hon. Friend the Minister.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): It is a privilege to follow the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) and the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who are distinguished parliamentarians and experts in this area. The Chamber is grateful to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee for raising this matter in his personal capacity.

I want to deal with some of the broader issues that are prompted by the detailed comments that we have heard. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden is right to draw attention to the scale of the problem. The alleged size of benefit fraud is larger than the entire budget of some Government Departments. One can imagine that some of the Minister's colleagues would kill for a share of the fraud money. It is therefore right to stress the urgency of the issue. Although the Government talk a good game, they are not delivering. Year after year, the accounts are not wholeheartedly accepted. While it would be wrong to say that nothing is being done, little is being achieved.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to designing out fraud, and cited the working families tax credit. If the Government cannot reduce the risk of fraud when they introduce a new, renamed or slightly restructured benefit, what hope is there? It is hard enough to get rid of existing benefit fraud. Apart from the fact that working families tax credit is paid through the employer's payroll—an open invitation to fraud—the child care tax credit element poses an additonal problem. Whereas it used to go to a handful of people on family credit, it will now go to many thousands of people. That opens up a whole new vista of unexplored fraud. Up to £150 a week of child care costs can be allowed in the benefit calculation, and the claimant can benefit by up to £5,000 a year. That is a whole new burgeoning industry, with which the Government have not got to grips.

The right hon. Gentleman rightly mentioned the need for simplicity, which, one feels, is anathema to the Department of Social Security. Consider what the Department has done with regard to support for children, which used to be relatively straightforward. In addition to child benefit, there is now the working families tax credit, with its various credits, including child care credits. There will now be a children's tax credit, which is different from the child care tax credit and the working families tax credit. That is on top of child benefit. Apparently, all that will be streamlined in the future. The Government have introduced a more complex system, which, allegedly, they will simplify later. It will be interesting to see if they ever get round to simplification.

Some of the benefit fraud statistics are interesting. Pensioners are included among those reported as fraudulent claimants, and the Government are increasingly using means-tested approaches to support pensioners. If the Government want a simplified approach, they might adopt one of the policies that the right hon. Member for Birkenhead and I have advocated—the targeting of pensioners through age additions on the state pension. The attraction of that method is that the only way people could commit fraud would be by falsifying their age. Intelligent targeting would be possible without the palaver of means testing, and using universal benefits. That kind of thinking is anathema to the Government, who say, "That's not well targeted enough," and then pay £100 to every pensioner in the land. That is not a joined-up strategy.

The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden mentioned the issue of data matching, and the fundamental conflict in having one big computer that contained all our information, which might be an effective deterrent to fraud, but gave rise to certain worries. I probably stray well beyond the party line by being sympathetic towards the idea of one big computer. It is astonishing that information of the same kind is gathered all over the place but never brought together. Most people would feel that the scale of the problem and the sums that we are talking about require desperate solutions. I sometimes feel that data protection legislation has gone too far. It has prevented many developments that it was not intended to affect. I would be interested to hear the Government's thoughts on that issue.

[Mr. Steve Webb]

My overall perspective on the matter is that the Government make grand claims but achieve little. One can always tell when the Department of Social Security is achieving nothing because it issues lots of press releases. On benefit fraud, there were three press releases in the second half of January, including one on the area benefit review, which was issued on 28 January. It said:

"The percentage amount of benefit overpaid"—

on income support—

"due to fraud and customer error has fallen by 0.4 per cent. between the periods October 1997–September 1998 and April 1998 to March 1999. This reduction is not statistically significant."

The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) drew attention to that in the House the other day. In relation to the jobseeker's allowance, the press release states:

"The percentage of benefit overpaid ... due to fraud and customer error has fallen by 0.2 per cent. ... This reduction is not statistically significant".

On the same day, the Secretary of State said:

"We are winning the battle against fraud".

"Not statistically significant" could mean that the figures have gone up—we cannot be sure that they have gone down. There is a discrepancy between the Government's rhetoric on fraud and their delivery—or lack thereof.

I draw attention to a telling paragraph in the Public Accounts Committee report. Every year the Government announce that several billion pounds have been saved on fraud, but each year the figures for fraud never appear to go down. A marvellous paragraph in the report states:

"We asked the Agency why, given savings ... of £2.5 billion over 3 years, the level of fraud on income support and jobseeker's allowance remained at over £1.5 billion".

The agency gave a rather coy answer—it said that it viewed

"the stock of fraud as the better and more important figure on which to target their actions."

That is a euphemism. One wearies of hearing grandiose claims about the sums that will be saved. The estimates of stock of fraud are relentless and do not go down. We should target that matter.

I conclude by proposing a way forward to the Minister. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead mentioned public service agreements. In relation to the Department of Social Security, I regard those agreements as toothless. In view of the Government's attachment to performance-related pay, will the Minister agree to tie his salary to his ability to make a concrete achievement in cutting benefit fraud?

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): I am grateful to follow three such distinguished hon. Members. The concluding suggestion of the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) might be a little unfair—the Minister may be drawing his pension by the time that we know whether we have been successful in this regard, and it would be wrong to rob a pensioner of his income.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) on raising this important matter in this Chamber. I agree with the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who commended the Public Accounts Committee's report. I appreciate that my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden was speaking in a personal capacity, but the report is a welcome and helpful addition to our efforts to fight fraud.

The report arrives at an appropriate moment. Since early December, there have been four reports on fraud: the National Audit Office appropriation accounts for 1998–99; the Audit Commission's "Protecting the public purse: ensuring probity in local government", to which the right hon. Member for Birkenhead referred; Sir John Scampion's report on organised benefit fraud—my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden discussed its 19 recommendations—and the Public Accounts Committee report.

As has already been said, no one really knows the true extent of fraud in the system. My right hon. Friend referred to estimates of between £3 million and £7 million, but the right hon. Member for Birkenhead suggested that the figure might be a little higher than that. Whatever the figure, fraud is rife and endemic in the system.

The National Audit Office report found that there was an increase of £636 million in the 1998–99 accounts, which represents 5 per cent. of the total expenditure on income support. Our first task should be to admit that the situation is deteriorating. I endorse the comments of the hon. Member for Northavon, who said that there was too much short-term spin in the system and that we needed a strategy to ensure that the tough rhetoric matched reality.

I, too, was struck by the press release of 28 January, which was headed "Darling welcomes successes in fighting benefit fraud". It states:

"Today's figures show that our tougher anti-fraud measures are beginning to bite ... we are winning the fight against fraud."

However, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, the Office for National Statistics said that reductions in both areas were not statistically significant. He is therefore right to say that matters could have gone either way. It is no use pretending that things are happening when they are not, as that makes the service look ridiculous and undermines attacks on organised fraud.

There are two main problems: complexity and hands-off approach to the strategy. The Public Accounts Committee referred to complexity in its report published on 13 January. Paragraph 8.2 on page vi states:

"A key cause of error and fraud in income support is the complexity of the regulations, and the Benefit Agency told us that without simplification 10 per cent of payments would always be wrong. This is poor administration, which creates confusion, uncertainty for those most in need, extra costs and high levels of debt, much of which is not collectable."

Leaving complexity to one side, I shall now tackle the absence of a hands-on approach. My right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden talked about John Scampion's report, which deals with the lack of a sensible, practitioners' approach to the problem. I shall not go through the recommendations in detail, as my right hon. Friend did that extremely well. However, I shall emphasise a few points made in the report.

The report says that there was no strategic discussion between the benefits fraud investigation and the Benefits Agency security investigation service. Fragmenting resulted and organised frauds were not pursued. Page 16 states:

"There is insufficient flexibility in the total response to serious frauds."

It also states:

"There is an unevenness of response to serious fraud and organised frauds in different parts of the country".

Summing up the position, on page 18 it states:

"One immediate effect is the provision of a basic ... information system dealing with actual or live frauds. Investigators both in BASIS and BFIS do seem handicapped by a reliance on exchanges of information derived manually".

The report paints a frightening picture of organised fraud, drawing attention to the fact that organised fraud is not being pursued. It also demonstrates something that I have discovered in visits to housing benefit offices and the Benefits Agency—local authorities rarely exchange information between themselves or with the Benefits Agency. Different housing benefit forms are used by different local authorities. Consequently, when one authority finds a loophole and closes it by changing its form, that is not necessarily passed on to other authorities.

Attempts to tackle fraud include the recent Fraudweb conference. However, there is no systematic method for exchanging information. My right hon. Friend pointed out that we must be careful how computers exchanged information between various groups. That is right. It is not just a question of computers. Much of the investigation of housing benefit fraud is done manually. It is recorded manually. There is no exchange. It is a question of chasing paper around, which is quite a problem in the system. Even at the very top there is, in the words of Scampion, an over-reliance on manual systems.

It is amazing that the Government accepted only one of Scampion's recommendations and, as my right hon. Friend pointed out, it is only a pilot in a region. There are good and compelling reasons for having a national intelligence unit. I join my right hon. Friend in saying that the benefits of a national system cannot be understood by looking at it purely regionally. National fraud is precisely that. The Minister kindly organised an interesting and helpful seminar for spokesmen on social security at which we saw some of the instruments of fraud and the ways in which people went around the system. They were ingenious, and it was clear that there is quite a lot of national fraud. People organise in several districts. Without a national organisation exchanging information on fraud, there is no real possibility of tackling the problem.

We believe that we should go further. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) recently announced a change in Conservative policy. We would institute a single benefits investigation squad in conjunction with the national intelligence unit and we would look towards a dedicated anti-fraud partnership between local authorities, the Benefits Agency, the intelligence unit and the squad to ensure coordination. The chances are that, if someone is committing a fraud on one benefit, he will commit it on another benefit controlled by the agency.

It is important to ensure that there is still prosecution. It is also important to guard the gateways to benefit. Not everyone who gets involved in fraud starts out with that intention. Sometimes they just fall into temptation. They may delay the announcement of a bereavement or the fact that a son or daughter has reached a certain age. Each week they find it increasingly difficult to admit that they have committed a fraud. That is why the points that the right hon. Member for Birkenhead made about the working families tax credit are so important. Unless we are careful, we will have a system in which, to use his words, people are caught in a spider's web of corruption.

Fraud takes away valuable resources that can be better spent on those in need. It creates a climate of distrust among those receiving benefit. It robs the Government, the taxpayer and the poor in equal measure. It is time to hear how the Government plan to build an effective, hands-on anti-fraud strategy.

The Minister of State, Department of Social Security (Mr. Jeff Rooker): I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will accept that I cannot do justice to the points that have been raised this morning in 16 minutes. Unusually for me, I undertake to write to them on the points that I do not cover. It places a burden on the Department, but I shall not leave anything unanswered. One is always warned as a Minister not to make too many commitments to write, but anything that I cannot answer today will be answered in correspondence.

I welcome the debate on our strategy for tackling fraud and I will outline the action taken by the Government so far. No single initiative or decision can assist in solving the whole problem. The operation needs to cover a wide front. We have to tackle instrument of payment fraud involving giro cheques, or the benefit books, which is similar in design to, and reminiscent of, the ration book of the early 1940s, although that did not have a bar code. Both are open to the same sort of fiddling that I have seen myself. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) may know of cases in which no one has bothered to check information simply because a part-used payment book has been presented. That is one reason for changing to automatic credit transfer.

There is no point being wishy-washy about this. When ACT becomes the main method of payment, it will open up avenues of fraud not necessarily prevalent today. We must design and build in for that when we make the change. This is part of the current planning process. Instrument of payment fraud is serious. I do not wish to fall out with anyone, but we have enough problems with some of the porkies being told by some subpostmasters. I have been at the Department of Social Security for only seven months, less than half the time that my right hon. Friend was there, and I have just had drawn to my attention prosecution cases that made the press the previous day. Not a month has gone by without my being told of matters involving post office employees, the subpostmaster or his family, relating to instrument of payment difficulties—or fraud—that have led to prosecution. Those 18,000 cases are a tiny percentage, but the scope for such fraud is enormous among organised crime and what the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) might term amateur crime. Both are bad, but I understand the right hon. Gentleman's point.

[Mr. Jeff Rooker]

In 1997, two out of five income support claims—40 per cent.—were paid without sufficient evidence of identity. We estimate that the proposed changes—some of which were initiated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead—will save more than £1 billion during the life of this Parliament because of strengthened checks before money is paid. The national benefit intelligence unit will help combat organised fraud. There seems to be some misunderstanding, the reason for which I shall discuss with colleagues. We have not promulgated the totality of the Scampion report, nor have we dismissed it; far from it. I feel sure that the generality of John Scampion's suggestions will become a reality, although perhaps not all in precisely the way he suggested because government machinery issues are involved.

There was a reference to a pilot in the north-west. There is no piloting of the national benefit intelligence unit. There is nothing to be done. That was a misunderstanding. The pilot due to be held in the north-west is effectivley an exercise to discover how we can change public attitudes to benefit fraud. It is not the hot-line, which is a separate exercise, but an attempt to change attitudes. Drink driving was socially acceptable 10 or 20 years ago; today it is not. Public attitudes have changed. But that pilot has nothing to do with the Scampion report.

The Department is training staff to counter fraud. I was present the other week at what I might call the passing-out parade of the first 87 accredited DSS counter-fraud officers, who underwent a course accredited by one of the universities, involving separate trainers and individual anti-crime companies. A further 1,000 are due to come through the system. The grand total is approximately 3,000. Those officers are given proper training in a part of their profession. Part of the Scampion proposals were for a professional head of counter-fraud activity. We need to invest in this important element and take it forward.

As members of the Committee have said, housing benefit is a separate issue. It beggars belief that each local authority designs its own claim form. I regret to say that I served on the Standing Committee which scrutinised the legislation setting up housing benefit all those years ago. The attitude of some local authorities is that it is not their money, so it does not matter, all they are doing is administering Government money. They must get their act together with council tax benefit and housing benefit. We are about to screw them down even more with severe financial penalties for not following through the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate reports and for not following the housing benefit rules, and not even following the law on housing benefit, which came in last September, which makes it a statutory requirement to obtain a claimant's national insurance number. Local government is at risk of losing that role. That is not a threat, it is inevitable, because the House will not stand for it. About £11 billion of taxpayers' money is being paid out, but some authorities are not taking it seriously because it is not local taxpayers' money and therefore not part of their budget. We have a series of measures, some of which we have already introduced and some of which we are about to bring forward, which will put the screws on those parts of local government that are not taking this seriously.

It is also unacceptable that we are not being given sufficient information about details of prosecution. At the moment, the Royal Mail "Do not redirect" service is still voluntary, but it is paid for by the DSS. Some local authorities said that they were not doing it because they had to run down their stock of envelopes. That is a pathetic excuse from professional local government officers. All they have to do is reprint the front of the envelopes; there is no problem with that. They must take that and other matters much more seriously.

Data sharing is a sensitive issue. I do not see it as difficult. The Data Protection Act 1998 must be followed at all times. I do not think that fraudsters, the public or even hon. Members fully appreciate the scale of data sharing that is going on within government, between the Department of Social Security, the Inland Revenue and local authorities. However, it needs to be extended and that is under active consideration, even to the extent of making statutory changes.

Data matching is dependent on comupters and, as was suggested, the computers in the DSS are rubbish. They were bought off the shelf and use old technology, so they did not do the job that they were intended to do. Nevertheless, there are data matching programs. We have supplied local authorities with 400 remote access computer terminals so that they can see what benefits we are paying to a claimant and thus whether they can verify the claim that is being made. That is an important element. We are also getting full reports from the Inland Revenue, particularly on the working families tax credit, an issue to which I shall return in correspondence. National data matching referrals were issued from 31 January and we began to retrieve the DSS Inland Revenue data shortly after the transfer of responsibilities last October.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead asked about the family credit review decision. It looks as though it was made without ministerial clearance, but I am not sure when. One must remember that there were two other Ministers between my right hon. Friend and me. I personally do not recall that decision, but my officials are checking on it. Let us be clear. The working families tax credit is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is not classed as a benefit; it is wholly within the Treasury. Nevertheless, we are obtaining that information to cross-check with DSS benefits because that is important. P46 data—that is the form for new employees who cannot provide their new employer with a P45—is also being transferred from the National Insurance Contributions Office, which is another crucial factor, and the Inland Revenue is passing on details of the new construction industry scheme. We will have the first batch of data from that this summer.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead and the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden mentioned identity fraud. When I arrived at the DSS last summer from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, I was distressed to learn that fraud based on "The Day of the Jackal" had not been dealt with. That was recommended in a White Paper on registration in 1991, if I remember correctly. Everything in that White Paper was accepted and implemented, including new rules for getting married down a coal mine.

I had personal constituency experience of a "The Day of the Jackal" fraud. Twins who were born 30 years ago lived for only a day, and 27 years later, someone knocked on the parents' door saying that someone claiming to be their daughter was being held in a detention centre. One can imagine how the parents felt. That fraud followed the book exactly. I went through that episode chapter and verse with the previous Conservative Prime Minister. Internal discussions are still proceeding and I am pressing to have the matter settled. It is a gap in our identity fraud counter-measures.

I shall not have time to deal in detail with all the issues raised. I can tell my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead that we are spending considerable time scrutinising the management of the national insurance number system—both in the Department and in government with senior colleagues. Some problems are not clear cut, but we have reduced by half the number of people who issue national insurance numbers. I shall have to write to my right hon. Friend about checking individuals. Issuing numbers is now tightly controlled in local offices and it is half of what it was in terms of physical access.

As I said earlier, local authority claim forms were required by law from September last year and we are financially penalising those who failed to meet that requirement. It will not look good for the local authorities, their leaders or chief executives if their act is not cleaned up ethically, especially when the legislation currently in another place comes into force. Information on income must be obtained unless the local authority can acquire it from the DSS via remote access terminals. Otherwise, there is no legal authority to pay a means-tested benefit—it is as simple as that. Authorities will leave themselves open to financial penalties from the Government. Currently, around 250 authorities have adopted the verification framework. That is not good enough: they all should.

All Benefit Fraud Inspectorate reports are published. Only the odd sentence about how to commit a fraud is omitted, for obvious reasons. They are all published on the internet as a guide to good practice for local authorities. Late last year, we requested the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate to investigate the 30 top-spending authorities on housing benefit as a special one-off, which will be completed by this summer.

Insufficient action has been taken on published reports, which is distressing. We have to be careful to follow legal procedures in taking action against local authorities. When the benefit fraud inspection report has been published, authorities can comment on it and we can check whether they are actually carrying out their action plan. We have to go through those stages, after which some legal sanctions are available to us. We are now close to implementing action in that respect.

We wish to work with local authorities as partners, but we must make it clear that we are talking about our money—the Government's money—for which Ministers are accountable to this House of Commons. Local government is not responsible for it; we are, and quite right too. We have to remind authorities that, if the system is not working properly, they stand a good chance in the long term of losing that element of their finances.

Some hon. Members mentioned global figures. There is fraud, official error and claimant error—and we must try to separate them. Some fraud is organised and we are spending £2 billion a week on benefits. That money is open to systematic attack by organised criminals. The Department is carrying out a massive operation to buttress and secure the sytstem against that.

As I said to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead, we shall report back to the House of Commons on what we have been able to achieve. I am more than happy to ensure that every question that has been asked this morning is answered in writng. I know that colleagues will come back to me if they are not satisfied.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): In the absence of the Minister for the next debate, I shall suspend the sitting until he arrives.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): The delayed start to the debate is regrettable; nevertheless I wish Mr. Win Griffiths well.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Keith Vaz): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for the fact that the sitting had to be suspended. I was addressing a group that came over on the state visit of the Queen of Denmark. I apologise for the fact that I was not able to be here earlier.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Thank you, Mr. Vaz.

11.4 am

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): I am pleased that I have this opportunity to debate the draft charter of fundamental rights of the European Union in this Chamber and to give a progress report to the House as its member on the convention drafting the charter. I was prompted to initiate the debate by one or two articles that appeared in the press between the convention's first business meeting, which took place just before Christmas, and the February meeting. Europhobes had once again dreamed up a fantasy island of fear about the charter; they wanted to damn and attack the Government and the European Union. Our debate is a good opportunity to set the record straight and to give Members a flavour of what the charter is about.

The process started at the Cologne summit. In a declaration made at the end of the summit, the European Council said:

"Fundamental rights applicable at the Union level should be consolidated in a Charter and thereby made more evident."

An annexe to that declaration stated:

"Protection of fundamental rights is a founding principle of the Union and an indispensable prerequisite for her legitimacy. The obligation of the Union to respect fundamental rights has been confirmed and defined by the jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice. There appears to be need, at the present stage of the Union's development, to establish a Charter of fundamental rights in order to make their overriding importance and relevance more visible to the Union's citizens".

The statement continued, stating that the charter was based upon the constitutional traditions of member states and general principles of Community law. It stated also that rights under the charter should apply only to European Union citizens and that the charter should take into account the European social charter, the Community charter of fundamental social rights of workers and the European convention on human rights.

A unique body was set up to draft the document before the Council meets in December 2000. The idea is that the European Council will propose to the European Parliament and the Commission that they and the Council should solemnly proclaim a European charter of fundamental rights. Consideration would then have to be given to whether, and if so how, the charter should be integrated into the treaties.

The convention will include representatives of each of the 15 Governments of the member states of the European Union, one representative of the Commission, 16 Members of the European Parliament and 30 Members of national Parliaments. The United Kingdom will be represented by me, speaking for the House of Commons, and Lord Bowness, who speaks for the Conservative party in the House of Lords. A system of alternates will be in operation if either I or Lord Bowness cannot attend—the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) will take my place, and Baroness Howells of St. Davids will attend instead of Lord Bowness. Both alternates are, of course, members of the Liberal Democrat party.

The European Court of Justice has the right to two observers, one of whom will be a member of the European Court of Human Rights. In setting up the convention, the Council specifically asked that the Committee of the Regions, the Economic and Social Committee and the European ombudsman should be invited to give their views to the convention. That was done at our last meeting. Other bodies, social groups, experts and non-governmental organisations have been invited to express their views, and hearings will be held. The Royal National Institute for the Blind has been quick off the mark in sending me a copy of the statement that it gave to the President in office of the Council of Ministers on 22 July 1999, shortly after the Cologne announcement about the rights that disabled people should have.

We have already held two meetings; the first was on 17 and 18 December 1999, the second on 1 and 2 February 2000. We hope that the convention will meet as a full body in March, June, September and October and that it will meet as a working group later this month, twice in March, April, May and June, once in July and September and perhaps in October. That is a rigorous set-up, involving 11 or perhaps 12 meetings of the working group and four meetings of the convention. A lot of work will have to be done in the coming eight or nine months. Before each meeting of the convention as a working group, a drafting committee will meet. It will consist, in effect, of the executive body of the convention.

I return to the remit of the convention. Our purpose is to focus on the fundamental rights enjoyed by all European citizens and residents while also referring to rights bestowed by the other conventions, charters and so on to which member states are parties and of which the European convention on human rights is the outstanding example. First, the charter could emphasise communal values within the European Union. Secondly, it could raise awareness of existing fundamental civil, political and other rights that support human dignity, and oppose all types of discrimination and xenophobia. Thirdly, it could bring out the essential interface between rights and responsibilities for both individuals and Governments. Fourthly, it could declare boldy to European citizens their right to participate in the democratic process, to live, study and work, to provide and receive services and to set up businesses anywhere in the European Union.

The Heads of Government have made it clear that the charter should take account of economic and social rights, as intended in the European social charter and the Community charter on the fundamental social rights of workers. The ambition of the convention should be to highlight clearly the fundamental rights already deriving from treaties and from the Community law system, including case law built up in the European Court of Justice. It should not go beyond that or render void existing national and international law concerning fundamental rights.

It is clear that the charter is not meant at this stage to be a legal document and that such an option of inclusion in the treaties will be considered by the Council later. Despite that undoubted clarity of remit, there has been debate from day one in the convention on whether the charter process is sufficient to meet the challenges facing an ever-expanding Union. Some people see it as an opportunity to create an all-embracing and justiciable treaty-incorporated charter that will take the Union into new waters. The most ambitious protagonists of that view are Members of the European Parliament, most of whom—I speak as a former MEP—see the charter as an opportunity to enlarge and strengthen the European Union and to enhance its citizens' rights. Some MEPs are happy to take up the challenge of the Council's charter remit. A few would like to use the exercise to regain for nation states some of the sovereignty that they have pooled within the European Union. The majority, however, seek a charter that will at least be a protocol of the treaty but which will preferably be a legally binding document that is incorporated into the treaty and which covers all aspects of European Union activity, including common foreign and security policy, justice and home affairs and institutions such as Europol. Of the elected members of the convention, the European Parliament has the most opportunity, time and resources to develop an institutional view of the charter. Six of its committees are providing opinions for the report being prepared by the committee on constitutional affairs.

While the European Parliament wants to travel further beyond the remit of the Council than anyone else, it has allies who share its view that the charter must be legally binding. For example, the Council of Europe wants its own convention to be incorporated into Community law. The European Court of Human Rights would then be responsible for it. Not surprisingly, the court takes the same view. The European ombudsman wants the charter to be legally binding, as do the Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions.

On the other side of the argument are the European Council, the European Commission, most representatives of national Parliaments, and the European Ministers of the German federal states. The scene develops continually and we shall receive many more views in the coming months.

That might become the defining issue of our discussions on the convention. Views have already been expressed on both sides of the argument; convention members have received enough views to fill a book from individuals and organisations on the contents and nature of the charter.

Most members of the convention wish to carry out its remit as provided by the Council. That seems a significant and ambitious task when one bears in mind the paucity of European citizens' knowledge of the European Union. We want to produce a clear statement of fundamental European Union rights, preferably on no more than two sides of an A4 sheet of paper—a formidable task. To give hon. Members a flavour of the rights, I have written—on two sides of an A4 sheet—some of the possible inclusions. Examples are the dignity of the human person, the right to life, liberty and security, access to justice and procedural rights with no retroactive criminal law, respect for privacy and family life, freedom to found a family, freedom of conscience, thought and religion, and freedom of expression.

Some of the rights are fundamental and we can all agree on them. However, should we include a right to a healthy environment, or is that just a worthy political objective? Might consumer rights be included? Are the rights to safety and health, to fair remuneration, to paid holidays, to a pension and to training at work and to social security fundamental, or are they matters that Governments and political parties have as worthy objectives, which should not be included in such a declaration?

EU citizens might be said to have specific rights. Those might include freedom of movement and of residence, the ability to vote and to stand in European and local elections, rights to diplomatic and consulate protection, to petition the European Parliament, to apply to the European ombudsman, not to be subject to discrimination, to have equal access to the Community civil service and the right to write to and to receive letters from the European Commission and its institutions in one's mother tongue. There is a raft of possibilities for discussion. All my examples, and many more rights that I have not mentioned, can be referred back to a treaty, convention or charter to which the European Union, or its member states, has signed.

There will be problems to overcome. There might be an issue of the fundamental rights of non-citizens who fall within the scope of European Union legislation, such as workers from countries outside the Union. We must also remember that the Council might be minded to incorporate the charter into the treaty at a later stage. The charter should, perhaps, be a two-phase document. One phase could include the clear, concise and crucial statement of rights to which I have referred; the second could be a more detailed document, providing the relevant treaty, convention and charter references from which the fundamental rights were derived. Although the charter may not be a justiciable document, European Union citizens will be able to find out, by referring to the back-up document, what parts of the treaty and other documents may give them recourse to law.

However challenging the task may be, it will not be enough for those who want to create a legally binding charter immediately, going beyond the current competencies of the European Union to create an all-singing, all-dancing, all-embracing charter of fundamental rights. If time allows, the convention could consider, in a separate document, strongly perceived gaps and shortcomings in current enforceable fundamental rights in the European Union—an annexe of aspirations, so to speak. The two issues need to be clearly separated. I look forward to the convention's completing, in the next eight months, its primary task of drawing up a charter of fundamental rights of the European Union, declaring to all its citizens the rights that they hold under the treaties and other instruments of the European Union and its member states.

At this point I would have mentioned some of the fundamental statements made by key players in the convention process, but because many hon. Members obviously want to take part in the debate, I shall sit down and listen keenly.

Ms Jenny Jones (Wolverhampton, South-West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on securing this Adjournment debate. The issue may not be the stuff of headlines—"EU proposes charter of fundamental rights"—but it is important and needs airing. We need to be rigorous in scrutinising the purpose of the charter and its implications.

I do not regard myself as a Europhobe in my own party or by anyone's parliamentary standards. I am an enthusiastic supporter of human rights. On the face of it, the European Union intends by the charter to make the issue of human rights more visible to citizens of member states and thereby to raise the profile of human rights protection. I am sure that we all enthusiastically support that aim, particularly since the passing of the Human Rights Act 1998. However, the issue is controversial.

The nub of the matter is that we already have a European convention on human rights. It was drawn up 50 years ago, mainly by British lawyers. The European Court of Human Rights has 50 years of experience and expertise and has amassed considerable case law. We send to the Council of Europe a sizeable United Kingdom delegation, which works hard and is well respected, led by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis).

The charter was debated on 25 January at the last meeting of the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly, and a clear position was set out. The Select Committee on European Scrutiny has taken a keen interest. It spent two days in Brussels in December, and took evidence from several key players in the drafting of the charter.

Several important questions need answers. First, what will be the status of the proposed charter? My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend began to deal with the issue, but it is worrying that although a drafting body is to work intensively for eight months, it is still unclear whether the resulting charter will be legally binding. If it will, thereby enabling citizens of European Union member states to take grievances or breaches of fundamental rights to the European Court of Justice, there will be two courts in Europe that deal with human or fundamental rights. I am not a lawyer, but will not that lead to confusion and competition between the two courts? Human rights protection should not be a matter of competition. If the ultimate aim of the EU is to write the charter into a treaty, it can do that simply by taking up the invitation that the Council of Europe's parliamentary assembly extended to it on 25 January this year to incorporate the European convention on human rights into a Community treaty.

Two other issues have important implications. First, the proposed charter could send out the signal that we are creating a two-tier system of human rights protection within Europe. The Council of Europe, with 41 members, has a much larger membership than the EU. Even with the proposed EU enlargement, EU membership could appear to provide a superior protection to the remaining 26 members of the Council of Europe. In the context of a wider Europe in which we are trying to incorporate many eastern European countries, it would not be wise to advocate such divisive action. The implementation of human rights should not be a matter of competition between the EU and the Council of Europe.

The second issue raises the question of what the charter says about the Council of Europe. What are we to make of what is going on? What signals does it send out? Although the issue has not been readily picked up by the national press, on 8 February The Independent carried an article on the charter. In the first paragraph, its legal affairs correspondent described the charter as replacing

"the outdated European Convention on Human Rights."

Although that is the correspondent's reading of what is going on, it is interesting that a serious newspaper should choose to print that opinion.

Mr. Win Griffiths: That was one reason why I wanted the debate. The claim was outrageous and far from anything that had been discussed. One of the charter's great sensitivities is how to ensure that the European convention on human rights remains a pre-eminent player. We are looking at the issue of signing up so that the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg continues to play a pre-eminent role.

Ms Jones: I thank my hon. Friend for making that statement, but even if the correspondent in The Independent is wrong, the paper has a wide readership. Its interpretation of why the charter has been drafted showed how it decided to read the signals.

In conclusion, I am not a Europhobe, but we need to question why the Government need to sign up to a charter. We have the Human Rights Act 1998 and are active in the Council of Europe. I am not convinced that the charter will build on our experience or benefit UK citizens any more than they benefit from the 1998 Act. We need to tread cautiously.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) I must advise hon. Members that an informal protocol allows Front-Bench spokesman to use the final 30 minutes to respond to the debate. The hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), who introduced the debate, considerately curtailed his comments to make time for other hon. Members. I know that several right hon. Members wish to make a contribution, so I ask them to bear it in mind that we have only about 30 minutes for the debate.

11.30 am

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on obtaining the debate. I applaud the fact that he is obviously ahead of the game because as yet awareness of this topic is low. I can comply with your request to be brief, Mr. Cook, because the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones) has covered much of the ground that I intended to cover. I wanted to pose exactly the question that she posed: what is the charter all about? The hon. Lady was right to emphasise that the issue is controversial. As a former colleague of the hon. Lady at the Council of Europe, I am only too well aware of the existing convention and European Court of Human Rights. One has a certain apprehension about the prospect of another court being created to deal with such matters. Many institutions, at home and abroad, could be made to work better, and it would be in our long-term interests to try to make existing institutions work better instead of creating rival institutions, which is likely to lead to the problems mentioned by the hon. Lady.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must remind hon. Members that this is not a Committee. This is a sitting of the House and I am a Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Gill: I do apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My concern is that, in Europe today, we see the establishment of rival institutions to those that have served Europe tolerably well since they were created in the aftermath of the second world war. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West referred to the Council of Europe, which now represents 41 nations. That represents a broader body of opinion than does the European Union, which comprises only 15 nations.

However, it is not only in relation to human rights that we see the European Union making a grab for more territory. We can see the corpus juris proposals coming down the track, which will challenge, and perhaps ultimately take over, national jurisprudence. Only yesterday, I read in the newspapers that European Union Foreign Ministers took a major step towards the creation of a European army, in that they approved an embryonic military staff with an operational role in early warning and strategic planning. Of course, colleagues on the Benches to my left, who are all members of the Western European Union as well as the Council of Europe, know exactly what the European Union said very recently about the future of the WEU. In creating euroland, the European Union is creating an alternative form of currency to national currencies. I am concerned that this debate about the charter of fundamental rights offers another illustration of how the European Union is trying to take over something that already exists and does not need to be duplicated, especially as it is questionable whether the new convention will be any more successful than the current institutions.

The reason why I felt moved to speak in the debate, albeit briefly, is that although politicians on the continent are frank about their aims, objectives and long-term aspirations, in this country we still pretend that certain things will not happen; we pretend that the European Union will not be able to grab more powers in more areas. It is greatly to the credit of the hon. Member for Bridgend that he has given us the opportunity to debate these matters and, as I said earlier, my interest in the debate is in flagging up the fact that the European Union is making a grab for territory that it does not need to make a bid for. I suspect that the British public, and Members of Parliament, are unaware of what is going on and unaware of where we are being led. We should take note of the report of the words of Romano Prodi, the President of the European Commission, 10 days ago. Under the headline, "Commission becoming a government, says Prodi," it stated:

"Europe is forging its own government and army, Romano Prodi, president of the European Commission claimed yesterday."

I am grateful to have the opportunity to flag up the dangers involved when our own politicians are economical with the truth.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on securing the debate. He beat me and my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones) to the draw; we had decided that once the debate on the Ilisu dam was out of the way, we were going to apply for a debate on the proposed European charter because of our anxiety about some of the statements made in Strasbourg about attitudes to it.

As other hon. Members seem to be bearing their breast on their attitudes to Europe, I shall do the same. I am happy about the euro, federalism holds no problems for me and loss of sovereignty does not mean a great deal. What is important, however, is that we have working institutions and that, as Members of Parliament, we can defend the interests of our constituents and our country as best we can in those institutions. I am happy about what is taking place and I wish that we had already signed up to the euro.

Having nailed my colours to the mast, I now explain my grave concern about the proposed charter of human rights. The charter has grown like Topsy; it started as a proposal to have a European ombudsman within the European Community to deal with malpractice in administration, just as our ombudsman does. People with a grievance about what was happening in Europe and its institutions would be able to go to the ombudsman, which was perfect and proper. However, in Cologne, the idea grew a new dimension and went onwards and upwards. People said, "Perhaps we should do something about a charter of human rights," and "Perhaps we should have something that is justiciable," and "Perhaps we should take everything over and take everything in." It is obvious from the work load that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend described that it would be startling and fantastic to try to get through so much in eight months or a year.

I have no objection to a general charter on "The Rights of Man", or a proclamation, as in 1916, setting out basic, fundamental human rights. That would be fine, great, splendid. The problem arises when such a charter becomes justiciable. We and our fellow members of the Council of Europe have spent many years reforming the European Court of Justice, changing and streamlining its procedures and the appointment of its judges to meet the extra work load resulting from the expansion of the Council of Europe. A great deal of important work is likely to be thrown down the drain if the European Union produces a set of justiciable principles.

My hon Friend the Member for Bridgend referred to conflicting jurisdictions and different courts reaching different decisions. The court at Luxembourg already has some human rights jurisdiction arising from the treaties. That was one of the problems that we sought to raise when the Maastricht and Amsterdam treaties were being negotiated, because it created a possible area of conflict. The powers that be at that time did not consider it so large, but now it is likely to to be very large indeed. Therefore, our first problem is one of conflicting jurisdictions However, what is more important to me, and what most concerns me, is the prospect that the conflict may split the membership of the Council of Europe between the rich countries that are members of the European Union, and the countries that are not and are never likely to be, under the present terms and conditions.

One of the Council of Europe's strengths has been the fact that former communist countries and countries that have broken away from the Soviet Union have been admitted under strict conditions regarding the application of human rights. Indeed, Belarus is outside the Council of Europe because it cannot meet the requirements. We have had problems with countries such as Ukraine over the death penalty, abolition of which we were eventually able to achieve through the force of the Council of Europe's moral persuasion. Less than 18 months ago, a large number of people were on death row in Ukraine. Those who were to be executed did not know when they would be executed, and their families did not know two months after the execution. The pressure exerted by the Council of Europe changed that situation. We can do it by saying "You must meet these standards." However, if there are to be two rival jurisdictions, with the European Union countries looking to Luxembourg rather than to Strasbourg, there will be one court for the rich countries—the established countries—and another for lesser breeds without the law, and that will be a real problem.

One of the strengths of the struggling democratic parties in those countries is that, against precedents or Governments seeking to be dictatorial, they can turn round and say, "We have the convention on human rights. We must abide by that. When decisions have gone against countries like Britain and Germany"— a large number of decisions have gone against the British Government—"those countries have nevertheless accepted the decisions and worked the system." If we have gone away and a weak grouping is left outside, the pressure to follow the European convention on human rights and so on will be limited. Those countries want to be in, but if we take ourselves one step further away, it will be much more difficult to enforce those rights internationally in Europe among the struggling democracies that have weak judiciaries, poor social services, corrupt police forces and terrible administration systems, because they will be seen to be separate and apart. The European Union and the convention looking at those matters should seriously consider that point. Justice should be universal, it should not be confined to the rich few in the centre. We should be able to expand it in that way.

I hope that a fine statement of principles will emerge from the convention, but the principles that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend read out started off like articles 1 and 2 of the convention on human rights, so why are we repeating them in that way? Can we put into a justiciable document matters relating to social policy, much of which I support, but which will differ from country to country and may cause the Europhobes to foam at the mouth? There are matters that should properly be the responsibility of member states, and it is right that as many decisions as possible be taken at a lower level. However, universal principles of justice should be a matter not merely for the European Union but for Europe as a whole. It is regrettable that the United States has not signed the universal declaration of human rights; had it done so, the whole world might have a proper scheme.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): We are all grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) for taking this opportunity to report in detail on his work for what I prefer to call the drafting committee for the charter, rather than a convention, because there has been a tendency to confuse it with the convention on human rights. I hope that he will seek further opportunities to initiate such debates during the next eight months; otherwise, I feel sure that our hon. Friends will.

It is clear that hon. Members share a common view on the matter. I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), who used to be a member of the delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. Although there may be differences of emphasis, the common concern among hon. Members is the development of the charter for human rights. As leader of the United Kingdom delegation, I can say that none of its members would disagree with the general thrust of what has been said this morning on the effects of duplication.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Ludlow when he says—I hope that I am quoting him correctly—that politicians on the continent take a different view. My experience has been that politicians in Parliaments throughout the 41 member states in the Council of Europe have expressed concerns similar to ours.

Mr. Gill: My point was that European politicians take an approach to Europe that differs from that of their British counterparts, inasmuch as they spell out exactly what they want to achieve. In this country, we are not so frank, although we may be heading for the same destination. I doubt whether members of the Council of Europe take the view that the right hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Davis: I would never suggest that the hon. Member for Ludlow was less than frank in his views. My point is that politicians in national Parliaments in other member states of the Council of Europe are concerned about the implications of the charter for human rights, particularly in respect of duplication, and for two reasons.

First, if there is a curse in Europe, it is the constant petty jealousy among organisations such as the European Union, the Council of Europe and the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe. There is constant jockeying for position, and a constant wish to take—as the hon. Member for Ludlow described it—and duplicate anything that is popular. Indeed, the charter for human rights owes its genesis to growing disillusion among many member states with the European Union itself, and a search was undertaken to find a measure that could enhance its popularity.

Nevertheless, looking at the matter objectively, there may be advantages in having some kind of charter or declaration, provided we avoid the disadvantages, which my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Ludlow have eloquently described. The problem with duplication is not only the confusion that would arise if there were two conventions or charters that were both subject to legal proceedings—as my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) explained—but the confusion that would arise if there were two courts, which would be even worse if they reached different decisions.

Another big disadvantage, which I ask the Minister to take particularly into account, is that duplication equals waste. It results in additional, unnecessary expenditure. It is no good telling us that the additional expenditure would come from Community resources. It would be a burden, however great or small, for the British taxpayer in two ways—through our Government's expenditure and because the resources of the European Union ultimately come from its citizens. We should be concerned about that expenditure, and I hope that the Minister and his Government colleagues will take the matter seriously into account.

11.50 am

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on securing the debate. It has been a useful first canter round the course of the subject, and I am sure that we shall return to it on many occasions. A common thread has emerged in that hon. Members from a wide range of parties have expressed a cautious approach to the suggested changes. I shall explain the Liberal Democrats' stance in due course.

I should like to set out the fundamental principles that should form the underlying benchmarks by which we judge any changes to European Community legislation—in this case, whether we want to make progress towards a new charter. One of the most important benchmarks is the question whether the charter would do anything to help individuals throughout Europe. My view of British and European politics is that our activities should centre on releasing the potential of individuals throughout the Community. Ensuring that fundamental human rights are in place, and enhancing those rights, is an important factor in that. How that is to be achieved is a big question, to which the charter could provide part of the solution. From that perspective, we welcome the initial discussions that are taking place.

Although the Liberal Democrats welcomed the Human Rights Act 1998, we should like the Government to go further and introduce an equality Bill that would extend some of the areas that are not covered by the 1998 Act.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): On that point, does my hon. Friend agree that one of the problems with the European convention on human rights is the fact that it does not tackle issues such as age discrimination and same-sex relationships, or address problems that arise in respect of new information technology and e-commerce? Those issues are very much in the frame in terms of human rights, which is one of the reasons why an equality Bill should be considered.

Mr. Oaten: My hon. Friend makes an important point. A great deal of work remains to be done on existing legislation before we move too quickly into other areas. Given my hon. Friend's role on the committee with responsibility for scrutiny, I am sure that he will be able to raise some of those points.

Mr. McNamara: With regard to the convention's being outdated, is the hon. Gentleman aware that a new protocol that will provide sexual and gender equality has just been passed?

Mr. Oaten: Clearly, we welcome that. Some of the new issues that are emerging need time to bed down so that we can judge their effectiveness, and any additions during that period could cause problems in their implementation.

The Liberal Democrats are committed to reforming Europe and developing a charter of human rights for the European Union. That will be a fundamental step in the right direction. For 50 years, Europe has co-operated heavily in the economic sphere. Over the next 50 years, the focus should shift to co-operation not only on regulation, but on the rights of individuals. The charter could redefine that, and help to make people more aware that the Eurpoean Union has a role for them as individuals in future.

Why is change necessary? A layman might think that the European convention on human rights already provided enough protection in the EU, but he would be wrong. Unlike our national courts, the European Court of Justice cannot give direct effect to the European convention on human rights because that convention is not an integral part of the EU. EU treaties have no code of human rights, and the European Court of Human Rights is not able to redress the situation when EU institutions, rather than individual member states, breach convention rights, because the EU has not acceded to the ECHR. In this context, there are loopholes, and we need to improve the situation.

I move on from those questions of ideals to the more difficult question of how a charter might work. Many issues need to be considered and we should not underestimate the complexity of the task in hand. First, on the difficult question of subsidiarity, the Cologne Council made it explicit that the charter of fundamental rights was not an attempt to subvert the current constitutional order of member states and that it should strengthen the EU's identity and policies. That is the right approach. Secondly, the charter must not reduce the rights of citizens—on the contrary, it should, if possible, safeguard such rights in each member state. That, too, is right and proper. Thirdly, the charter should enhance rather than undermine the European convention on human rights, which I agree needs enhancing. We welcome some reforms, but the ECHR is, in many respects, rather old fashioned and its application in EU countries has been rather uneven. The ECHR of 1950 is common to all member states, but not all subsequent protocols have been signed or ratified by member states.

Mr. Chidgey: That is extremely important. The ECHR is 16 pages long, but the number of reservations and declarations runs to 60 pages. That clearly shows that there is a need to clean up the document and to make it more relevant to the modern world.

Mr. Oaten: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that point. Perhaps the charter will help to generate reforms and improve our current procedures.

[Mr. Oaten]

One of the most difficult problems involves the date at which, and the extent to which, the charter should encroach on national preferences. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones) discussed what the charter's legal character would be in that context. It is crucial to get it right.

We could pursue various options to reach a solution. First, a proclamation could be used to give the EU a human face, which would involve a set of values or a written document. However, that would be a wasted opportunity if it failed to close some of the current loopholes. Secondly, a declaration could be issued that described the current state of affairs, informed EU institutions of their duties and used a stronger form of wording. A third option would involve using a protocol and amending the treaty so as to oblige the European Court of Justice and member states to be informed of its terms. Should that approach be enshrined in the treaty? Should that requirement be enforceable in national courts, and should individuals have direct access to the European Court of Justice as a matter of last resort? Or, bluntly, are we going too fast and too far, and should we pause while we put some of the institutions in place?

I was attracted by the two-phase approach that the hon. Member for Bridgend suggested. There is merit in that approach, which might involve firm time scales that would ensure that we achieved targets before moving on.

Liberal Democrats believe that there is logic in moving towards a structure that incorporates the charter, but that we should avoid creating a two-tier system, which the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) discussed. I was taken by his observation that a two-tier system might allow poor and richer countries to be treated differently. It would be a nonsense if two different legal opinions competed over the issue of rights.

The common-sense approach involves accepting that existing structures improve performance radically and that additional elements could be added. Much can be done to reform the European Court of Justice and the European Court of Human Rights, which should take on some of the new elements that could be added to them. It should also be a priority that they should be in a position to cope with enlargement by up to 12 new member states over the next few years.

One need only ask any farmer—I acknowledge that this is not directly related to the issue—whether it makes sense to have a battle lasting nearly two years in the European courts to resolve the beef issue. Our current systems are too slow and need to be improved. The incorporation of the European convention on human rights into United Kingdom law is a welcome development, but is an on-going process. It will take a considerable time for our judicial systems to adjust to it.

In conclusion, we welcome the Government's approach, but we suggest that it should be a cautious one. If we ensure that our current institutions are up to speed, in order and providing a good service for people, we can then ensure that the convention and the changes relating to the new charter can be brought on track. At this stage, however, we should monitor progress carefully to make sure that that happens at a time appropriate to the best interests of individuals throughout Europe.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on raising this important issue. It has not been the focus of much public attention, and today's debate will concentrate minds on what is happening, give hon. Members an opportunity to express their concerns—they have already made some very pertinent observations—and allow the Government to clarify their position.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the mandate for the establishment of the charter was set out in Cologne in June 1999. That made it clear that the charter would contain rights and freedoms set out in the European convention as well as rights pertaining to European Union citizens. It also stated that account should be taken of economic and social rights. The Cologne communiqué, which was approved by the Prime Minister, clearly allows the drafting convention to set out a wide-ranging and far-reaching set of rights, should it wish to do so. Initial indications show that that is exactly what is happening.

Two claims have been made. First, it was said that the charter would cover only existing rights. Secondly, it was said that it would not be legally binding. Those assertions have been repeated on a number of occasions, and I would like to explore them in this debate. However, I should first like to comment on the observations made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones). She asked some important questions about the status and applicability of the charter, a point that was amplified well by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill).

The Foreign Secretary told the House of Commons that "we are not proposing a constitution of Europe. We are proposing that a charter of rights should codify in a single place the rights that already exist in European legislation . . . we broadly welcome that European charter of rights".—[Official Report, 25 May 1999; Vol. 332, c. 184.]

Moreover, the Minister of State told the House:

"I made it clear in my evidence to the Scrutiny Committee that it is a charter of existing rights. It sets out the rights that have been granted to EU citizens as a result of treaties and legislation. It is not binding or enforceable. It is a charter, as we have said, not a new treaty."—[Official Report, 1 December 1999; Vol. 340, c. 400-401.]

However, we are now rather used to hearing such reassurances from the Government. We have heard them in the past, and they are frequently not matched by reality. We are used to being told that items that have been agreed at European level pose no threat, only to find that they are far more integrationist than anything originally envisaged—or, more important, supported—by the British people. We are used to Ministers saying one thing in Britain and signing up to something rather different in Brussels. We must read the small print carefully.

The Government must provide concrete guarantees on some of the fundamental issues arising from the charter. They must provide a specific guarantee that a whole new set of wide-ranging rights will not be created at a European level. It is becoming clear that the extent of rights discussed by the convention goes far beyond anything already contained in the treaties. During its second plenary session earlier this month, the convention was reported to have accepted, as a working basis, a list of so-called rights drawn up by its secretariat. That list includes economic and social rights, such as the right to work; rights governing working conditions, including rights to fair pay, weekly rest and paid leave; collective rights including worker information and consultation; and a right to strike. It includes social protection rights such as a right to health, social protection, health insurance, maternity protection, and integration of disabled people.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I pointed out earlier that those were merely subjects for discussion. In relation to some of the rights mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, I questioned whether they were fundamental rights or objectives that political parties might regard as good to put in their manifestos. We should not regard the convention as a monolith that will swallow any view wholesale. I hope that my earlier speech outlined the different strands of opinion on the matter.

Mr. Spring: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. I accept that diverse views exist. The question is what will ultimately happen. At a European level, rights have been amplified and expanded, which creates all sorts of problems. I want to address that point with regard to nation states. At first glance, we can all agree with the hon. Gentleman on the broad aim of improving provision for European citizens in most areas. However, who defines those rights? Who decides whether current employment legislation in Britain contravenes a European right to strike? Who decides whether the current level of the minimum wage constitutes fair pay? Who decides whether the Government's changes to incapacity benefit will contravene rights to social protection and the integration of disabled people? Will the Government guarantee that the charter will include only rights already established in the treaties?

The second fundamental issue is whether the charter will be integrated into the treaties, and whether that will cause it to be legally enforceable through the European Court of Justice. That is the approach favoured by the European Parliament. The British Liberal Democrat Member of the European Parliament, Andrew Duff, who is one of the European Parliament's rapporteurs on the matter, has reportedly called for a binding charter, and for the European Union to have a legal personality so that it may subscribe to the European convention on human rights. Liberal Democrat Members of the European Parliament voted for the charter to have a legally binding effect.

When Lord Goldsmith, who is the Government's representative, submitted a paper that placed emphasis on the need to adopt a simple text that could have maximum public impact, the representative from the Dutch Parliament responded:

"We are not here to draw up a brochure to promote Europe but to draw up a legal text, transposable into law".

Many have expressed concern about recent judgments by the European Court of Human Rights. An example was the appeal by the killers of James Bulger. Concern has been expressed about the effect of incorporating the convention into UK law, especially in Scotland, where it is already enforced. Examples exist of Scottish law being judged incompatible with European human rights law. It would be wholly unacceptable to have a new tranche of so-called rights forced on Britain by a European court that has a track record of interpreting treaty articles in an integrationist way. The charter may start as a non-binding statement, but it may not end up that way. The social chapter, for example, started life as a non-binding statement. It is now incorporated into the treaty, and allows social legislation to be imposed on Britain, often by qualified majority voting.

That is how integration in Europe evolves—step by step. Others have recognised the reality of that. As one contributor to the convention's second meeting noted:

"Even if it is not our intention to adopt a text with legal value, we must be careful as this text could become binding."

It is worth recalling that Commission President Romano Prodi has boasted about this process. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow alluded to that. Only a few days ago Mr. Prodi boasted to The Independent that "step by step" the Commission was behaving "like a growing government".

First, we are given a list of generalised principles. Then there is a far-reaching range of broad so-called rights. First there is non-binding statement, and then there is a treaty chapter incorporated into the treaties and enforceable in the European Court of Justice. First there is a bland outline of generalised aims, and then there is a charter for wide-ranging interference in British law.

Mr. Oaten: The hon. Gentleman has set out a course of activity. Where would the British Conservative party draw the line?

Mr. Spring: I hope to receive some clear assurances from the Government about exactly where they are drawing the line. We will certainly wish to respond in detail to that information. We all look forward to hearing the Minister in a few minutes.

The second guarantee that we seek is that the charter will never be incorporated into the treaty or be made legally enforceable. That is a guarantee that the Foreign Secretary signally failed to provide when challenged by the shadow Foreign Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), in the House yesterday. For many, the charter is all part of a wider integrationist agenda in Europe. The integrationists are pushing for a European Union with its own Government, army, taxes, foreign policy, criminal justice system, constitution and concept of citizenship as well as currency—in other words, a single European state. It is vital that this charter does not become part of that process. It is vital that the Government stand up for the view of the mainstream majority of the British public. It is vital that they end the process of marching, step by step, towards a single European state.

12.12 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Keith Vaz): I begin, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by apologising again for being late for the start of this debate. As I explained to the Deputy Speaker at the time, I was addressing a meeting of students who had come over with the Queen of Denmark as part of the state visit and I was unavoidably delayed. I apologise to hon. Members for keeping them waiting.

I join in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on his success in securing the debate. As he has the support of those sitting next to him, he was bound to be successful in the ballot. I am delighted to see so many other hon. Members present, including the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) who, as usual, wants to broaden out the debate into other matters. I shall deal with all the arguments.

This is an excellent opportunity to hear from my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend about the excellent work that he and others are doing on the drafting body of the charter of rights. This is perhaps our only mechanism to get a report back on what is happening. I hope that he will be successful again in the near future so that he may give us an update on what is happening there. There is no point in hearing from the man who is reading the manuscript when one can hear from the man who is writing the book.

We welcome the fact that we have two excellent representatives, from the House and the other place. We have another excellent representative, the Prime Minister's representative Lord Goldsmith, who was appointed at the start of this procedure and who comes to the task, unlike my hon. Friend, as a lawyer. He is perhaps one of the most eminent silks of his generation. It is good to have three such outstanding people at the drafting body of the charter of rights. All in the House will welcome the fact that the United Kingdom's place is assured by having such good representation.

A number of hon. Members mentioned the Cologne conclusions. It may be helpful to read out paragraph 44, which states:

"The European Council takes the view that, at the present stage of development of the European Union, the fundamental rights applicable at Union level should be consolidated in a charter and thereby made more evident."

That is why the charter of rights was set up which, as the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) said, the Prime Minister was glad to approve. We all feel that it is high time for a document to be produced that clarifies the rights and responsibilities of European citizens and is submitted to the European Council and the people of Europe.

The charter of rights is part of the Government's reform agenda on the European Union. The charter will set out existing legal rights enfranchising the people of Europe. New rights will not be added, as it would be inappropriate for the drafting body to legislate on behalf of the European Union. That is partly because the charter body is outside existing EU structures, a set-up which enables us to have representatives such as Lord Goldsmith, who can give the drafting bodies expertise and insight that Members of this House and various European Parliaments may not have.

I am amazed that the hon. Member for West Suffolk suggested that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend was talking about an attempt to legislate. There is no such attempt. As European citizens, we already have rights and responsibilities.

My hon. Friends the Members for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) and for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones) have asked whether there will be any overlap with the European convention on human rights. I hope that there will not, which is why we have representatives who, to use the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis), ensure that duplication and waste do not occur. My right hon. Friend is a veteran of the Council of Europe and knows how important it is that European institutions do not duplicate the work of other bodies.

Of course, there will be some common issues. However, the drafting body will ensure that there is no duplication. We will set out the source of existing rights in the European convention if, indeed, there are any such rights. I therefore commend to the House Lord Goldsmith's effective paper, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. It sets out a user-friendly approach to the whole process, stating clearly in ordinary, simple language what people's rights are and the source of those rights.

That is the background to the charter of rights. The hon. Member for Ludlow expects my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend and his colleagues to write a great constitution. However, I must disabuse him of that notion. If my hon. Friend and five Europeans were to meet in a café in Brussels for a cup of tea, the hon. Member for Ludlow would believe that they were plotting the formation of a superstate. He must calm down, as there are no shadows in the charter of rights. There is no possibility of any advance on the Cologne conclusions, which were repeated by President Herzog of the charter drafting committee, and others. So the hon. Gentleman need not worry.

The hon. Member for West Suffolk asked about the European army. There is no such army. No decision was taken on Monday or Tuesday to have a European army. I was present when a decision was taken that was in line with the policy of successive Governments, Conservative and Labour—that Europe should have the capability to deal with crisis management in Europe: the so-called Petersberg tasks.

Mr. Spring: The Minister may misunderstand the point. The President of the Commission has expressed a wish to move towards a European army. The Commission is driving the agenda towards an integrationist Europe, with all its attendant institutions. That is obvious; it is on the record and has been said before. I hope that the Minister will reject that viewpoint now.

Mr. Vaz: The hon. Gentleman is obsessed with the sayings—or alleged sayings—of Romano Prodi. I welcome the hon. Gentleman formally to the Front Bench as shadow Minister for Europe. I can take him with me on my next trip to Brussels so that he can see what is happening—[Interruption.] I had only a brief lunch on Monday because we were busy dealing with important issues. When he goes to Brussels, the hon. Gentleman will find that the representatives of the United Kingdom—at official and ministerial level—fight extremely hard to maintain the interests of this country. We fight our corner as everyone else does, but we also believe in the notion of Europe—a Europe of nation states, as my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said in the House of Commons yesterday.

Let us not get carried away with the European superstate, with the charter of rights as a European constitution, or with the allegation that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), Lord Goldsmith, Lord Bowness and others are seeking to stick things in which we shall not find out about. I want to make it clear to the House of Commons that we shall see the fruits of our efforts in draft form. Although the Commission and European Parliament are more than welcome to their opinions and more than welcome to try to shape the debate as they have always done, the final decision on the proposals rests with the European Council. I was asked whether the decision would be legally binding—

Mr. McNamara: Will the House of Commons have an opportunity to debate the draft proposals before a decision is taken?

Mr. Vaz: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend and others will seek every opportunity to debate these matters. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North knows, I and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary always come to the House of Commons to debate forthcoming European Council events. We did so before Helsinki and we shall do so again before Nice. It is hoped that the process will be completed this year. There will be ample opportunity to question Ministers through the mechanisms that have been established to facilitate debate.

Hon. Members should not wait for a debate in the House to debate the charter of rights. The hon. Members for Ludlow and for West Suffolk can e-mail and write to Lord Goldsmith, to my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend and to Lord Bowness if they wish to pursue a point. They can even write to me and they will receive a reply. There are many opportunities for hon. Members to present their views on this important issue.

I wish to make it clear that the Government regard the charter of rights as extremely important. For the first time ever, European citizens will know their rights and responsibilities. The user-friendly approach adopted by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend and by Lord Goldsmith is the right approach. For too long, people have believed that the European Union is shrouded in mystery. It attracts the attention of people such as the hon. Member for Ludlow, who believe that sinister actions are taking place in Strasbourg and Brussels. They believe that terrible things happen at our meetings in the shadows and margins of the European Union. That is simply not the case.

The charter of rights represents a first step on the way to explaining in simple and user-friendly language exactly how people benefit from membership of the European Union. I do not yet know the final form that it will take. It could be a small pledge card or a larger document. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend will have his way and it will be on two sides of A4 paper. The Foreign Secretary and those who serve on the drafting body, as well as myself, want to ensure that it will not be a legalistic document incomprehensible to people in Ludlow, Ipswich, Winchester or Hull. It must be relevant to people's lives.

The constant thrust from the Conservative party—although not from the Liberal Democrats—is that everything that happens in relation to Europe is negative. When we go to our European Council meetings and when my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend and others attend meetings of the drafting bodies, we make a valuable contribution. In the 18 weeks since I became a Minister, I have been overwhelmed by the support that the United Kingdom has received in leading and guiding debate on the European Union. The enlargement process that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary announced in the House only yesterday gives us another opportunity to ensure that the rights, responsibilities and values that we hold so dear in the European Union can be exported to the new applicant countries. This is a great opportunity to show Europe—and the whole world—the benefits of the EU. I hope that hon. Members will continue to support the work that is being done so that we have a charter of rights of which we can be proud.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. We can proceed to the next debate, but I would ask those hon. Members who wish to leave to do so quietly now.

Rail Services (North London)

12.26 pm

Ms Joan Ryan (Enfield, North): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of rail services in north London in general, but particularly those in my constituency of Enfield, North.

My request for the debate was prompted by the deterioration of rail services to Enfield and the consequent loss of confidence of my constituents who, for reasons that I shall come to later, are dependent on the train operating company West Anglia Great Northern or WAGN. Their fears are compounded by the news that many train operating companies are renegotiating to have their franchises extended. I do not object to that in principle. We all understand that to bring about the levels of service that we require, it is not unrealistic for train companies to have a reasonable period in which to reap the benefits of their investment.

I believe that most of my constituents wholeheartedly support the Government's attempts to shift traffic from the roads by encouraging more extensive use of railways and I think that they would also understand many of the problems involved in trying to achieve that. None the less, the shortfall in service delivery with current user levels undermines the prospect of success.

The London borough of Enfield estimates that it has seen an increase in road traffic of approximately 1.5 per cent. each year for the past 30 years. That clearly demonstrates that the problem is not new and that the Government are right to pursue an integrated transport system. While I intend to concentrate on the example of Enfield, I am certain from discussions with hon. Members who represent other north London constituencies that much of what I say today will echo the concerns of many thousands of other rail users throughout the region. I know that my hon. Friends the Members for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) and for Edmonton (Mr. Love) share my concerns. I was also approached by other hon. Members who have in turn been approached by their constituents and by business representatives on this matter, particularly regarding urgent need for improvement in lateral routes such as the East London line.

WAGN is a subsidiary of Prism Rail. In 1997 it was awarded the franchise for the London, Peterborough, Cambridge, King's Lynn and Stansted lines operating from Liverpool Street, Moorgate and King's Cross stations. The contract was for seven years and three months, so is due to expire in 2004. Those rail services go through my constituency and provide essential passenger rail transport from nine stations in Enfield, North—from Enfield Chase, Gordon Hill and Crews Hill in the west, and Southbury, Turkey Street, Ponders End, Brimsdown and Enfield Lock on the eastern lines and Enfield Town. I say essential services because unlike many other parts of north London there are no rail alternatives for commuters from Enfield, North. The underground does not extend as far as Enfield, North and road transport into central London is barely an option, due to congestion and travelling time.

Enfield borough council estimates that some 10,000 people use the railways to travel from Enfield to work each day and that a further 1,500 use the service to travel to Enfield to work each day. I rely on the service from Enfield Chase station into Finsbury park or Highbury and Islington to pick up the underground to Westminster. Although I use this service regularly, I am indebted to the Enfield rail user groups, which represent many of my constituents, for the broad range of data that they have collected from each of the lines through Enfield, North. I make particular mention of the Enfield Lock rail user group and the business user group, which have provided specific information on the shortcomings of WAGN's services for both private passengers and business and industry in Enfield.

In December last year, the three Enfield Labour MPs invited WAGN's managing director, Euan Cameron, to make the journey from Turkey Street in Enfield, North through Edmonton Green to Liverpool Street to see at first hand the service that rail users receive. To his credit, he was happy to take part. He discussed with us the various problems, which he also discussed with rail user groups' representatives. Mr. Cameron, in an earlier letter to me, was candid enough to concede that the service provided by WAGN had been unacceptable.

The purpose of the journey was to identify specific areas where urgent improvement is needed. Those problems were further highlighted at the Enfield transport users forum in December and again in the community debate in January, both events being initiated by Enfield council. They were welcome initiatives under its agenda for modernising local government.

The shadow strategic rail authority makes it clear that one of the prime proposals for replacement franchises is to reduce perceived barriers to switching from car to public transport, but the experience of many who participated in our local forum made clear the extent of the problem, including increasing overcrowding on trains. WAGN conceded that there has been a 7 per cent. growth in the number of passengers during peak hours and an overall increase of 12 per cent. in two years—something that we should welcome—yet there are no additional trains serving this already overcrowded route.

Mr. Lloyd Tew Cragg of the Enfield Lock rail user group has written to me, and to WAGN, to describe the experience of his fellow passengers. His group is nicknamed, with typical gallows humour, the mushroom club, as each morning commuters on the Lee Valley line remark to each other when they have boarded their train, "There's not mushroom in here, is there?" Mr. Tew Gragg also highlights the remarkable practice of trains failing to stop at certain stations if they are running late. I understand that rail operators are judged to have failed punctuality targets only if trains complete their entire journey late. Therefore trains running late at certain stages of the route can make up lost time simply by missing out whole stations. The consequences are obvious. Passengers are stranded at those stations until the arrival of the next service, which outside peak hours, can be as much as 45 minutes later. That places an additional burden on already overcrowded trains and stations as passengers who would have expected to depart on a previous service are forced to compete for space on a later train.

Trains running along the Lee Valley line during peak hours are scheduled only every 30 minutes. The disruption caused to people with appointments or obligations by cancelled trains or those that do not stop is all too easy to imagine. This problem is further exacerbated by a lack of information for passengers about cancellations and delays. With no information screens and stations that are often unstaffed, passengers cannot get information or advice about their journey plans. Trains users do not only travel out of Enfield to work: Enfield has many businesses which also suffer from poor rail services. Employers in the borough report that their staff are reluctant to use public transport, especially trains, because of the unreliability of services. Off-peak travel is especially precarious, and therefore becomes impractical for many shift workers and those on flexi-time. Employers also report that that may have an effect on their ability to recruit and retain staff.

Such difficulties almost pale into insignificance against those that people with disabilities endure. Enfield Disablement Association has noted that disabled people are unable to use WAGN services freely. They are required to give about 24 hours' notice if they need assistance and they must state which train they intend to use, and that is on a local network. The train network is largely inaccessible to them because of problems with stairs. Indeed, if a disabled person embarks on a train at Enfield Town station, the only station where he can disembark, wherever he wants to go, is Liverpool Street—all other stations are inaccessible.

The design of stations and the problems of poor availability of information compound the difficulties faced by people with visual impairment, and they too, have made representations to me. In its defence, WAGN states that most stations were built in the Victorian era and that it, too, is concerned about accessibility, but it says that major work would be required to solve such problems. There the matter rests, and no progress is made.

Passenger safety on trains and at stations is another major concern. The poor maintenance of stations, such as Southbury, which could best be described as derelict, produces an intimidating atmosphere. Attacks have occurred at that station. Apparently, even a member of WAGN's staff was attacked there. The neglect of that station and others makes people afraid to leave trains when darkness has fallen. Enfield Women's Safety Forum highlighted that problem and constituents have told me that they will travel beyond their station to disembark at a station where they feel safe. In effect, no-go zones exist when daylight has gone.

Mr. Stephen Twigg (Enfield, Southgate): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate. As she has said, she is reflecting widespread concern among rail users in the borough of Enfield and more widely in north London. Like hers, my mailbag is regularly full of complaints about the service that WAGN provides. Many of the issues that she highlights are shared. When she takes the train from Enfield Chase to Finsbury Park or Highbury and Islington, she travels through my constituency, through the stations of Grange Park, Winchmore Hill, Palmers Green and Bowes Park. Those are the stations that my constituents use most, and they raise similar issues to those that she mentions.

New Southgate and Hadley Wood stations on the line to Welwyn Garden City are in my constituency. The state of New Southgate station is similar to that of Southbury. It is important that WAGN recognises such problems and deals with station safety. WAGN has reached an agreement with some local people to open a café-bar at Palmers Green station, which has provided an excellent new facility at that station and helped to improve the safety and security of the passengers who use it. That is a positive example.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. Interventions should be brief. Another example would definitely be over the mark.

Ms Ryan: My hon. Friend makes the point well. WAGN has made some welcome improvements, but they would be even more so if they had been more widespread. By far the most mail that I receive is on that local issue. Complaints continue to be made; people do not stop when they have made one complaint. Week in, week out, trains do not turn up or are late. People cannot obtain the information that they need, or they feel unsafe on a station platform, so they will complain again. I encourage my constituents to complain. It is an important right, and they should exercise it to ensure that West Anglia Great Northern knows the size of the problem.

I am not sure whether WAGN is aware of the problem. Enfield rail user groups have undertaken their own survey of passengers' opinions of the service. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate agrees with me that those findings sit at odds with the survey published by the shadow strategic rail authority, which claims that 76 per cent. of passengers nationally thought that the service was good or fairly good. However, that figure represents the level of satisfaction with a particular journey on the day of the survey. For regular users, the figure for the general level of service dropped to 64 per cent. The figures are higher in the surveys undertaken for users of the Enfield service.

I do not question the honesty of the shadow strategic rail authority or the validity of its survey, but those figures would be greeted with incredulity by Enfield rail users. That leads my constituents to feel as if they are the poor relation to those who use the more lucrative passenger services from Cambridge, King's Lynn, Stanstead and elsewhere. Those of my constituents who use the railways say to me that they feel that Enfield was taken on by WAGN because it happened to be part of the franchise, but that the company's real commitment is to the more distant areas, which have faster trains and more lucrative lines. It seems that Enfield is not a priority, and that it not good enough.

The managing director of WAGN denies that, but experience of the railway service in Enfield confirms my constituents in their view. More than 1,000 people have signed petitions organised by Maria Preswell of the Enfield Lock rail user group. Their demands are reasonable; they include four trains an hour, four carriages per train and better information about services. That is the least that we should expect, but it is a long way from what we get.

I referred earlier to a letter that I received from Euan Cameron. I am pleased to say that the managing director of WAGN agrees that it is not good enough.

[Ms Ryan]

I had hoped to pursue the matter directly with him at a meeting in January, but that was cancelled by WAGN at short notice. We had hoped that Mr. Cameron would provide us with a timetable for the implementation of the specific improvements that we raised with him on our train journey. He agreed to provide a timetable, but sadly—like some of his trains—it has not yet arrived.

We understand that a fare increase is imminent. I believe that it should be tied to improvements in service. Rail fare increases not accompanied by service improvements would be a further insult to my constituents. Those increases should be not something for nothing but something for something—a phrase used elsewhere by the Government. If we have to pay increased fares, we should expect an improved service.

In the short and medium term, we want four trains an hour. We want trains of four carriages rather than two on either side of the peak hours. We want waiting rooms that are safe and that make passengers feel secure. We want improvements for people with disabilities, and we want improved information for all passengers. The shadow strategic rail authority says that the replacement rail franchises are expected to be much longer than the original franchises and that they may last for between 10 and 20 years. A review will be conducted every five to seven years to assess the franchisee's peformance. This debate is not a WAGN-bashing session, but it is clear to my constituents in Enfield, North that improvements are badly needed. They will support a renewed franchise only if vital improvements start to become apparent. Otherwise, they will be horrified at the possibility of a 20-year franchise.

We have a strong case that we have put on a number of occasions and in different places. We have strong support from our local authority, which is making sterling efforts to make the case for our passengers and to improve the rail service for the people of Enfield, North and for the rest of Enfield. However, very little is happening. The reality is that, for all that we have said and for all the times that we have raised the issues, we do not see the improvements that we seek. I am meeting the managing director of WAGN in just over a week's time, and I shall again put the matter forcefully. I hope that my hand will be strengthened by this debate.

The Enfield rail users group asked me to add my voice to its own to achieve these improvements. I ask the Minister and the Government to add their voices to ours.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Chris Mullin): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Ms Ryan) for raising an issue that is important for her constituents and of general interest to the travelling public. I should like at the outset to pursue a couple of points that she made towards the end of her speech. She said that she wanted four trains an hour throughout the day. My advice is that that service is already provided. If that is not the case, my hon. Friend might want to provide me with details after the debate, but I am advised that there are four trains an hour throughout the day, until early evening. I am advised that there are no two-carriage West Anglia Great Northern trains and that the minimum number of carriages is four. Again, I must rely on the advice that I am given, but I should be interested to see any advice that my hon. Friend has to the contrary.

I should like to start by making a few general points and then deal with the particular case outlined by my hon. Friend. The Government accept that passengers want punctual and reliable trains and that they want to feel safe, comfortable and secure on trains and at stations. They also want easy access to accurate and impartial travel information and adequate compensation when things go wrong. For that to happen, we need more investment in infrastructure, rolling stock and station improvements. We also need better and more consistent performance, a clear and affordable fares structure and a rail system that is fully integrated and which allows seamless transfers with other public transport modes. Only then can we hope to encourage people to choose to travel by public transport rather than by private car. That is why the Deputy Prime Minister issued new instructions and guidance to the franchising director last September, asking him to deliver improvements through renegotiation of the terms of franchise agreements.

When considering renegotiation requests, we have asked the franchising director to give due weight to commitments on current performance, customer services, innovation, efficiency, new or earlier investment, securing better performance, initiatives to produce integrated transport, willingness to give passengers a greater voice in the level and standard of services and value for the taxpayers. Unfortunately, it is not possible for all the current franchise agreements to be renegotiated overnight. The franchising director's overall objective is to replace most shorter franchises—those expiring by 2004—within about two years. The WAGN franchise, which expires in April 2004, will be one of those to be considered, so my hon. Friend has raised the matter at an appropriate time.

I should like to address my hon. Friend's specific concerns about WAGN's services. As she said, it would be only fair to note that passengers travelling on its lines generally enjoy a comparatively punctual and reliable service. Although passenger numbers have increased, WAGN has not experienced the massive increases that have resulted in severe overcrowding on the neighbouring Thameslink service. I appreciate that her commuters will not necessarily be satisfied to know that the situation on their line is not nearly as bad as that on a neighbouring one, so I do not make too much of the point; I merely refer to it in passing.

My hon. Friend referred to the results of the national passenger survey based on a study of 1,000 WAGN passengers. It found that 77 per cent. were satisfied or very satisfied with the service, compared with 76 per cent for the whole network. I heard what she said about the figure being lower among regular commuters.

As we have heard, WAGN's passengers have not escaped the frustrations caused by poor performance, despite its relatively good track record. Commuters forced to stand every day will take little comfort from the fact that overcrowding levels are below agreed thresholds.

WAGN scored lower on value for money than any other train operating company in the national passenger survey, with only 30 per cent. of pasengers being satisfied or very satisfied—that accords with my hon. Friend's information. Those using West Anglia Outer services will take little comfort from the fact that the latest shadow rail authority performance bulletin listed WAGN as one of the top five performing train operating companies. Discounts are currently being paid because of poor punctuality. There are contradictions between the different figures.

My hon. Friend expressed concern about inadequate service levels, especially in the off-peak period. WAGN is operating at and, in some cases, beyond, its contracted passenger service requirements. When setting the requirements, the franchising director ensured that a core provision was protected so that the service would be broadly similar to that operated by British Rail before franchising. However, from what she said, it seems that the provision might be inadequate; the franchising director will no doubt bear that in mind when the time for renegotiation comes.

My hon. Friend also expressed concern that WAGN is missing stations to avoid triggering penalties for late-running trains. However, the company is penalised under the regime by the franchising director if trains fail to stop at an advertised station. Likewise, it is penalised for running short formation trains. I asked how the director would know when a train did not stop at a station. I am not competely satisfied with the answer. My hon. Friend might know how he would. She should pursue the point with the franchising director, and I might too.

My hon. Friend suggested that fare increases should be tied to improvements in services. She surely knows that the franchising director has capped the increase of key fares at 1 per cent. below the rate of inflation. However, for London commuter fares, increases can be adjusted by 2 per cent. above or below the fares cap to reflect the quality of operators' services. WAGN was held to below-inflation increases because of its performance during the year to July 1999. Her commuters can have the mild satisfaction of knowing that an incentive is built into the fares structure that ought to be pressing the company to provide a better service.

My hon. Friend mentioned access for disabled passengers. I accept that there are problems for which there are no easy short-term solutions. Train operators are required to produce and comply with the disabled people's protection policy. They have made a number of improvements to stations and trains to make them accessible. New rail vehicles have to comply with the rail vehicle accessibility regulations. They require operators to conform to detailed specifications for wheelchair access and to provide clear colour contrast, audible and visual announcements and a range of other features to help people with a wide range of mobility difficulties.

Train operators recommend that passengers with disabilities contact their dedicated help point before travelling, but I agree that having to do that 24 hours in advance is not helpful. If contacted in advance, operators can usually arrange for staff to meet disabled passengers at their departure station, accompany them to the train and help them to board.

The fear of crime deters many people, especially women, older people and people from ethnic minorities, from using trains. Many train operators have taken steps to improve security by installing CCTV and help points, improving lighting and introducing rapid response arrangements.

Ms Ryan: The local council held a forum for businesses and services in the borough on CCTV. The only group that was invited but did not attend was WAGN.

Mr. Mullin: If that is so, it is clearly unsatisfactory.

As for consultation with passengers, we are determined that they should be given a say in their rail services. That is the only way to make train operators provide the services that meet the needs and expectations of their customers.

When considering requests for franchise replacement, the franchising director will consult rail users consultative committees, the London regional passengers committee, local authorities, regional planning authorities and regional development agencies, as appropriate. We might add relevant Members of Parliament to that list. My hon. Friend will no doubt want to draw her speech to the attention of the franchising director. The rail users consultative committees and the London regional passengers committee will also be encouraged to talk to a wide range of individual users and local groups to ensure that passengers' views are taken into account.

The franchising director's objective is to secure the earliest possible delivery of better services for passengers while providing demonstrable value for money for the taxpayer. However, it is important to remember that the franchising director is not committed to accepting the proposals that are received from prospective franchisees. If an application is to succeed, it will have to guarantee better performance, more investment, the expansion of network capacity and improvements for passengers, as well as providing the taxpayer with value for money. If applications fail to deliver those improvements, the franchising director could decide to allow existing franchises to run their course.

In conclusion, we are determined to improve the quality of rail services and to build a railway that is fit for the 21st century. However, the problems that my hon. Friend mentioned show that WAGN has some way to go before it consistently delivers a rail service that meets passengers' needs. I am grateful to her for raising the subject. No doubt the franchising director and WAGN will take careful note of what she said.

Greenbelt Development

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate greenfield sites. Although it is an important issue in my constituency, I suspect that Bromsgrove is representative of other authorities with predominant greenbelt land. They, too, face severe problems as a result of the Government's requirement for additional housing, which is passed down to the county councils, which then pass it down to the district councils. That creates great difficulties for greenbelt authorities. Bromsgrove comprises 92 per cent. greenbelt, which is a high percentage compared with other authorities. Sadly, the Government cannot give us figures about which other authorities have more than 90 per cent. greenbelt land in their boundaries, but clearly there are some, and those authorities have a problem as a result.

It is important to remind ourselves why the greenbelt was created in the first place. Greenbelt land is countryside that has special designation and protection so that it will act as a barrier and protect the countryside and, in the case of Bromsgrove, prevent the overspill of the metropolis of Birmingham from spreading further and further into the Worcestershire countryside until the metropolis and countryside become indistinguishable. Greenbelt land should receive extra protection because it forms a greenbelt around inner cities to prevent them from sprawling beyond their boundaries, but, sadly, it does not seem to receive that extra protection. That is a problem in Bromsgrove.

Conservative Members find it frustrating that, whenever we debate the greenbelt, the Government say that there is good news because they have created more of it—the Minister's response may fall into line with that. The only reason why the Government have found it necessary to create more greenbelt is because they have allowed the despoliation of the land that previously existed. Of course, if we were properly to protect the greenbelt, it would not be necessary to create more of it because the creation of greenbelt suggests that areas of countryside are in danger of being developed and greenbelt designation is necessary to stop urban sprawl. If proper planning laws were in place, it would not be necessary to create more greenbelt, however, desirable it is to designate such land once the problem has been created. My aim in the debate is to highlight that problem and to ask the Government to give extra protection to areas such as Bromsgrove and other areas of greenbelt so that we can maintain the beautiful English countryside and keep towns as towns, rather than create a great mix of things.

To explain the problem that exists in Bromsgrove, we have already bound sites for about 2,600 houses out of the 3,950 homes that we have had to build between 1996 and 2011. Extra homes have been added to our original target, but we must still find space to build another 1,350 homes. The problem is that there are no remaining useable brownfield sites. I say "useable" because, to be accurate, there is a small brownfield site in Hagley near the sewerage works, but to make that site viable it would be necessary to use some greenbelt land, which would be self-defeating. The other non-greenbelt site is an area closer to the town of farmland that is grade 1 agricultural land. Although it is not designated as greenbelt, it is certainly green land, and that is the only other site in the whole of Bromsgrove that is not classified as greenbelt on which we could build homes. Therefore, district councils tell me that we need about 100 acres of greenbelt land to meet the requirement for 1,350 more homes. That does not include future annual development requirements under which the district council will be obliged to find even more space for such further development as the Government think appropriate. Bromsgrove has a real problem. It is a greenbelt authority, under that special protection, but is no different from anywhere else with respect to the distribution of housing targets. It is expected to take further homes and to spoil what the greenbelt was intended to protect.

I appeal to the Minister for a change in the way in which housing targets are organised. We should not allow the inner city to sprawl out. At present, the greenbelt classification seems not to mean any added or special protection for authorities such as Bromsgrove, which seems to defeat its purpose.

How did the figure of 1,350 homes come about? Worcestershire county council, which handed down the target to Bromsgrove, has a housing target of 6,450 homes by 2011. They have been distributed between the six Worcestershire districts so that Bromsgrove, with 92 per cent. greenbelt land, has a target of 1,350 homes; Wyre Forest, next door in the north of the county, with 65 per cent. greenbelt land, has been given a target of 850 homes; Redditch, with 35 per cent. greenbelt land, has a target of 1,050 homes; Wychavon, 25 per cent. of which is designated greenbelt, is to have 1,300 homes; Worcester, which is 10 per cent. greenbelt land, is to have 1,500; and Malvern, which has no greenbelt land, has a target of 800 homes.

Bromsgrove, despite containing by far the largest amount of greenbelt, has been given the second highest housing allocation in the county. That seems perverse, given the reasons for the greenbelt and the aim of protecting parts of the country and clarifying the boundary between countryside and town. It is bizarre that Bromsgrove has been allocated only 50 more houses than Wychhavon, which has only a quarter as much greenbelt land.

The way in which the figures have been handed down by the Labour-controlled Worcestershire county council is frustrating, but it is outrageous that it is understood—although the county council will not clarify the location of the sites—that Worcestershire has enough brownfield sites to accommodate 50 per cent., if not more, of our housing target. Why did not Worcestershire, in making the allocation, do as the Government would presumably expect and seek out those sites for use before distributing the housing targets willy nilly around the various districts, without attention to the needs of the district that deserved the most protection?

Our frustration is increased by the fact that Bromsgrove schools are now overflowing. It is a delightful place to live and it is popular, because the schools are excellent. My postbag is full of mail from disappointed parents unable to get their children into the schools of their choice. On the last occasion when a large area was handed over to developers—a place called the Oakalls in the centre of Bromsgrove—the district council asked that a new school should be built as part of the dowry for the development. The county council turned that idea down, then changed its mind when it realised Bromsgrove's problem, but it was too late. The developers had offered other forms of dowry for that development. To have built a school at that stage would have meant paying market price, which would have been too expensive for the public purse.

We felt rather done down that the county did not properly consider our schooling, or our roads, when the figures were handed down. Our share of the roads budget is decided by the county council, yet one of the justifications for giving Worcestershire a disproportionate share of housing is that because we are so close to Birmingham, and many people who want to live in Bromsgrove will work in Birmingham, it makes sense to build houses in Bromsgrove. If that really is the county council's rationale for building more houses, I appeal for extra money to cope with the road problems that will be caused by yet more cars commuting into Birmingham and other cities every day. That is another reason for my disappointment with the figures.

The matter has caused a huge upset locally. A new Conservative council was elected in May last year and the demise of the previous Labour council was probably due to its proposal to build an arts centre on green land in the town centre, which was extremely unpopular in Bromsgrove. I suspect that it caused the Labour party to lose the election more dramatically than it would otherwise have done. The Labour council sat on proposals for further development in Bromsgrove; it was left to the new Conservative council to take the difficult decisions about which greenbelt land should be gobbled up in the Government's housing targets.

The issue is very fraught; for example, last night in Stoke Prior, one of the villages in my constituency, 200 people turned up to a public meeting to protest about the way in which the housing target affects their area. That is a lot of people to turn out to a public meeting on a cold February night, and people in many other villages in my constituency feel equally strongly. But if the Government insist, the houses will have to go somewhere and difficult decisions about which greenbelt landscape should be despoiled must be taken.

I pay tribute to the council leader, Councillor Nick Psirides, who has done a fantastic job in taking a grip on our new district council and grappling with the problems, keeping the public fully informed of the difficult decisions that are being forced on us by the Government's housing targets and giving people a chance to show their enormous strength of feeling. Councillor Psirides organised a Bromsgrove greenbelt pledge campaign and invited members of the public to telephone in support of it. So far, 2,050 calls have been made in support of maintaining Bromsgrove's greenbelt, and only 280 against. That shows my constituents' anxiety about the proposals.

I hope that the Minister will reconsider whether the present policy is in our best interests. The purpose of the debate is to plead with her to reconsider how the housing targets are allocated and to think about whether we are risking the greenbelt and the countryside beyond it by the "predict and provide" way of deciding housing allocation. The Government's target is for two thirds of new housing development to be on brownfield sites. That figure is all the more awesome when one considers that Bromsgrove has no available brownfield site, yet our housing allocation is handed down without any consideration of that problem.

If the Government are serious about having two thirds of all new homes built on brownfield sites, they must do more to change the mechanisms of the planning and allocation process. As my constituents can tell the Minister, vast tracts of brownfield sites in Birmingham and across the west midlands conurbation are desperate for fresh investment to be reinvigorated. It would be much better to refurbish them for new homes and other developments than to gobble up more countryside. The planning process needs to be given much greater consideration if we are fundamentally to change these dynamics.

If the Government look at the demographic changes that are taking place, they will see that there will be more single people in households than families. Single people might like to use the facilities of the inner-city areas and to live in smaller attractive units. We have some good examples in Birmingham, where the inner city has been rejuvenated to provide lovely living accommodation.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test): Is the hon. Lady aware that the figure for the future suggested requirements for homes for single people does not just include single young people but older people and those with different marital circumstances. The simple idea that all those people can live above the shop, as it were, is not borne out by the figures.

Miss Kirkbride: I thought that I was going to be able to agree with the hon. Gentleman because it is those younger and older people who will need the new homes. Elderly people often like to live together near local shops and where they can enjoy the comfort and support of one another. It is just as appropriate for them to live in inner-city areas than outside in the countryside where they will need to use a car, which is expensive. They might be afraid of losing their driving licence if they became too ill and infirm. More use should be made of inner-city areas for young and old people. If the Government's two-thirds requirement for development means anything, why do they not do that?

Finally, and this is an ancillary point to our problems in the greenbelt in Bromsgrove, I turn to the reuse of agricultural buildings. We are having problems in our sensitive areas. Present planning guidance encourages the change of use of agricultural buildings to light industrial, and some inappropriate planning applications are being made in very rural areas where the roads are inadequate for industrial activity. There is a case for looking at the guidance. I understand that farmers need to make a living and that they have had great difficulties recently with farming policy, but change of use in the greenbelt is even more sensitive than in the countryside.

Will the Minister look at that so that the option of turning the footprint of agricultural buildings into housing rather than light industrial use can be more easily considered than under the present planning laws? In many cases in my constituency that would be a more desirable change of use than light industrial would be. On that note, I will sit down and allow the Minister time to respond. I look forward to her reply, which I hope will allow Bromsgrove to be reprieved from all this extra housing that could despoil our landscape.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Beverley Hughes): As is customary, I congratulate the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) on securing the debate and on raising the important issue of development in the greenbelt. I am pleased that she shares the Government's commitment to the greenbelt, which has been demonstrated by the increase in greenbelt land since May 1997. She will be tired of hearing that that contrasts starkly with the record of the previous Government, who systematically took away greenbelt land during their last 10 years of office. She is right when she says that we should bring back land to the greenbelt. We need to turn around the legacy of a Government who substantially depleted this country of it.

I would like to set out the Government's general policies on development in the greenbelt and then to emphasise the importance of a planning system led by up-to-date development plans. I will also cover greenbelt and development issues relating to Worcestershire and Bromsgrove more specifically. The Government have stated many times their support for the greenbelt; but let me state it once again, for the record. We remain firm in our commitment to greenbelts. My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning reaffirmed that in answering a question from the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) as recently as 8 February.

Greenbelts are meant to remain open for as far ahead as can reasonably be foreseen, and there remains a strong presumption against inappropriate development within them. That does not mean, nor ever has, that development cannot take place in greenbelts. It does mean that inappropriate development can take place only where very special circumstances exist that outweigh the harm to the greenbelt. That is something that we take very seriously.

Government guidance on development or redevelopment of sites in the greenbelt is set out in planning policy guidance note 2. Local authorities must take its content into account in preparing their development plans, and it may also be material to decisions on individual planning applications and appeals. PPG2 states that most development in the greenbelt is inappropriate. There are a limited number of occasions when new buildings are not inappropriate, and that includes those used for agriculture and forestry. It also recognises that the re-use of existing buildings, with suitable safeguards, should not prejudice the openness of the greenbelt, since the buildings are already there.

If a proposal does not meet the criteria set out in PPG2, it will be viewed as inappropriate development. For permission to be granted, exceptional circumstances need to be demonstrated that outweigh the impact on the greenbelt.

Regional planning guidance sets the framework for greenbelt policy, including the direction of long-term development. Greenbelts are established through development plans. Many detailed greenbelt boundaries in England have been set in local plans and in old development plans, but in some areas, including Bromsgrove, detailed boundaries have not yet been defined. Up-to-date approved boundaries are essential to provide certainty as to where policies on the greenbelt apply, and to enable proper consideration of development options.

In Bromsgrove, I understand that the greenbelt is broadly defined by the existing structure plan. However, the detailed boundaries will be confirmed only when the Bromsgrove local plan is adopted. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove failed to take that into account. As she said, there was some delay in Bromsgrove in getting the local plan adopted, but the delay was attributable to the whole council, not to one group within it.

In 1997, the local plan inspector recommended that the Bromsgrove local plan create areas of development restraint and safeguarded reserve areas of land to meet possible future requirements. Detailed boundaries for greenbelt were being drawn through the local plan process for the first time. I am pleased to learn that the council is in the process of preparing draft modifications and it is for the local authority to decide the extent to which they follow the inspector's recommendations.

As I said, not all the boundaries in Bromsgrove have been defined in detail. The hon. Lady mentioned 92 per cent., but that does not apply to boundaries that have been agreed and approved through a local plan process. When they are defined, they will need to be capable of enduring beyond 2001 without the need for frequent or short-term changes. Bromsgrove will therefore have an opportunity to make changes to the draft plan and bring it fully up-to-date. I appreciate that the local authority has difficult decisions to make. They are competing imperatives—that is the nature of planning. Elected representatives must take those difficult political decisions. However, I hope that the plan can be adopted as soon as possible.

The Government lay great store by authorities having up-to-date development plans to aid development control and to help to reconcile the often competing demands of development and of the protection of the environment and the locality. I am sure that the hon. Lady would want to assist in that process.

Planning policy guidance note 3 on housing, which will be published shortly, is an important document. It will play a key role in countering the irresponsible development policies that the previous Administration pursued for more than a decade. The hon. Lady talked about predict and provide, but we started to change that old way of doing things when we took office. We have adopted a predict, monitor and manage approach, which is much more flexible. The key points are rigourous local authority housing capacity assessments; a sequential approach to housing site identification, putting the reuse of brownfield sites before the use of greenfield sites; a phased land release system, again putting brownfield sites first; a more efficient use of land through higher housing densities and lower parking standards; a better quality of design; and a national target of 60 per cent. of new houses to be built on previously used land.

Miss Kirkbride: I am delighted to hear what the Minister is saying. Is it possible for Bromsgrove district authority to wait for those new targets to be put in place? It could then use brownfield sites in Birmingham and we could keep our greenfield sites in Bromsgrove.

Ms Hughes: I am coming to some of those points, but I must say to the hon. Lady that it is not consistent with our approach for any one authority to shed its responsibility to contribute to the 60 per cent. brownfield target simply by saying that a local authority elsewhere should take up its share of responsibility. That is not what the process is about.

The hon. Lady said that Bromsgrove residents were concerned at the number of new houses that might be required in the district over the coming years. I understand that the new draft structure plan for Worcestershire adopts the housing allocation for the county that was set out in the regional planning guidance issued in 1998. I take issue with the way in which the hon. Lady portrayed the process of reaching the figures and allocating them to districts. The housing allocations were based on advice to the Secretary of State from the West Midlands local government association and were arrived at in partnership with other public and private sector interests, including Bromsgrove and other local housing authorities. To say that the Government hand down numbers is to misunderstand or mislead about the nature of the process, which is dynamic. Crucially, it involves a determination by local partners of the overall target and how it should be allocated.

As the strategic planning authority, Worcestershire county council has divided the overall provision between districts. The hon. Lady complained about that division, but the new structure plan is to go to public examination in July, when local authorities and others will have an opportunity to debate these important issues. My Department is in the process of preparing its formal response on the structure plan, so I cannot comment further, except to say that the figures are not set in concrete; Bromsgrove and other districts will be able to make their views known.

I appreciate the fact that Bromsgrove has less previously used land than other authorities. However, by applying a rigorous analysis of where that land is—taking the sequential approach in PPG3—Bromsgrove can at least go some way towards meeting its targets. The figures released today for the results of the individual local planning authority's contribution to the national land use database show that Bromsgrove has at least 46 hectares of previously developed land, not the zero hectares that the hon. Lady and the council leader have talked about.

There is an opportunity through proper process for Bromsgrove to make its views known on the matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. Time is up.

Pupil Mobility

1.30 pm

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North): I am grateful for the opportunity to air the important issue of the impact of high pupil mobility on schools. I am delighted that we have such a sound and comprehensive report as that prepared by Janet Dobson on which to base the debate and shape recommendations. I congratulate her and the Department for Education and Employment on commissioning the study.

A principal conclusion of the report is that many factors influence pupil mobility, including general social mobility of students, people moving around for work, and so forth. Given the area that I represent, my purpose is to concentrate on the issue as it affects London. I want to emphasise the joined-up nature of the problem of high pupil mobility, especially in inner-city communities. High turnover compounds and is compounded by problems caused by homelessness, which include poverty, and the dislocation and trauma experienced by many asylum seekers who do not have English as a first language. To set the context, 40,000 householders are in temporary accommodation in London, 5,000 in bed and breakfast. The total, including asylum seekers, is 55,000.

The timing of the debate is apposite, because I am aware that during the recently started second stage of research, and no doubt after the final report lands on the Minister's desk, minds were and will be concentrated on vital issues such as strategies to reduce mobility. I hope that the Minister can assure us that the issue of pupil mobility as raised in the report will be considered in the housing Green Paper, as the two issues are closely allied. Also important are the additional costs placed on schools with high mobility levels, especially where the turnover involves pupils who score highly on other indices of deprivation, and the equally serious problem of high teacher mobility, which tends to occur in exactly those schools that experience high pupil turnover. I hope that the research and the debate that it inspires will lead to a greater understanding of the costs involved and the predicament of schools and their staff. They are struggling to raise educational standards under the pressures that high mobility brings.

Some of the figures, and the human stories that they represent, are dramatic. Last week, the head teacher of a school in my constituency told me about a five-year-old boy who was inducted into school on a Monday and disappeared from it the next day, having been rehoused as a result of a shift in temporary accommodation in Portsmouth. The little boy arrived in the country in November speaking no English, and his day at Wilberforce school was a taste of the third school that he had attended since his arrival.

While I prepared for the debate, other local head teachers gave me similar examples. One school saw the equivalent of one new arrival a day between the start of term and the day three weeks later when the inspectors arrived from the Office for Standards in Education. In a year 6 class in Kensington, only one child sitting standard assessment tests at key stage 2 had been present since key stage 1. One in three children in Hackney have not been at their primary schools for the full four years of the key stage 2 curriculum.

[Ms Karen Buck]

As the Dobson research suggests, mobile pupils are disproportionately likely to have lower levels of achievement at entry. For example, children in Westminster who joined primary school after key stage 1 are three times more likely than their settled peer group to have limited English. Levels of attainment at key stage 2 among pupils joining late are 19 percentage points lower for English, and 12 percentage points lower for maths, than levels achieved by pupils attending school from the start.

A lot of that can be explained by the high incidence of mobile pupils with English as an additional language. However, an extra problem arises from pupils not having resources in the home to enable them to study or to draw on the ideal level of parental support needed to help them to achieve.

There are no excuses for low achievement. All the heads to whom I spoke reiterated that each pupil should realise his or her maximum potential. However, I was struck by the close correlation between school achievement as measured by test results and levels of pupil mobility. In one of the boroughs that I represent, the combined percentage of unexpected leavers and unexpected admissions ranged from 43 per cent. to 2 per cent. I pay tribute to the excellent work done in our high-achieving schools, but it is clear from statistics that many of them do not face the pressures of schools in which almost half the pupils change schools in a year.

I hope with all my heart that that fact will be more fully appreciated by Ofsted, by the media and throughout the country because, only by recognising it, can we appreciate the level of achievement of staff and pupils in schools with a high turnover, whose efforts are little short of heroic.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): Is my hon. Friend aware that the problems that she is describing are also evident in seaside towns? A school in Lowestoft in my constituency counted the number of pupils in one group as it moved through the four years of the school and found that only one third of them had been with the school throughout. It had a mobility rate of about two thirds. A break in education is the biggest detriment to progress. Schools need resources to support transient pupils to ensure that non-transient pupils do not suffer. My hon. Friend is absolutely right: Ofsted must take into account that factor when placing a school in a group, by which it sets the standard assessment test results.

Ms Buck: I agree that there is a serious problem in seaside towns. My hon. Friend's point strengthens my argument.

High pupil mobility also places cost pressures on schools. Teachers must assess and offer support to a new child sometimes every two or three days, set up records and prepare teaching materials. That takes considerable time and energy. Induction can easily add one or two hours per pupil, which, when multiplied by 60, 70, 80 or 90 pupils in one school, quickly eats up staff time. Records need to be prepared for early leavers to be passed on to their next school, which, again, when multiplied by the number of pupils involved adds to the pressure.

In the secondary sector, the number of pupils spirals. One comprehensive in my constituency dealt with 284 unexpected arrivals and leavers in one year. Mary Marsh, the head of Holland Park comprehensive school, estimates that the total processing time in her school costs the equivalent of a teacher's salary. It is not only teacher and administrative time that is involved; schools provide folders, paper, textbooks and other materials, which, in high pupil mobility schools, are unfortunately lost to a far higher degree than in schools in which the pupil population is stable.

There are even more stresses. Many London schools with high pupil mobility take in the children of asylum seekers. We are talking not about high proportions of children with English as an additional language, but about 15, 25 or 35 different languages being spoken in a school. In Holland Park school and North Westminster school, the number of different languages total 70, so the pressure is multiplied. In year 11 at Holland Park school, 47 per cent. of pupils are late entries, 45 per cent. have English as an additional language and 40 per cent. of pupils are on free school meals.

The need for additional resources for schools with large numbers of pupils with an additional language is already recognised in the system, but the additional complexity of working with pupils who come from many different countries, who speak different languages and are from different cultural traditions is not yet fully understood. In many schools, children arrive with little or no English. A child may be the only one in the school who comes from a particular country and speaks its language. That makes the teacher's job harder and adds to the sense of isolation and dislocation of the child.

Taking all the causes of high mobility together and the additional stress factors that are often linked to it—homelessness, the pressures of life in bed-and-breakfast accommodation, family breakdown, domestic violence, war trauma, the psychological damage done to parents who may have undergone torture—it is scarcely surprising if such schools find it harder than usual to build a strong identity. Greater than average behaviour problems in schools may result from such a high level of instability and turbulence.

Children who remain in a school throughout their school life are also affected, which is an important lesson that we need to learn from the research. We do not sufficiently appreciate the damaging effect that the regular fracturing of relationships that children have built up with others who move on may have. Families in temporary accommodation are often given no notice that they have to leave and are told to move overnight; the children are therefore moved from schools without having a chance to say goodbye. That can be damaging for all the children involved.

As I said, I am aware that a high level of pupil mobility is by no means only a London issue. That is supported by the Dobson research. I have not touched on the problems experienced by traveller children, excluded children, children in care and the experience of seaside towns or army bases. However, as the initial report states, London is unique in terms of the combination and concentration of factors generating high pupil mobility. It is also unusual in having a high turnover in both the primary and secondary sectors. The research shows that, in many other areas, high pupil mobility is concentrated in primary schools.

I realise that the research is at too early a stage to expect firm commitments from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. However, I hope that she will give general support to the recommendations in the first stage report and to the need for greater awareness of the multiple pressures with which schools have to deal. We need more data on which to make decisions and a standard methodology: one of the report's findings is that information is collected differently in different boroughs and schools. We need more support for tracking children who often move regularly between schools. I am sympathetic to the inclusion of some form of exceptional circumstance factor in the ethnic minority and traveller achievement grant, to help meet the needs of highly mobile groups, whatever the underlying cause of their mobility, and to help promote best practice in schools. I hope that we can look forward to greater recognition of the problem, and to greater compensation for schools experiencing high mobility, from a Government who are rightly demonstrating their commitment to high standards of achievement for all.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) on securing this debate on an extremely important question. As my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) said, this is a problem that particularly affects seaside towns. I wish to say a little about that from my perspective of the Member of Parliament for Blackpool.

The situation in seaside towns is different from that in London in the sense that our populations tend to be more ethnically homogenous. We therefore do not have the problem to which my hon. Friend referred, but we have large numbers of people moving in and out, seeking seasonal employment, and that obviously makes a substantial contribution to pupil mobility. Those are often people with few skills, usually young people with families—with all the attendant problems—with low income, poor health, and drug and alcohol problems. They often live in poor conditions in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. The non-routine admission pupils from that transient population often have special educational needs and behavioural difficulties, and are underachieving. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary appreciates those significant factors.

The educational development plan that Blackpool borough council prepared two years ago concluded that the borough's high level of pupil turnover—something in the order of 1,200 primary school pupils were non-routine admissions in 1997–98—has a destructive effect on schools, strains teachers and resources and affects teachers' ability to make a sustained impact on achievement levels. A headmaster in my constituency with a primary school with an annual pupil turnover of 48 per cent. said:

"Large numbers of pupils moving in and out of the school makes target setting and tracking pupils' progress extremely difficult."

That also has implications for the extent to which high mobility will, if not properly monitored, frustrate the Government's attempts to measure added values in school league tables.

The final point again picks up on what my hon. Friends the Members for Waveney and for Regent's Park and Kensington, North said. I am encouraged by the Government's response so far, not only in terms of commissioning the original Dobson report which is seminal in this respect but because it indicates what they propose for the future. As a member of the Select Committee on Education and Employment which inquired into the work of Ofsted—as part of the inquiry, we raised with the chief inspector the issue of monitoring high pupil mobility—I am delighted that the chief inspector acknowledged on separate occasions that it was an important factor which he and the Government would take formally into account in future Ofsted inspections and in the inspection process. It is a key issue north and south which affects not only inner-city areas but seaside towns. I am delighted that my hon. Friend has raised it.

1.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Jacqui Smith): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) on securing today's debate. I also congratulate her and my hon. Friends the Members for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) and for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) for their well-informed, measured and intelligent contributions. Like them, I welcome the opportunity to discuss this important complex issue. As they so ably outlined, there is evidence that pupil mobility is a serious problem for schools, local education authorities and, most of all, pupils. I associate myself with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North. I too, believe that in many schools with high pupil mobility, teachers and non-teaching staff do a fantastic job supporting pupils. They deserve recognition for the good work that they do.

As my hon Friend said, in January 1999 my Department provided additional funds to a Nuffield Foundation research project being undertaken by Dr. Janet Dobson and colleagues at the migration research unit of University College, London. Department for Employment and Education funding enabled a report to be produced in October 1999; the final report is not expected until June 2000. The key objectives of this research were to review current knowledge of child migration, establish what was known about the scale, nature and implications of high pupil mobility for the functioning of schools, and develop a better understanding of regional variations.

My three hon. Friends displayed a good understanding of some of the factors highlighted by the report, but it is worth reminding ourselves of what research discovered about the range of factors associated with high mobility. The report identified high-mobility groups, such as travellers, refugees, asylum seekers and the children of armed forces families. It identified circumstances of high mobility such as social deprivation, family break-up, temporary housing and seasonal work. As we heard, it also identified high-mobility areas, which tended to be concentrated around London and other cities and conurbations, and in coastal resorts and areas with a large number of armed services families. The situation is clearly complex, with no cause, and, therefore, no easy solutions. We have recognised that in the debate. Overall, the study found that family break-up was the most significant factor contributing to high pupil mobility. This has implications for our response.

[Jacqui Smith]

For the research, 66 local education authorities provided data on a high-mobility primary school. In 80 per cent of those schools, the mobility rate was 20 per cent. or more. Ten LEAs provided examples of primary schools with a rate of 70 per cent. or more. I accept what my hon. Friend said about difficulties and numbers in secondary and primary schools. However, average mobility is higher in primary schools than secondary schools, although some London LEAs have high rates in both. That highlights a problem in primary schools, which are often relatively small with little administrative support.

My hon. Friend rightly identified London as having a unique combination of factors generating pupil mobility in schools. There is a particular problem in relation to children from overseas. About 70 per cent. of children who came to schools as new pupils between the ages of five and 15 in the year preceding the 1991 census were from overseas.

Other specific factors associated with London to which my hon. Friend alluded are homelessness, temporary housing and exclusions—inner and outer London have the highest exclusion rate. Children from armed forces and traveller families also have a presence in Greater London.

Important implications for individual schools should inform our policy response. The study found that children joining schools at non-standard times are, on average, achieving less in key-stage tests and GCSEs than those who complete a whole key stage or career in the same school.

Changing schools does not per se lead to lower than average achievement for children or schools. We must take account of other factors leading to high mobility that also affect outcomes and tend to be linked to exclusions, social deprivation and lack of fluency in English. Lower achievement by mobile pupils, compared with that of non-mobile pupils, seems to be associated with social deprivation and/or a lack of fluency in English, which is exacerbated by high mobility.

I accept my hon. Friend's contention that high mobility has an impact on school target-setting, measuring performance, using value added to reflect progress and planning teaching. Furthermore, it makes heavy demands on staff time and resources which, as has been rightly pointed out, has implications for the whole school, not just mobile pupils. I am sympathetic to the fact that high turnover affects a school budget over the course of a whole year.

The Government are addressing the problem by undertaking a range of policies. Our early-years policies will ensure that children who benefit from nursery education, especially those from disadvantaged backgrounds, are more likely to succeed in primary school. The sure start programme, which has an emphasis on support for families, may help to address mobility at source, especially in relation to family breakdown.

Baseline assessment will be of value if records are passed on quickly between schools. We have introduced a common transfer form and new regulations on the transfer of records. Increasing investment in information and communication technology and in administrative support for schools will make that transfer smoother.

My hon. Friend rightly emphasised the importance of home-school links in high-quality education and pupil achievement. The development of such links may be extremely time consuming in a high-mobility school, even when all parents are fluent in English. The report emphasises that a positive home-school relationship is likely to be a mjor factor in helping some children to settle in and start to learn. Therefore, the Department is supporting schools by providing guidance and examples of good practice to build that important home-school relationship.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South mentioned the importance of measuring performance to raise standards and the difficulty of calculating measures of value added for schools with high pupil turnover, but nevertheless, the Government are committed to ensuring that that is done. As he said, Ofsted's work in taking account of pupil mobility will help with future developments of value-added measures, as will the Government's introduction of unique pupil numbers and the ability to track individual pupils to support their learning and provide more valid measures of achievement.

Schools with high pupil mobility often have to set targets without knowing which children will still be in school at the end of the year. Schools can set additional targets to reflect their priorities. However, many schools find setting targets a challenge. That is why the consultation on target setting, which is due to be sent to schools and LEAs later this term, will invite suggestions from schools with high mobility on how regulations might take account of such matters.

The role of Ofsted has been mentioned. It is important that, under the new Ofsted framework, inspectors will collect data on pupil mobility and comment, if appropriate, on the likely impact on performance. My hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North made a point about benchmarking. Detailed information about pupil mobility will be not only collected but made available to inspectors and included in the PANDA—the performance and assessment data—and the PICSI—the pre-inspection context and school indicator reports issued to schools by Ofsted.

It is worth mentioning that the excellence in cities programme, which focuses on raising achievement, will make a positive contribution to fostering stability in some of those areas of London, to which my hon. Friend referred, where it is a particular challenge. Some pupils experience the effects not only of mobility but of not having English as their first language or of coming from overseas, so it is important not only that our ethnic minority achievement grant, which replaced the education element of the Home Office section 11 grant in 1998, has been increased by 7 per cent. compared with last year, but that it will go directly to schools so that head teachers can use it where it is needed most—for example, to target pupils who need teaching or assisted support in English as an additional language, or to work with local communities. Although I recognise that that will not completely solve the financial problems, it is important as an extra support for those children, as my hon. Friend rightly said, who have language as an additional difficulty as well as mobility problems.

Pupil numbers will always fluctuate for a variety of reasons, reflecting the mobility of pupils and families. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept my assurance that the Government are sympathetic to the challenges faced by schools and pupils. We will continue to study the results of the research to find a way in which to support those schools both financially and in our work to raise standards. The research has enabled us to clarify what we mean by mobility and to identify patterns of mobility, and it will inform our policies at school, LEA and national levels. The Department will continue to note the emerging findings.

My hon. Friend is right to say that pupil mobility is an issue for schools, but it is also an issue where joined-up action across Government is extremely important. The implications are not of concern to the educaton sector alone, but I assure my hon. Friend that they are of great concern to the Department. We must highlight the impact of health improvement strategies and urban regeneration, housing and social inclusion policies. That will require collaboration across services. I assure my hon. Friend that we take the issue very seriously.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 17 February 2000

[MR. MICHAEL J. MARTIN in the Chair]

Africa

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Clelland.]

2.30 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Peter Hain): Too many of the world's leaders, foreign-policy makers and media commentators have downgraded Africa, using the excuse that it is a failed continent of little strategic importance. The Labour Government entirely reject that stance. Our policy is one of constructive engagement by Britain in Africa. We have real interests in Africa, which represents one eighth of the world population. Last year, it registered the fastest rate of growth of any continent in the world. We do more than £10 billion of business with Africa every year. About 1 million citizens of British nationality live on the continent of Africa.

We also care for wider reasons. Africa can be a powerful force for good in an increasingly interdependent globe. The Government are committed to helping to sustain and spread democracy and prosperity throughout the world. We have a moral duty to help ordinary women and men of Africa to build better lives for themselves and their children. Failure in Africa will hurt not only Africans but us, too; it will require more aid and result in refugee flows and lost business opportunities. In Africa, ecological damage, disease, crime and terrorism know no frontiers.

Another reason for critical engagement is that in the past few years a new wind of change has started to blow through Africa. The land of my childhood, South Africa, has turned from international pariah to global role model and regional leader. The other pariah of Africa was Nigeria, which was bled dry by dictatorship. It was repressed and brutalised by a regime that kept one fifth of Africa's population in misery while it squandered massive natural wealth on itself. Now Nigeria is restoring democracy, rebuilding its economy and laying the foundations for a vibrant future. The two giants of Africa—South Africa and Nigeria—are getting back on track and sending the clearest signal to the world that, with human rights respected and good governance, Africa's future can be bright.

They are not the only points of light on the dark continent. Kenya could become a third giant. With our encouragement, President Moi has launched a radical programme of much-needed reform. Its success will make Kenya a regional beacon—stronger, richer and more democratic. We are supporting that reform programme to the hilt, and I shall discuss the subsequent stages with President Moi in Nairobi next week.

Without fuss, Botswana has been on an upward path to prosperity. Mali is quietly building a better future for its citizens and is the author of the far-sighted west African small arms moratorium. After decades of chaos, which almost destroyed the country, Mozambique is now at peace and rebuilding itself. Ghana is moving successfully towards a peaceful democratic transition to a new generation of leaders. Sierra Leone is emerging from a decade of horror, with the chance to build lasting peace and prosperity.

There are success stories in Africa, but there are still some horrors. Angola is ravaged by civil war, land mines and devastating destruction, the main culprit being Jonas Savimbi's murderous UNITA gangsters. Yet it has enough riches and natural resources to feed the whole of southern Africa and be massively prosperous. We must end the war by enforcing United Nations sanctions against UNITA. Angola's vast oil wealth must be spent to improve the lot of the people. It should not be put into the pockets of corrupt politicians and officials.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central): My hon. Friend touched on a point of profound importance when he said that sanctions against Angola need to be effective. He will know, as I do, that the war is fuelled not only by internal rivalry but by those who are prepared to abuse the sanctions regime for personal or collective gain—sometimes people in high places—and to ensure that the diamonds find a market in the west so that Mr. Savimbi's war machine continues to be well provided for. How can we crack down on that evil, which continues to blight the lives of the people of Angola?

Mr. Hain: I agree with my hon. Friend. He did much good work as the previous Minister of State, on that and other matters. I pay tribute to him. I agree that in some countries, including Zambia, Uganda and Rwanda, people in high positions are busting sanctions. It is imperative that those countries' Governments crack down on them immediately.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): It is estimated that well over $3 billion-worth of diamonds from Angola have been used by UNITA since 1991. With such a value, surely a record is being kept of who is trading in them. We should be able to take action to stop it.

Mr. Hain: Again, that is an important point. I am glad that those matters are being raised, because sanctions busting is going on all over the world. That is why we are working with De Beers and other international diamond companies to achieve a self-certification scheme that will allow us to distinguish between clean diamonds, such as those mined in South Africa, Botswana and Namibia, and blood diamonds from Angola and Sierra Leone.

Britain's policy in Africa is clear and unequivocal. We will back success. We will support those who stand up for democracy and human rights. We will help Governments who want to reform their economies. We will support just solutions—African solutions—to African problems. We will work with those African leaders who commit themselves to freeing their people from poverty. We will help empower ordinary African women and men to build a better future for themselves.

The reverse is also true. We will not support corrupt Governments. We will not subsidise economic mismanagement. We will not fund repression or bankroll dictatorship. Those evils have failed Africa and we will not back failure. We will speak out against failure, and do all that we can to help ordinary African people to establish their rights and the future to which they are entitled.

The people of Zimbabwe voted against the introduction of a new constitution that did not adequately reflect their wishes. I welcome President Mugabe's clear acceptance of the referendum result. I encourage his Government to seize the opportunity, listen to the people's voice and put in place proper machinery to ensure that the forthcoming parliamentary elections are free and fair. I publicly urge him, as I have consistently done in private, to abandon his disastrous economic policies and work with Zimbabwe's friends in the international community, such as Britain, to restore stability, growth and dignity. We want Zimbabwe to be a leader in Africa, not a loser.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): The Minister said that he welcomed President Mugabe's clear acceptance of the referendum result. Yet, from one of this morning's broadsheets, we learn that Zimbabwe is far from abandoning land seizure. Chen Chimutengwende, the information Minister, said that the land clause would be rushed through Parliament. Surely, that shows that Mugabe has not learned anything from the referendum result.

Mr. Hain: There is a difference between accepting a referendum result containing a question about the adoption of a new constitution that includes a clause about land reclamation, and dealing with that matter separately and in another fashion. I would urge caution over the question of land reclamation or rather, land seizure.

Mr. Paterson: Theft.

Mr. Hain: It is land seizure. However, that is not Zimbabwe's priority. The country has serious economic problems. It is almost toppling into a deep hole. It ought to be adopting modern economic policies, and Britain will work with the Zimbabwe Government if President Mugabe adopts that course.

The lives of too many African people are ruined by conflict, blighted by poverty and crushed by dictatorship. Africa has suffered more than half of the world's war-related deaths, and has more than 8 million refugees, returnees and displaced people. Wars kill more than just people; they kill prosperity and hope too.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): The Minister dealt with the economic situation in Zimbabwe. Given the parlous state of Zimbabwe's economy, is not Britain's bilateral aid now a powerful lever which the Government could use to ensure that there is proper respect for democracy in that country, that elections are conducted fairly and that the land seizure programme is stopped?

Mr. Hain: I do not think that we can use aid and development assistance in the crude way that the hon. Gentleman suggests. It is important that Governments, such as that of Zimbabwe, understand that the reason that our aid and development programme is relatively low in Zimbabwe is that we have not been confident that the Government would deliver any development assistance to genuinely empower and help the people, as is done in other African countries, which we are assisting to far greater effect. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development would want to provide extra aid and development assistance to Zimbabwe if it were to adopt modern progressive policies and if we could be sure that the assistance would reach the people whom it is designed to help.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): Can the Minister tell me what representations he has made to the Department for International Development about both the European Union aid programme for Zimbabwe and the bilateral aid programme? Can he tell the House how much the bilateral aid programme between Britain and Zimbabwe is worth, and whether he has asked for the programme to be halted or audited in any way?

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has taken a close interest in Zimbabwe. The aid that she is responsible for providing is delivered through non-governmental organisations to ensure that the issue of poverty elimination is addressed. We do not want to cut aid as the Opposition seem to be advocating if that would damage poor people's prospects, but we are determined to ensure that aid is not siphoned off in any way, and that is why it is not delivered through the Government.

We must prevent wars from starting. That means tackling the root causes of conflict—oppression, injustice and poverty. We have substantially increased our development assistance budget as a key part of that strategy and we have led the world in debt relief. Improving governance in African countries is a critical element. Good governments rarely go to war. They work with others, such as in the Organisation for African Unity, to resolve issues before they ignite into conflict.

There is also a key role for security sector reform. Improving the quality, supervision, training and democratic accountability of more African armies and police forces would make a major contribution to human rights and the quality of life in Africa, where arbitrary and brutal exercise of force by the state is commonplace. We are working with Governments on that in Sierra Leone, Nigeria and elsewhere.

We must also prevent wars from being stoked. Guns are one of Africa's curses. That is why we have introduced strict criteria for arms sales, to which we are sticking rigorously. We recognise the right of self-defence; African Governments have legitimate security requirements, but we will not export arms that would be used for internal oppression or external aggression. That is why the Prime Minister announced last week a tightening of the policy towards African countries engaged in the Democratic Republic of Congo, including Zimbabwe. However, there is a key role for African Governments themselves in preventing the proliferation of weapons on the continent. That is why we strongly support the west African small arms moratorium and a similar initiative that is being launched by Kenya for East Africa.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): The Minister has said a lot about arms control and I welcome the Prime Minister's announcement that he will review the conditions on which arms are sent to African countries engaged in conflict. But after all he said about Zimbabwe—the parlous state of its economy and the fact that it is spending £1 million a day on waging war—does he not have any regrets about the decision to send Hawk jet parts to that country?

Mr. Hain: I applaud the hon. Lady for continuing energetically to flog this old horse. The fact is, however, that we have agreed to honour an existing contract to provide spares, which was entered into by the previous Conservative Government, who sold Hawk jets to Zimbabwe. In respect of new export licence applications made by African Governments for arms that could be used to fuel or encourage conflicts in the Congo, I should restate that we shall not supply arms for such external aggression. That is the important point and it is a considerable advance on anything that the Conservative party got near to when it was in government.

Where war has broken out, we need to find more effective ways to stop it. That means renewed efforts on effective sanctions. We are pushing for smarter sanctions that target the guilty and not the innocent, and we are looking for better ways of shutting down outlets for those profiting from African wars. We are ready to name, shame and take action where we can on those who break sanctions. For example, we would take action in respect of the illegal provision of UNITA with supplies, without which it could not keep fighting in Angola.

I have named in the House several people included in breaking UN sanctions by supplying UNITA and I shall now name more. David Zollman is involved in exporting diamonds to Antwerp for UNITA. Based in Rundu, Namibia, Zollman paid a monthly fee to Namibian officials to enable him to operate without interference. We estimate that in 1999, Zollman was moving $4 million-worth of diamonds per month. His brother, Maurice Zollman, is carrying out similar activity for UNITA in South Africa. Hennie Steyn, a South African pilot, flies diamonds for Maurice Zollman from Angola, via Congo Brazzaville. He also acts as a middleman for UNITA in selling diamonds to European dealers and part owns a UNITA diamond concession. Jan Joubert organises the supply of fuel to UNITA. Until recently, aircraft carrying the fuel flew from Gaberone to Andulo while pretending to fly to Francistown in eastern Botswana. Dennis Coghlan, an Irishman resident in Botswana, owns a warehouse in Gaberone that is used to store fuel and other supplies for UNITA until they can be flown into UNITA-held territory.

Those individuals are making money out of misery. It is vital that all the Governments, agencies and companies where they operate take urgent action to stop their illegal activities. Britain will continue to play an active role as a friend of Africa in the Security Council of the United Nations, and where the UN can stop war or build peace we will back it to the hilt. We have passed the names to the UN and, in particular, to ambassador Robert Fowler, for his work on the sanctions committee responsible for tackling UNITA and Angola generally.

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): I listened with great interest to my hon. Friend's comments and I am pleased that he has passed those names on to the UN. Are any UK citizens currently suspected of involvement in sanctions busting in support of UNITA?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend raises an important issue. We are looking to see whether any UK citizens are involved in such activities. UNITA's global network is widespread and reaches into Britain, Ireland and the rest of Europe as well as into Africa. Indeed, it reaches into eastern Europe. UNITA has, for example, been supplied with Ukrainian arms. I would not stand here and say that no UK citizens are involved, but I give a warning: if any are involved, they will be tracked down and tackled as they are acting illegally, because UN sanctions are a matter of international law.

We are also backing African solutions to African conflicts. We support and fund the Organisation for African Unity, ECOWAS—the Economic Community of West African States—and other regional organisations in their own roles as peacekeepers and peacemakers. We also support individual African peacemakers. Next week, I shall join Nelson Mandela, at his request, at the Burundi peace talks in Arusha to help in his efforts to bring lasting peace to Burundi. The threat of renewed genocide still hangs over the beautiful and tragic region of the great lakes. We must lift that shadow for ever.

HIV/AIDS is killing more Africans than war. The scale of the epidemic is truly appalling. Every day, 5,500 Africans die of AIDS and some 24 million Africans south of the Sahara are HIV positive. The highest infection rates are among people aged between 15 and 24, taking them in the prime of their life. Half of all pregnant women in some of the worst-affected regions are HIV positive. The epidemic affects skilled professionals, which impacts on the education, health and private sectors. How does one plan for a school system in which a third of its trained staff will be dead within five years?

AIDS is a threat not only to health, but to economic development. It is undermining the progress that Africa has made in the past 30 years, slashing life expectancy, orphaning millions of children and destroying the capacity of skilled work forces. It is crippling Africa's rightful place in the world.

Dr. Tonge: The Secretary of State for International Development recently announced a £14 million contribution to AIDS vaccine research. We were pleased with that; everyone was excited. Have the Government made progress in persuading others, especially the United States Government, to contribute equal or greater sums to the research?

Mr. Hain: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for raising the subject. At last month's debate at the Security Council of the United Nations, Vice-President Gore pledged an extra $60 million of funding to tackle the AIDS problem in Africa.

[Mr. Hain]

We must not lose sight of the 650 million people in Africa who are HIV negative—we must keep hope for them. We know what works: reaching young people with the right information and training, providing condoms and ensuring that safe blood is available. Of course, we need care systems for those already infected with the virus. The Government are working hard to help to forge a co-ordinated response to the epidemic. More money must be found, and Africa's leaders must demonstrate more commitment. Where money and commitment go hand in hand, we have seen success—Uganda, for example, has made progress towards culling the epidemic.

A third challenge is to lift the debt burden that is crushing Africa. In 1998, sub-Saharan Africa's total debt was $226 billion, its new grants from the international community amounted to $15 billion and total debt service payments by Africa amounted to $15 billion. The net inflow to Africa was zero. Debt relief can free resources for priority spending and promote investment, and thus help poor countries to support poverty reduction, health and education. That is why the Government have led the international community in pushing for faster, deeper and wider debt relief.

Our support is not unconditional. Debt relief will work only when African Governments are committed to tackling poverty and to economic policies necessary to encourage growth. When they are, we shall back them to the hilt and support them in the international financial institutions.

Boosting trade and investment is Africa's fourth challenge. Some African Governments have acted to increase their competitiveness on world markets and to attract inward investment. We are encouraging others to follow their example. International finance is always looking for new opportunities. I met about 100 business people interested in Africa in the House of Lords over lunch yesterday. The challenge for Africa is not only to be attractive to traders and investors, but to offer opportunities that are more attractive than those elsewhere.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Does the Minister agree that we must have an even harder and better policy on debt relief, and that it is important that we trace the millions, if not billions, of pounds that have been salted away in Swiss bank accounts? Our policy should guarantee—as far as it can—to get the money back by tracing it, in the same way that moneys associated with the Jewish holocaust have been traced.

Mr. Hain: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's contribution. We are working with the Nigerian Government to trace the hundreds of millions—possibly the billions—that were salted away by the previous regime of Abacha, and by his family. Some of it might be in Britain. The hon. Gentleman raises a serious issue that we are seeking to address.

Globalisation is not a policy but a fact and an opportunity. If it is well managed, it will help to drive forward African efforts to build prosperity and to eliminate poverty. Badly managed, it will increase the divide between rich and poor. We are encouraging African countries to engage actively with the World Trade Organisation and the key international players, and to help set the terms of the debate.

A fifth challenge for Africa is to build good Governments that act consistently in their people's interest. We are working in Africa to help build democracy—to ensure that people can choose and change their Governments freely and fairly. Human rights are at the core of that. We are working to protect and promote them across the continent. That is not just a moral imperative. Where they are respected, economies flourish. Human rights make humans rich.

We are working to promote more accountability in the way African countries are governed. We want to ensure that all those in authority are properly accountable for their actions. Free media, independent courts and a vibrant civil society are vital to Africa's future success. We are working, too, for more transparency, to ensure that ordinary Africans know what those in authority are doing. Secrecy breeds bad decision making and corruption. Open government is better government.

Corruption is not unique to Africa, but its effects are arguably uniquely bad there. Corruption is a tax on the poor by the rich. The world's poorest continent can least afford that tax. Corruption contributes to debt. It undermines the rule of law and Africa cannot afford it. Clean government, by contrast, attracts investment and business confidence. Corrupt Governments repel it and cheat their own people of the benefits. We are targeting corruption wherever we find it.

Britain's engagement in Africa is not just about what the British Government do. Business matters. Companies that do good do well. Non-governmental organisations make a real difference in working on development from the ground up. We work closely with them too. Human rights activists such as Amnesty International and Article 19 inform the Government and keep us on our toes. They play an even more important role in doing that for African Governments.

The Government work with, not against, our international partners in taking forward our African agenda. We have ended 130 years of historic rivalry with France in Africa. With the United States Administration in Washington and the United States ambassador to the United Nations, Dick Holbrooke, we have helped to harmonise our approach to African hot spots. We are working closely with our European Union partners. The European Union common position on democracy and human rights in Africa was written under our presidency.

The Government's vision is of an Africa at peace with itself and the world; a prosperous, democratic Africa in which the scourges of war, famine, disease and poverty are banished for ever; an Africa where ordinary people decide their own futures, freely and democratically; and an Africa as a good friend of Britain which recognises Britain as a good friend.

2.57 pm

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): It is good to be back in Westminster Hall. This is the fullest I have ever seen it for a debate, and it is the first time that I have taken part in a three-hour debate. It is good to see the Minister here for the debate that he has initiated looking so relaxed and suntanned. Several colleagues and I were also at yesterday's lunch, with more than 100 British business men and women who do business in Africa. We all appreciate the Minister's genuine concern and interest in Africa and his personal perspective on that country as a son of Africa, as he has dubbed himself. I wish him well with his brief.

I am, nevertheless, rather sad that the Minister's first outing with respect to this vast continent should be a three-hour debate in Westminster Hall on a subject so broad. It is impossible to cover all the issues and all the countries from Morocco to Mozambique, or Algeria to Angola. I recall one of the purposes of setting up Westminster Hall—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must address her comments to the subject of the debate, which has been determined by the authorities of the House of Commons. She can take up the question of why it is being held in Westminster Hall elsewhere.

Mrs. Gillan: I was going to say that, as the debate concerns the whole of Africa, I hope that the Minister will in future feel able to initiate regular debates on its regions. I hope that he will consider tabling a Government motion for a debate on each and every country in Africa to be held this Session. Africa could be debated much more fully in this Chamber if a Minister were present on a weekly basis.

Two or three matters illustrate the tale of two Africas, to which the Minister referred earlier. United Kingdom investment in Africa between 1983 and 1997 was about $5.7 billion—even more than investment from the United States, the second largest investor. The predicted growth for sub-Saharan Africa in 2000 is 3.9 per cent. Our commercial involvement in 1998, the last year for which figures are available, shows that 5 per cent. of all European Union exports to that region came from the United Kingdom and that UK exports account for 7 per cent. of all exports into sub-Saharan Africa.

We must take note of the reforms made and steps taken by African Governments to improve the foreign, direct investment climate: with tremendous private sector encouragement, the improved environment has resulted in more than 40 countries becoming members of the World Trade Organisation. There are about 17 broad-based privatisation programmes in place, and it is no secret that Africa looked to the United Kingdom, and the fine example set by Conservative Governments with regard to privatisation, to base their hope for a rosy economic future. Indeed, 25 countries in sub-Saharan Africa are at present transferring all or part of their telecommunications ownership from the state to the private sector, and there are plenty of opportunities there for UK businesses.

Many African countries have improved their regulatory framework for foreign direct investment, with investment promotion agencies to assist investors. Indeed, everything points to Africa being a good market and target for British companies; it is a good place to do business. As the fifth largest trading nation in the world, the UK is in most markets, and Africa should be featured in a major way.

As Africa grows, our businesses cannot afford to ignore its potential. Members may be interested to know that yesterday, African Lakes became the first fully listed UK plc to obtain a listing on the Nairobi stock exchange. The company's press release announced:

"The positive attitudes of the Capital Markets Authority and the NSE have been evidence throughout the process. The listing will increase awareness of African Lakes in a region which is important for the Company's future. It will enable Kenyan institutional and private capital to invest and participate in one of the region's most active and focused groups. We are committed to growing African Lakes in our domain of sub-Saharan Africa, an area for which the Economist Intelligence Unit recently projected economic growth at 39.9 per cent. pa—one of the fastest growing in the world."

I do not know whether the Minister saw the press release, or had the opportunity to talk to the African Lakes' representative, but yesterday was a red-letter day for United Kingdom business.

Africa has the great advantage of having a wonderful climate. I jokingly referred earlier to the Minister's suntan. Tourism is a great opportunity for businesses and it will help Africa's economic recovery. I hope that the Minister will tell us later how he is promoting the tourism sector, and British business and tourism interests abroad, particularly in South Africa, which he visited recently.

My second point relates to Zimbabwe, and I am sure that many of my colleagues will speak about it too, if they manage to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. Zimbabwe is, potentially, one of Africa's most prosperous nations. It achieved independence in 1980 under the leadership of Robert Mugabe, but the regime is undermining Zimbabwe's economy and damaging human rights. In fact, the economy is in free fall: inflation is 60 per cent., interest rates are at a similar level and the currency has plummeted. Mugabe's cronies stay rich, while the poor suffer. We are all familiar with the plan to seize lands illegally, to which my hon. Friends the Members for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) and for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) have alluded. Journalists have been arrested and the free press is under attack. Still, the Government continue the programme of bilateral aid.

I was sad that, in response to my intervention, the Minister gave the impression that he was familiar neither with the amount of aid that was going in nor with the auditing procedure for ensuring that that aid does not find its way into the wrong hands. Perhaps, with a little inspiration and a little more briefing, he will be able to tell us in his reply exactly what is happening about aid.

I hope that the Minister shares our concern about the forthcoming general election in Zimbabwe. Although the referendum was a triumph for the opposition in Zimbabwe, it did not take place without flagrant abuses by the Government, both in the media and at the polling stations. The scale of the defeat was such that even Robert Mugabe felt that he could not stuff any more ballot boxes than he did. How do the Government intend to send the Government of Zimbabwe the message that their behaviour during the referendum was wrong, that the untrammelled ambitions of the kleptocrats and cronies must be curbed and that Robert Mugabe's system of government is fundamentally corrupt? Will the Minister insist on sending

[Mrs. Gillan]

Commonwealth monitors to Zimbabwe? Is he prepared to suspend help to that Government, if they resist calls for impartial international supervision of their elections? He must tell us in his reply.

I know that the Minister shares our concern that Mugabe is treating the referendum defeat as something to which he can return later. Does the Minister understand, however, that should the ZANU-PF Government win the election, they could press for the nationalisation of farmland, claiming a democratic mandate denied them by the referendum? Does he accept that that argument could also be used to promote another constitution, containing threats to individual liberty and allowing Mugabe to reign for life, as a monarch of a bankrupt socialist republic? I urge the Minister to answer those questions at the end of the debate.

Dr. Tonge: I refer the hon. Lady back to what she said about bilateral aid. All of us understand and share her concern about the Government of Zimbabwe. Is she really suggesting that we should not give aid to that country, to people who are desperate for education and desperate for relief from the AIDS epidemic and for measures to stem its spread?

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Lady and I have participated together in far too many debates for me to fall for that line, and I am surprised that she is pursuing it. She was present at a sitting of a Committee that examined the efficacy of EU aid to Zimbabwe, when it became apparent from a Court of Auditors report that the aid was being misdirected.

Dr. Tonge: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Gillan: No, hold on for a second.

Dr. Tonge: The hon. Lady said bilateral aid.

Mrs. Gillan: Hold on. The aid was not reaching those most in need, and it is right that I should ask how bilateral aid is audited. If, as the European Union's Court of Auditors tells us, aid is being misdirected and is not reaching the poorest, the House also needs assurances that United Kingdom taxpayers' money going to Zimbabwe as aid to the poorest is not also being diverted to people who have no right to have their hands on it and who are creating more poverty, more ignorance and more death and despair.

Dr. Tonge: That point needs to be clarified. It is my understanding that most bilateral aid would be channelled through non-governmental organisations. Marie Stopes International, for instance, is doing great work on the AIDS front. We must have clarity, but the argument about bilaterial aid from this country is totally different from the one that we had on European Union aid.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Lady is dancing on the head of a pin, because we are not going to disagree on the need for aid and the excellence of NGOs giving aid. I seek assurances from the Minister that a sufficiently good audit process exists in Zimbabwe, because NGOs also work perforce with local people in the hinterland and rural areas. I want to know that the Government have a sufficient grip on taxpayers' money to make sure that it is not wasted. I hope that the hon. Lady agrees with me.

Mr. Brady: When replying to my earlier intervention, the Minister conceded the principle by saying that the Government are already withholding aid. He clearly said that the Government would give more aid if they were happy with the behaviour of the Mugabe regime. Does my hon. Friend agree that there is no difference in principle between what the hon. Gentleman says and what some of us are saying, which is that the Government should take a tougher line?

Mrs. Gillan: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. I want to know exactly what audit controls the Government are planning. Otherwise it is all warm words and no action.

Finally on this subject, we know the direction in which Robert Mugabe has taken his country, and it is the wrong one for the Commonwealth. I hope that the Minister will understand how ludicrous it is to have Robert Mugabe in the high-level group established to review the future of the Commonwealth. If the Commonwealth is to stand for the values set out in the Harare declaration, is it not about time that it set an example and suspended the Zimbabwean Government as they do not deserve to be one of the eight Governments in whose hands the debate on the future shape of the Commonwealth rests? I hope that the Minister will answer my question.

Mr. Paterson: Does my hon. Friend agree that another good ground for suspending Mr. Mugabe's membership of the high-level group is that he is stalling on the publication of two reports about the Matabeleland massacres in the early 1980s, when about 3,000 people were killed? Until his attempts to obstruct the judicial process—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody): Order. Interventions must be brief, even if they are on Matabeleland.

Mr. Paterson: Does my hon. Friend agree that stalling on those reports is a good enough reason for preventing Mr. Mugabe from being in the high-level group?

Mrs. Gillan: Yes, and I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I hope that he will catch your eye later, Madam Deputy Speaker, and be able to make a full contribution on that matter.

Before I finish, I want to raise a couple of specific issues with the Minister. One is from a news brief that arrived on my desk. There is a report that the Minister told the UNITA rebel leader, Jonas Savimbi, that he would be accorded a safe and comfortable retirement if he abandoned his activities. Of course, we know that the international community has declared Savimbi a war criminal. Will the Minister clarify what he is reported to have said? If he did not give such an assurance to Jonas Savimbi, we would like to know. If he did give that assurance, what plans does the Minister have for Mr. Savimbi's safe and comfortable retirement? I think that hon. Members would like to know during the debate.

My last point relates to the British Council, which does tremendous work throughout the world, particularly in Africa. It has worked with the Foreign Office for 20 years on the delivery of Britain's aid programme, as a partner and as a major commercial supplier. The council invested heavily in African infrastructure and appropriate staff skills. However, recent major changes in international development policy are especially worrying. Specifically, there are the changes to the mechanisms for aid delivery. The changes will significantly reduce the need for a supplier such as the British Council. The speed of that change in policy and the limited warning that was given to the British Council has left it with severe problems in resourcing its current network in Africa and will necessitate some major restructuring programmes. I hope that the Minister will comment on what appears to be the undermining of a tremendous British institution.

I have gone on for far too long and I apologise to hon. Members. As I said, however, with a debate that ranges across a whole continent it is impossible to bring all the key issues to the attention of the House and to discuss them properly. I have laid out a few of them for the Minister, and I hope that he can give straight answers to the questions that I have posed about his actions, rather than saying one thing but doing another.

3.15 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston): I welcome both the debate and my hon. Friend the Minister's positive and informative introduction to it. I was interested in the comments on Zimbabwe, but I know that you would agree, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the debate extends rather more widely than that, important though Zimbabwe is. My hon. Friend's encouraging remarks invite us to consider the comprehensive nature of Africa, particularly in the context of those countries that he visited and in the light of the changes that have taken place and the challenges that are still to be met.

Those of us of a particular vintage will recall the days of Alan Paton's "Cry the Beloved Country" and, more recently, Richard Attenborough's "Cry Freedom". We know what impact they had on public opinion in this country and elsewhere. As my hon. Friend the Minister was speaking and adding to Harold Macmillan's wise speech on the wind of change and the implications of Africa's history, I reflected on some of my own visits there, especially when I was the shadow Secretary of State for International Development. Indeed, I was part of a delegation led by your good self, Madam Deputy Speaker, to Botswana, where we had the opportunity of seeing relative prosperity and progress, not least at Chobe game park. Some of us also visited South Africa before the major changes there and Swaziland. Even then, Africa was a continent of contrasts; that has not changed, despite everything else that has.

My hon. Friend touched on many of my worries about Rwanda, Burundi, which is in a very serious situation, and Angola. Before I say a few words on that, perhaps I could develop the Minister's invitation for us to debate Africa's standing in the world, its economic influence, economic problems and the economic challenge facing many African countries, particularly the poorest people of the poorest countries in the poorest regions. I welcome what my hon. Friend said about the Government's policies on international development. Under my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development, our policies—including the policies on debt which are supported by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor—have been inspiring and progressive. I welcome the changes that even the World bank and the International Monetary Fund have made. I trust that we will not hear an argument against that progress; we want to see more of it, but we welcome that start.

We have been brought up to date on Africa by not only my hon. Friend, but by what the World bank and other important organisations have said. In an overview, the World bank group in Africa made some important points. It said:

"Forty per cent. of the population in Sub-Saharan Africa live on less than $1 a day."

While we rightly deal with abuse of public money, we need to view it in its proper context and assess priorities. The overview continued:

"In aggregate, this combination of low economic growth, the highest rate of population increase in the world (at 2.8 per cent.) and a high burden of dependants to workers, puts Africa low on the rankings for those most critical indicators of social progress: how long people live, how much knowledge they acquire and how much access they have to resources necessary for a better standard of living."

It also stated:

"To put it another way, each additional dollar in aid is five times more effective in countries with good policies"— and I was delighted that my hon. Friend did not dodge that issue.

We have debated structural adjustment—or conditionality, as it used to be called—for many years. We have done so knowing that we should not penalise individual citizens in any country because of their Government's—often unelected Government's—policies, particularly against the backdrop of the lifestyle that millions of people, especially in Africa, are forced to live.

My hon. Friend drew attention to educational problems in African countries. He said elsewhere, at an excellent meeting that I attended, that he was disappointed by an unimpressive decade for Africa. Instead of improving, educational policy has deteriorated. Sixteen of 48 countries in sub-Saharan Africa still enrol fewer than half their children in primary schools—and enrolment rates are dropping. The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) mentioned adult literacy which, as stated in the Minister's report, is particularly low among women. Fewer than 50 per cent. of women in these countries are literate, and enrolment rates are dropping. That poses tremendous social challenges, even without the other problems that I mentioned earlier.

I wish to refer briefly to a speech made by the vice-president of the World bank in which he dealt with important social issues. He said:

"Social development in Africa still trails badly. Birth rates, childhood and maternal deaths are the highest in the world, and more than a quarter of African children are malnourished. Two hundred million Africans have no access to proper health services ... Diseases both old and new are undoing many of the gains made since independence. More than nine out of 10 Africans are still at risk of contracting malaria, an ancient killer. And nearly 23 million Africans are now living with HIV/AIDS"

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

That remains an important issue when such limited resources are available for health care in individual African countries.

In the light of the Minister's refreshing report, and because they are so important, I wish to move on to three countries. I am glad that my hon. Friend mentioned Angola. I recall meeting President dos Santos of Angola six years ago, as my hon. Friend has done. At the time, the president was optimistic about the agreements reached with Savimbi of UNITA. Today we find broken dreams, dashed hopes, a much worse war raging there, with land mines multiplying daily, more people than ever being killed and injured and the great hopes that we had for peace being shattered. I welcome what my hon. Friend said about Savimbi.

If the international community is determined to apply itself positively to getting a settlement in Angola it will have to accept that the country is a mass of contradictions. It is potentially one of the world's richest countries in terms of oil, diamonds and natural resources which, if they are being used at all, are put to improper use. My hon. Friend needs no reminding that even with that background, Angola is number one on the list of heavily indebted, poor countries. I welcome my hon. Friend's commitment to progress.

I shall deal briefly with the extremely serious situation in Burundi. In many ways, Burundi was overshadowed by the tragic events in Rwanda and the implications for the neighbouring African states. I will read a letter that I received from Ben Crampton, the co-ordinator of the all-party parliamentary group, on Rwanda, the great lakes region and the prevention of genocide:

"Burundi is the main issue of concern at the moment since it is the country where a little pressure might make a big difference. I can't stress enough how desperate the situation is there. If the economy collapses there is a real danger of a military coup which could bring to power a hardline Tutsi faction within the army and put an end to the Arusha peace talks once and for all. The assassination of the president in 1993 resulted in unspeakable bloodshed, which was eclipsed by the slaughter in Rwanda a few months later."

In reply, I hope that my hon. Friend will respond to the serious concerns about Burundi and comment on the implications for its neighbours.

As an example, I turn to one of my visits to Uganda some years ago with David Steel, now Lord Steel of Aikwood, to study the problem of AIDS, and the country's debt—which alone would be bad enough for any country to deal with. We saw some of the most grotesque examples of what Burns called "Man's inhumanity to man"—the consequences of what was happening in Rwanda. I will not go into detail because it is not particularly pleasant. I saw the refugee camps at the borders of Uganda, Zaire and Rwanda and the multilated bodies of men, women and children floating down Lake Victoria. I saw the problems that the Ugandan people had to get their food. Fishing was virtually destroyed because of the environmental consequences of that terrible genocide. If that was true of Uganda, Rwanda and Zaire, it remains true of countries suffering civil war. Where there is strife, we should apply ourselves as an international community to the solution of problems—and perhaps apply ourselves more forcefully to such problem solving in Africa. I trust that we will do that.

I welcome debates on issues such as this. Indeed, we are having more such debates than we did previously. However, we should have democratic, open debate reflecting the transparency which the Government wish to see in every field, including the World bank and the International Monetary Fund. That transparency should also be apparent in the responsibilities of elected leaders in Zimbabwe and other African states. Progress has been made, but we should not be complacent. People are still crying for freedom. As a Parliament dedicated to such objectives, we should seek to assist them in their journey.

3.30 pm

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmnd Park): I, too, welcome the opportunity to debate Africa. Incidentally, I regret that we never had an opportunity to debate the White Paper on development, the first such paper for 20 years. Perhaps our debate will go some way toward stemming our irritation at not having had a chance to debate such issues.

Africa used to be quite a big part of the British empire. Some say—indeed, I have heard it said in the Chamber—that it was much better in those days and it is a pity that we cannot return to the days of empire. Whatever Britain did to rule or—as some say—exploit Africa, it was certainly not sustainable. Many African countries broke up in corruption and confusion in the 1940s and '50s, when we had to get rid of the colonies at the end of the second world war.

Colonial divisions did not help. Ever since I was at school, I have said that colonialists divided Africa with a pencil and ruler, because the map is all straight lines. Indeed, last week, a Namibian sitting next to me in an airplane flying over the border between Namibia and South Africa said, "Look. There's your straight line." He pointed out a dead straight fence. In colonial days, there was no recognition of natural groupings, tribal boundaries and so on. The land was simply divided up and people had to get on with things.

We have heard about British business wanting to invest in Africa. I was at yesterday's lunch and it is a pity that some of our food could not be shipped to some of the African countries I have visited. Government policies should encourage investment. The only way that that can be done is to ensure that no departmental policies cause instability and conflict in Africa. That is a case for joined-up government if ever there was one.

As international development spokesperson for the Liberal Democrats, I have visited several African countries in the past three years. As a Member of Parliament, it is a great privilege to have such an opportunity. Many of the places that I visited were involved in the programme of the Select Committee on International Development, so I have had a good opportunity to see in depth what is happening.

Four things stand out in my mind, one of which is conflict. Three quarters of countries in sub-Saharan Africa are engaged in, or under threat of, armed conflict. The HIV/AIDS epidemic rages throughout sub-Saharan Africa, affecting 25 to 30 per cent. of the population in most of the countries. Unlike previous epidemics, which would wipe out the very young, the elderly, the weak and the frail, the AIDS epidemic is wiping out economically active young people. That is a tragedy with desperate consequences for the economies of such countries. Poverty leads to a lack of education, and education, as we all know, is essential for a good and growing economy. A lack of education leads to poor governance and corruption. We heard a great deal about that from the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan).

All those factors affect African countries. Yes, there are tremendous signs of recovery and development. When I was in Uganda I was constantly amazed and delighted at how that country was coping and growing, and how positive the people were. Likewise, in South Africa—I have not been there, but I was recently in Namibia—there is extraordinary optimism, organisation, and good governance. It has everything going for it. Mozambique, the despair of all of us as it bumped along the bottom a few years ago, now has one of the fastest growing economies. Nigeria and Ghana are showing good signs, and Botswana is the champion with the highest growth of the African countries. It is impossible to cover all aspects of Africa and the UK engagement in that continent, so I shall confine myself to a few aspects that concern me most, and then I shall talk about one country in particular.

Conflict is one of the crucial issues in Africa. Three quarters of the countries of sub-Saharan Africa are in armed conflict or at threat from armed conflict. Excluding South Africa, the arms spending in sub-Saharan Africa rose by 14 per cent. last year. The economic growth average was 1 per cent. Ninety per cent. of the casualties in these wars are civilians. Many of these countries are subject to arms embargoes, but that can be irrelevant to the combatants in a civil war. We have all heard of Mil Tec, the scandal in Rwanda, Sandline and Sierra Leone. A good "Dispatches" programme just before Christmas showed how easily arms brokers can transfer arms to any country whether there is an embargo or not.

When I was staying in a village in southern Sudan for a few days last year I talked to some of the rebel leaders. When I suggested that the embargo on arms trade with northern and southern Sudan might make it difficult for them to get arms to pursue the war, they looked at me as if I was completely mad. They told me that it was easy, and that they could get arms from anywhere. They are flown in from across the borders. They need them and they get them. That is a terrible reflection on what is going on in the west. The Government dodge the issue of arms brokers time after time. The people who break these embargoes are dealers in death worldwide. Do they ever see the consequences of their business, as many hon. Members have?

The report of the Select Committee on International Development on conflict prevention recommended a register of arms brokers. Until recently I was a member of the Committee's inquiry into the annual reports for 1997 and 1998 on strategic export controls. The first report has just been published and states:

"We support a more stringent national policy on brokering and trafficking, which could act as a spur to international action."

In other words, Britain should be leading the way on this problem. It continues:

"We look to the 1999 Annual Report to make some specific reference to the Government's view on the way forward"

We must do something about arms brokering.

The report also emphasises the need for proper scrutiny of legitimate arms exports requiring licences and the involvement of the Foreign Office and the Department for International Development. These Departments are responsible for our engagement in Africa and encourage investment. Yet I have evidence from many parliamentary questions that they are not involved as much as they should be, and that they are constantly overruled. The Secretary of State for International Development did not even see the annual report on arms exports until it was published.

I could not leave the subject of arms control without mentioning Zimbabwe, but the Minister said that I was flogging the same old horse. I remind him that that horse is not yet dead. People in Zimbabwe have overwhelmingly rejected their Government, yet we have been prepared to repair their Hawk jets and so continue the fight in the Congo. Will the Minister comment on criterion 8 of the European code of conduct, which we have signed up to and think important to obey? Criterion 8 states:

"Member States will take into account, in the light of information from relevant sources such as UNDP, World Bank, IMF and OECD reports, whether the proposed export would seriously hamper the sustainable development of the recipient country. They will consider in this context the recipient country's relative levels of military and social expenditure taking into account any EU or bi-lateral aid."

That is a most interesting little clause.

The war in the Congo is costing Zimbabwe £1 million a day. There is unemployment all over that country. Its Government are in disarray. They are corrupt and in debt. HIV/AIDS is raging, with 25 per cent. of the population affected. What is the rationale of our exporting Hawk jet parts to Zimbabwe when it is in that state, irrespective of whether we are fulfilling a contract? Surely, although we would have had to pay if we had breached the contract, doing so would have been worth while and a darn sight cheaper in the long run than clearing up the mess that is sure to follow. Before leaving that subject, I must pay tribute to the Prime Minister and the Government for revising their policy on selling arms to African countries.

Mrs. Gillan: While the hon. Lady is praising the Prime Minister so fulsomely, does she agree that it was the Prime Minister who overruled the Foreign Office to enable the spare parts to be sent to Zimbabwe? Will she then revise her remarks?

Dr. Tonge: I thank the hon. Lady for her typical intervention, but I believe that the carrot is more effective than the stick. The Prime Minister made the announcement in response to a parliamentary question that I tabled, which is why I keep mentioning it. As he has gone that far, and we welcome what the Government have done, he should extend his thinking a little further and realise that the parts for the Hawk jets should be involved in the equation. It is terribly important that he understand that.

I would have mentioned HIV/AIDS further, but the Minister has dealt with it fully, so I shall simply refer to my first sight of Africa. After arriving at Entebbe airport in Uganda, I passed through a few villages on the way to Kampala. I could not understand why there were piles of coffins in every village. One hut in each village housed a coffin maker and coffins were piled up outside. Naive western woman says, "Coffins are good business here." Indeed, they are because of the AIDS epidemic. The coffin maker has the best business in each village and can sell a coffin a day because of AIDS. That fact, not just the sight of sick people obviously suffering from AIDS and its complications, brought the problem home to me. Those piles of coffins have stuck in my mind.

Whatever the situation in a particular country in sub-Saharan Africa and whatever the Government involved are like—I refer to my intervention on the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham—I urge the Government not to stop our investment in education and the use of condoms or the striving and work being done to find an AIDS vaccine. That is the most essential and valuable thing that we can do for Africa.

I cannot sit down without mentioning the Sudan. This time last year, I spent several days living in a village compound in Baht el Ghaza, which is situated in the war zone. My stay left a mark on me. I cannot forget the Dinka and the Nuer people of southern Sudan, who are hardworking, intelligent and lovers of Great Britain. Why are we not helping them more? They speak English and listen to the World Service. I well remember the first morning that I woke up in a straw stockaded compound. As dawn broke, I suddenly realised that the only sound was that of Lilliburlero, drifting across the compound. One Dinka tribesman was sleeping in the compound with us and he had managed to keep his little tranny radio away from the raiders who threaten the people at all times and which wreck their villages. He switched on his transistor radio for five minutes every morning to listen to the BBC World Service. That is a plug for the World Service, which is still listened to throughout Africa, where it is so greatly valued. It has been a huge influence for good in that continent, and I should hate to believe that the Government would even dare think about cutting the funding for that wonderful service.

The people in the area are reduced to living in the stone age. I would challenge anyone to find people who are so deprived as those in Baht el Ghaza. There is total poverty; nothing is left. Everything has been taken, wrecked or ruined. The people plant crops, but the war ensures that they are destroyed before they can be harvested. Women and children are taken away up to the north. There is terror and starvation. These are the results of decades of war between north and south Sudan, a war that is now exacerbated by the extraction of oil in southern Sudan.

I commend to hon. Members the Harker report, for which some of us have been waiting and which was published in the past few days. This independent report was commissioned by the Government of Canada to investigate the conditions in southern Sudan and to track down some of the myths and truths in that area. Talisman, a big oil company based in Canada, is working in the southern Sudan oil fields, as are British companies. Last year, the Department of Trade and Industry produced a flowery document telling British business men how they could invest in the oil fields in southern Sudan. The document was scurrilous, and, thank goodness, the Foreign Office—I hope that it was the Foreign Office—had it withdrawn. British companies are operating in the region, and around the oil fields there is more rape, pillage, fire, destruction and indiscriminate bombing than in other areas. The Harker report which, as I said, is an independent report from another Government—I commend the Canadian Government for having commissioned it—shows exactly what is going on. The case is urgent: we must read the report, do something about the Sudan and re-engage in the region.

The Minister will tell us that the Intergovernmental Authority on Development talks are in place to broker peace. I feel that they are getting nowhere and that a much more concentrated international effort is needed. In the meantime, British companies should not be involved in the area. An article in one of this morning's broadsheets stated that the United States had banned trade with a Sudanese oil joint venture in an effort to stop the war. There should be no more involvement in the oil fields until the war is settled and peace is restored to the people after 30 years, or whatever the period is.

Lastly, I appreciate the Minister's comments and feel uplifted following yesterday's lunch. We must ignore the gloom and think about encouraging investment in Africa. As I have already mentioned, there are many success stories, but to ensure regeneration in the continent, we must re-engage in Africa. The Government must ensure that the policies of all Departments promote the stability of the continent, stamp out corruption, invest in education and health care and, above all, do nothing to increase conflict. Africa is a beautiful continent full of people who long to be part of our world, and we owe it to them to help them become peaceful and prosperous.

3.50 pm

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): This is an important, interesting and wide-ranging debate. I wish to concentrate my remarks on Kenya. I chair the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Kenya group and I have been privileged to visit Kenya many times. I last visited that country last summer, on a CPA visit led by my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody).

Kenya is an African Commonwealth country, which has historic and close links with the United Kingdom. We have built up a relationship of understanding based on frankness between the two countries. As I am sure hon. Members know, Kenya, like many African countries, is very beautiful. It is popular with tourists and has much to offer. Since independence, it has been stable. Over the years, the political system has changed. It used to be dominated by one political party, KANU. The present make-up of the Kenya Parliament is that, although KANU remains a major political party, there are now also opposition parties, which play an ever-increasing role in the political affairs of the country. That is undoubtedly welcome.

The President, Daniel arap Moi, who has led the country for many years, has stated that he will not seek re-election at the next presidential elections, so we will start to see major political changes in Kenya. That is vital for democracy. I hope that we will encourage those changes and support the development of human rights at every level of society.

We also know that, like many other African countries, Kenya is poor and, for many people, life is hard. I have seen many aspects of life in Kenya. I have seen a life where progress, opportunity and life style are so very different from that which we and people in other parts of the world experience. That is why I am delighted to pay the warmest tribute to the Government, and in particular to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development, for her interest in Kenya, where she is known and widely respected. Our aid to Kenya is about £43 million, which marks a significant increase in recent years. When, in December last year, I asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State a question about our involvement with aid projects in Kenya, she replied that we financially support 25 projects. Those projects cover many day-to-day issues of importance to the people of Kenya: women's projects, education projects, family planning and family health, HIV/AIDS preventive measures and agricultural projects. We have a proud record of help and assistance in Kenya, which I fully support.

We all have issues to highlight that are relevant to countries such as Kenya. High on the agenda must be what we and other important donor countries give to Kenya to improve its economy and social structure and to create employment. Some aspects of the Kenyan economy are successful, but others, such as the tourism industry, are not. My hon. Friend the Minister knows that that industry is enormously important. It creates employment and a demand for services, and brings in hard currency. However, the country and the people are suffering because it is not doing well. I hope that my hon. Friend will tell us how the United Kingdom, which has an excellent tourism industry, will help Kenya to redevelop what could and should be a major income earner. I also hope that he will say how we are helping other African countries to develop their trading opportunities in the world, especially with the European Union.

I mentioned some of the projects that we are funding in Kenya, many of which involve women. They work far harder than the men, which may be true of other African countries, while coping with the family responsibilities. Women suffer most throughout the country and have the hardest time in what is a difficult life for many people. That is why I hope that donor countries will give a greater commitment to improving the life of women, so that they receive greater respect and better opportunities.

There are many ways to do that. Millions of people in Kenya have no access to adequate water supplies. Many hon. Members will be aware that women walk miles every day to get water for their families. Surely modern technology can help us to bring that essential resource nearer to where people live. That would save hours of walking. Men are never seen walking to water supplies; young children sometimes go, but it is invariably women, who will have done many other jobs earlier in the day. I hope that my hon. Friend will give the issue the consideration that it deserves. I want to see a greater commitment to the development of women's projects in Kenya. Many women of great ability do not have the resources or the know-how to develop the opportunities that would help their families and country. Britain, with its long links with Commonwealth countries, should be committed to that.

Health care is a major issue. When someone becomes ill, it causes problems for their family. In Kenya, people must travel a long way to get medical attention from a doctor or hospital. We know of the huge cost of buying medicine. Kenya's health service is not like ours. We are told repeatedly that many people who need urgent medical care get none because of the cost of medicines. The Minister will be aware of that. We have skills in the United Kingdom, and in the other important donor countries that help Kenya in many ways, and we must consider the situation.

Like you, Madam Deputy Speaker, I always visit schools when I go to Kenya and I have visited many. Schools should be happy places where youngsters have the opportunity to get a good education that will offer them opportunities as they grow older and embark on life in their country. Sadly, in Kenya, rates for school enrolment and for the completion of youngsters' education have been falling, especially for young girls. Successive reports say that the reason for that is the cost to families of getting their children educated. Figures were mentioned in earlier speeches. It is unsurprising that that is the case because about 50 per cent. of the Kenyan population earn but a few shillings a day. The lack of education facilities is surely unacceptable to all hon. Members. I hope that we shall give great consideration to the matter.

We have a special role regarding Kenya, because of its Commonwealth links. I have touched on some of the important issues faced by Kenya and I could mention others. HIV and AIDS have already been considered. Countries such as ours must help not only financially but with our skills and knowledge to protect Kenya's natural resources. We must help economic development. Kenya has suffered from an enormous influx of refugees from its neighbours because of the problems that those countries face. Above all, we must work for the elimination of poverty. That opinion is supported throughout the House.

Like other hon. Members, I pay the warmest tribute to the work of the British Council. It does magnificent work in Kenya and other countries, not only in Africa. Sadly, the Government to whom I am proud to belong do not always give the total commitment that they should to its work. I should also pay a warm tribute to the British high commissioner for Kenya and his staff—he does an excellent job. You know him, Madam Deputy Speaker, as do I. We should be proud that he represents us in that important Commonwealth country.

I have talked about what we should be committed to doing. I was delighted to hear the opening remarks of the Minister of State about his Department's work with Kenya. There have been differences. Sadly, constructive, or sometimes critical, dialogue is not always welcomed because of attitudes in Kenya. I hope that the Kenyan Government will accept that, through our discussion and the issues that we seek to raise, we extend the hand of friendship. Our priority is to improve the daily life of the people, wherever they live in that beautiful country—a country that has enormous potential.

I fully endorse what my hon. Friend the Minister said about the essential reforms on which he is working with the Kenyan Government. The members of the all-party Kenya group, and all hon. Members here today who have an interest in African affairs, will wish to see those reforms being achieved.

4.5 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury): Madam Deputy Speaker, it is a pleasure to make my first contribution while you are in the Chair, especially as you are the Member of Parliament for my neighbouring constituency of Crewe and Nantwich. This is my first appearance in the Chamber. It reminds me of a rather upmarket Blackpool winter-gardens version of a mock mediaeval dining room, but I am sure that I will get used to it.

The Minister and I have one thing in common. We are both sons of Africa: we were both born there. I am sure that the Minister is as proud of having lived in South Africa, despite his and his family's forced departure at such an early age, as I am of having lived in Mtwara, in what was then Tanganyika—it is now Tanzania—before moving to Mombasa in Kenya, which used to be pronounced "Keeyna". I thank the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) for his forensic and experienced analysis of that country and its current problems.

Over the years, in a combined business and charitable guise, I have had the opportunity to get to know the Sarahan and Sahel states in west and north-west Africa. I have no doubt that the Minister's knowledge, experience and care for Africa are genuine. Sadly, despite sharing our continent of birth, the Minister and I are forced to part company because of a higher authority. Having followed African matters closely, particularly this country's engagement with that great continent, I am greatly disappointed that the United Kingdom is losing a real and crucial opportunity in its relations with Africa.

Our historical connection with Africa has been fine and genuinely outstanding. At one time we had administrative responsibility for that continent. Of course, serious and even disgraceful incidents took place, but many of them were a function of their time in history rather than, as they are now, a source of shame or guilt. Compared with other former colonial powers in Africa, we can hold our head up high. That, however, is the past. Here, today, we must focus on the present, and on the United Kingdom's future engagement in Africa.

The problem is not the Minister's; it is a problem for that higher authority—the Foreign Secretary. For many years, I have lived and worked abroad, not only in Africa but in the far east, Australasia, continental Europe, north America, central America and south America. I am acutely aware of those countries' perceptions of this country's political, economic and commercial standing in their corridors of power and boardrooms. I once joined a Conservative Trade and Industry Minister on a mission to Latin America, and I was aware of the interrelationship between the Government and the commercial world, and how important in this day and age it is to have mutual understanding.

I was elected to the House of Commons only seven months ago, so I have recent experience of the effect of our foreign policy in those corridors and boardrooms since Labour came to office and since the Foreign Secretary took up his post. Given the ridicule and confusion that his foreign policy has created in Africa and, although perhaps a little less so, in other countries, like so many of our fellow citizens, be they politicians, diplomats, business men and women, civil servants or tourists, I am ashamed that I and my country are represented abroad by the current Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Paterson: Would my hon. Friend comment on what was said in The Jersusalem Post after the Foreign Secretary's disastrous trip to the middle east, about the effect for the Prime Minister of having "a diplomat like Cook by his side"?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The debate is about Africa.

Mr. O'Brien: Indeed. I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. Perhaps I may give another example of what I am talking about, bearing in mind, Madam Deputy Speaker, your stricture that we are talking about Africa.

When a dozen wars are simmering on that continent, affecting 200 million people, is it not a disgrace that Britain offers troops on standby for peacekeeping operations and reneges on the promise as soon as it is unveiled? I refer to a pledge made last year. In June 1999, in one of the more remarkable instances of posturing by a Foreign Secretary who is renowned just for that, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) told Kofi Annan that Britain would have 8,000 troops on standby to be used by the UN for rapid response emergencies. Before the Minister tells us that the Foreign Secretary was quoted out of context, I shall quote exactly what he said on 25 June:

"The problem for the UN is that every time there is a fire they have had to get down the blueprint and start to build a fire engine. At least now they will have the components for the fire engine.

We will be giving the UN an undertaking that when called upon we are prepared to commit [troops] for an operation. We will earmark some so that they are ready to be used when the time comes. It will always remain our decision to respond to the decision [of the UN] but I do not think we have let you down yet, Kofi."

On 15 December in New York, in a speech entitled "The UN's partnership with Africa", the Minister declared "we need better peacekeeping" in Africa. He is right. We need better peacekeeping, but not posturing by his left-wing boss, whose ambitions are bigger than his budget. Will the Minister promise the House of Commons that in future the Government will not promise more in peacekeeping than they can deliver? That is one of the most serious let-downs for our potential and current relationships across Africa.

The Minister has talked in the House of Commons and elsewhere about a renaissance in Africa and about backing winners there, as if that is a new policy or passes for a new ethical foreign policy. However, as was, I understand, pointed out to him by a civil servant from the Department for International Development at the all-party Africa group this week, is not backing winners and promoting a renaissance merely a continuation of Britain's policy? In his conceit, the Foreign Secretary forgot to say that for the best part of 400 years British foreign policy has had a significant ethical element and has always been a mixture of patriotism, principle and pragmatism.

When the Foreign Secretary took office he ignored the achievements of his predecessors and loftily announced that foreign policy must have an ethical dimension. I could not help noticing during the Minister's opening remarks that he defined the word "ethical" in terms of a concept better known in the world of conveyancing. He said that it was subject to contract, in justification of the Government's defiance of its ethical foreign policy by selling spare parts for Hawk jets to Zimbabwe, despite that country's involvement in a military adventure in the Congo. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) said—and I support all that she so cogently argued—that is hardly evidence of a new policy from the Prime Minister with respect to selling arms to Africa.

A report in the "World Today" this month commented on the United States taking over the presidency of the United Nations Security Council. The United States declared January the month of Africa. It is not the first time that new initiatives have been announced for a continent that some describe as forgotten. The report said:

"During the Cold War, the countries in the Horn of Africa received substantial aid because they were strategically significant to the United States and Soviet political and military engagement in the Middle East. However, with a change in the military situation and the gradual development of the Middle East peace process, the Horn has lost its importance . . . there have been humanitarian enterprises and regional diplomacy, mainly led by the US."

Ethiopia and Eritrea have indeed lost importance. The report continued:

"The division of Africa into what is described as utile and inutile"— that is French diplomacy, I am told—

"sits uncomfortably with claims of an ethical dimension in foreign policy and the high moral crusade proclaimed both by Prime Minister Blair and President Clinton in the international arena."

That was an important and objective comment.

The future of Africa is first and last dependent on the creation and maintenance of confidence, as the Minister said, because that is what draws in business, of which I have some experience. Prosperity is the best guarantor of reducing the negative pull of tribalism and factionalism.

The security risk increasingly associated with hosting refugees from intractable regional conflicts and the resulting unwillingness by host Governments to provide asylum protection creates a dilemma: one may want to do the decent thing, but conflicts mean that difficult decisions must be taken.

Tanzania remains a beacon, to use a current term—

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): Fashionable.

Mr. O'Brien: Yes, a fashionable term. Tanzania is exemplary in hosting some of the largest refugee populations. I salute Tanzania's progress and, to the extent that it may have anything to do with the United Kingdom, I accept that it is probably also to the Minister's credit; but as sure as the cloud will cover the peak of Mount Kilimanjaro whenever one wants to see it or to photograph its glorious splendour, it is despite, not because of, the Foreign Secretary that we have made progress in our engagement in Africa. Like so many of those with whom I have shared business ventures in Africa, I am ashamed of our Foreign Secretary's approach to foreign policy.

4.17 pm

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I was privileged to visit Zambia during the summer, under the auspices of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I was impressed by its people, its land, its abundance of water, its fertility and its huge potential for tourism. It is a country, like many in Africa, blighted by poverty, by its debt burden and by the scourge of AIDS. Infection rates are running at an incredible 25 per cent. among adults. Swathes of its population—its most productive people, those in their 30s and 40s, and whole families—have been wiped out by AIDS.

I visited the country just before the AIDS conference in Lusaka. AIDS was discussed at an official level, but even so complacency prevailed there. Zambia does not have the political leadership that has stemmed the spread of AIDS and HIV in Uganda and Thailand. Cultural practices mean that widowed women sleep with their dead husband's male relatives, which encourages the spread of AIDS. Condoms, although talked about, are not widely used. Widows are also thrown out of their homes when relatives decide to repossess the house. It is illegal, of course, but women and their children, already deprived of their main breadwinner, are put out on the streets.

There are projects that try to cater for the hundreds of homeless street orphans. They attempt to give a meal a day and some education, but they have virtually no resources and no outside assistance. Without education and nutrition, those street children are unlikely to live to a productive age, especially given the AIDS epidemic. I recognise that the UK is playing a significant role in trying to support health programmes and clinics, but more needs to be done.

Zambia has not been torn apart by conflict, so it seems to be a forgotten corner of Africa, yet it has the legacy of other conflicts. Land mines along its borders continue to pose real problems. President Chiluba has a proud record of promoting peace in the Democratic Republic of Congo, where he led the Lusaka peace accord while we were there, but Zambia has become a principal conduit—people very high up in the Government are implicated—for busting UN sanctions against UNITA. President Chiluba must act and we must back him in stamping that out. Having met him, I do not believe that he wants his Government involved in sustaining such a devastating war, which is now spilling over the Zambian border.

Zambia is a wonderful country with huge potential. The tourist board's slogan proclaimed "Zambia: the real Africa" and it was right. The country feels real: unsanitised, unpackaged and largely unvisited. It offers the best of wild Africa—abundant game and top guides—yet although it is twice the size of Zimbabwe, it receives only about 10 per cent. of the number of tourists.

The Commonwealth Parliamentary Association delegation visited Victoria Falls and the South Luangwa nature reserve. We were impressed by the totally unspoilt environment. While the spectacle of Niagara Falls is spoilt by over-commercialisation, at Victoria Falls—at least on the Zambian side—there was just a curio stand, a place to buy postcards and drinks, and lavatories. Minimal provision meant maximum enjoyment.

[Charlotte Atkins]

The Zambian Government are under tremendous pressure to allow a major hotel chain to build a luxury hotel overlooking the falls. I am pleased to say that they are resisting that; they recognise that their future lies in eco-tourism and sustainable, long-term development. I fear, however, that the country's lack of infrastructure and inward investment makes it difficult for the Government to reject all commercialisation. At present, most tourists fly into Victoria Falls airport in Zimbabwe to visit the area, rather than using the closer Livingstone airport because the facilities of the latter are poor and the runway is a little too bumpy for many airlines. When the delegation enjoyed an evening boat cruise on the Zambezi, we experienced a similar problem. Only two of the many boats operating on the river were registered in Zambia. All the others were from Zimbabwe, although they all used the Zambian side of the river because there was more wildlife to be seen there.

What the country needs is appropriate and ethical investment. There must be two interlinked goals: the development of local people and the conservation of the environment and wildlife. Local communities must see that visitors pay because they want to see the wildlife, and local people should understand that they will benefit from conservation. It is important that Zambia learns from the mistakes of its neighbours. I have heard countless stories of people going on long game drives in Kenya and seeing hardly any animals. If one appears, a dozen or more vehicles arrive within minutes.

Nothing could be more different from the experience of the South Luangwa nature reserve where we had many close encounters—indeed, some were extremely close. Unlike in Kenya, the guides are not allowed to radio other guides to attract them. They do not need to: the game is abundant. At present, few local people are involved in tourism, beyond employment as camp workers and scouts. The way forward must be for game lodges and safari operators to plough money back into local communities. Tourists, though few, should ask their local tour operators how much revenue goes back directly to local people.

On a six-hour road journey from Lusaka to Livingstone, the CPA delegation saw what benefits investment can bring. Where there is irrigation—there is an abundance of water in Zambia—the land is fertile; but where there is no irrigation, little is grown and poverty prevails. I hope that the Government will play their part in helping Zambia to achieve the increased inward investment that it so desperately needs.

Mrs. Gillan: I am listening carefully to the hon. Lady's account of a trip that obviously left its mark on her. Did she have the opportunity to discuss refugees in Zambia? Is she aware that the UN singled out Zambia for praise for hosting more than 200,000 refugees? What extra support could be given to Zambia for taking on that role when other countries are so busy rejecting it?

Charlotte Atkins: We were indeed able to discuss that issue. Zambia certainly takes more than its fair share of the burden, especially in view of the country's poverty. Its Government set budgets, but are seldom able to meet them because of a lack of resources. Zambia certainly should be praised and supported for its valuable work.

I hope that the Government will help Zambia to achieve increased inward investment—sustainable commercial investment. That might help it to avoid grasping a dangerous short-term strategy and to achieve long-term sustainable development.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Several hon. Members wish to speak. If they exercise a little self-restraint, they will be able to contribute to the debate.

4.28 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): I shall do my best to follow your instructions, Mrs. Dunwoody.

I wish to draw attention to double standards over Zimbabwe. When I was at university in Cambridge, the great issue was the civil war in Rhodesia, as it was then called. A great campaign was fought in the press and protests were made with the overwhelming support of left-wing agitators. The Minister would be proud to include himself among them.

The reality of the profoundly horrible civil war was brought home to me when a Viscount was shot down and a friend of mine lost both her parents who were travelling on it. It is striking that we hear nothing about the country now, despite what Mugabe has done to it since he came to power. Where the Royal Navy failed, he succeeded. The BEIRA patrol attempted to stop petrol imports reaching Rhodesia. Now, thanks to the incompetence and corruption of the Mugabe regime, petrol and diesel are hard to come by. According to one of the Harare newspapers, trucks recently had to wait three hours to buy 20 litres—only four gallons—of fuel. Diesel is in short supply and farmers have been hit, so they cannot harvest tabacco. That is the result, I repeat, of sheer incompetence.

Between August 1997 and December 1998, the Zimbabwean dollar changed, in relation to the American dollar, from seven to 38, which pushed up the price of imports. Like most communists, the Government were so incompetent that they did not change the price of fuel in Zimbabwe. Noczim, the national oil company of Zimbabwe, was not allowed to increase its prices and it ran up a deficit of $9 billion. We do not have time to go into the expense of the war in the Congo, which is probably being fought for Mugabe's personal gain.

The impact on the country is devastating. The hon. Member for Tooting. (Mr. Cox) mentioned the value of education. According to a report in the Zimbabwe Standard on 30 January, the Cambridge examination board is refusing to clear examination results because it is owed £2.6 million by the Zimbabwean Government. An official said:

"Forex reserves at the central bank have dwindled to alarming levels. Well, government can make a directive, but if there is no forex nothing will be done."

That affects every level of Zimbabwe, yet no one appears to be protesting.

Mr. Tony Colman (Putney): I suggest that the hon. Gentleman look at yesterday's Financial Times, in which the Minister delivered a stinging denunciation of the Zimbabwean regime.

Mr. Paterson: I should be delighted to read that report. However, the Minister gave a different impression when he spoke earlier. The hon. Gentleman might have turned up late and missed the Minister's speech.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) spoke movingly of her direct experiences. AIDS is a grotesque problem in Zimbabwe. According to the UN, one in four adults between the ages of 15 and 49 have AIDS, 2,500 people die of the disease every week and, incredibly, the average life expectancy will have fallen from 61 to 39 by 2010. There is astonishing corruption and theft.

Dr. Tonge: I must take the hon. Gentleman to task, as I feel strongly about AIDS.

AIDS did not occur in the past couple of years. Ten or more years ago, the medical profession was sounding clear warnings about it. The previous Government did nothing apart from mount a brief television campaign, and then the issue disappeared.

Mr. Paterson: I am grateful for that. However, I am discussing the Mugabe regime, which has been in power since the 1980s—[Interruption.] If the hon. Lady will allow me to get a word in edgeways, I shall make the point that Mugabe and his regime have stolen wantonly from the Zimbabwean people.

I shall give a little vignette. In the past decade, Mugabe has been to 150 countries and his travel costs are $260 million. Those audited costs are for fuel bills alone: they do not take account of Mugabe's charges and expenses. He takes an allowance of $50,000 and an extra $10,000 per trip, which is what the first lady also receives. None of that is audited, although that is where the money is going. Of course, Mugabe takes his entourage with him. Senior Government officials receive $12,500 a day. My hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) described that as a kleptocracy. Mugabe's regime is totally corrupt and raids the wealth of Zimbabwe. As a result, the Zimbabwean people are suffering.

Dr. Tonge: I must take the hon. Gentleman to task yet again. The Conservative Government were in power for 17 years, during which time the Mugabe regime became worse and worse. Indeed, the previous Government even sold that regime Hawk jets. How does he explain that inaction?

Mr. Paterson: I am discussing the damage that Mugabe and his entourage have inflicted on Zimbabwe. It is extraordinary that the hon. Lady is trying to score cheap points against the Conservative party, when we should concentrate on the welfare of people living in that benighted country.

Mugabe's regime is backed by deeply unpleasant repression of the media. News is suppressed, the classic case being that of Mark Charandula, editor of the independent Zimbabwe Standard, who was arrested because he reported an alleged military coup in which 23 members of the Zimbabwean national army were detained for plotting to overthrow President Mugabe's Government. Several high court orders were made calling for Mr. Chavanduka's release, but the authorities failed to comply. The military said that the judge could not direct them and that anyone meddling with military matters would be subject to such matters. Mr. Chavanduka was severely beaten in custody and emerged with signs of torture: he had cigarette burns, electric shocks and had been immersed in drums of water. Dr. Johnson said that one can tell a man by the company he keeps. It is interesting that Mugabe has been harbouring the other communist dictator who brought Ethiopia to its knees, Mengistu Haile Miriam. He is doing so in return for the guns that Mengistu gave him during the civil war.

I turn now to the referendum and the general election that might be held in March. Replying to my intervention about the possible seizure or theft of land, with no compensation, from 4,500 white farmers, the Minister said that it was not a priority. They farm half the country's prime agricultural land. If such burglary is allowed, the impact on those who want to invest in Zimbabwe will be catastrophic. We should not underestimate the devastating impact, not just on the white people who are our flesh and blood relatives but on those who lived there for centuries before. It will have an appalling effect on all sectors of the Zimbabwean population.

What is the Minister doing to support those brave people who have stood up against Mugabe? There is the Movement for Democratic Change led by Morgan Tsvangirai and the Zimbabwe Union of Democrats led by Margaret Dongo. If they link up, they could win 75 seats. What encouragement is the Minister giving them? What messages is he giving the Mugabe regime that their freedom to campaign should not in any way be infringed? It is worth noting that one non-governmental group calculated that a quarter of the people on the electoral roll for the next stage of the general election planned for March were dead, fictitious or had multiple listings.

The Justice Minister, Emmerson Mnangagwa, announced that the election should be postponed until June, but he has been overruled by Robert Mugabe. I strongly endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham said about the fundamental importance of the Commonwealth getting involved in the election to monitor it extremely carefully. The Commonwealth should threaten to expel Zimbabwe if it is not allowed rigorously to check how the election is conducted.

Mugabe is trying to stall two reports on the Matebeleland massacres in the early 1980s, in which about 3,000 people were killed. Again, we come back to double standards. We do not hear great left-wing protests about that. We hear about General Pinochet often enough; he is accused of doing 3,000 people to death in a non-judicial manner, exactly as Mugabe and his cronies have done.

Mrs. Gillan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and for his support for the line that I have taken and for the line of questioning that I hope the Minister will address directly. Does he share my concern that Zimbabwe is rapidly going downhill? That is evidenced by the withdrawal of some of its lines of credit, notably by one of its leading trading partners, the South African Customs Union. Will he comment on reports that Mugabe has secured a loan of millions of dollars from Colonel Gaddafi to alleviate the current fuel shortage and to pay soldiers, who have not been paid since last November? Does he agree that that is a very disturbing development?

Mr. Paterson: It is grotesque that he should receive such help from another equally unpleasant and dangerous source—Gaddafi in Libya. We do not have enough time to go into the details of the war in the Congo. It seems that it is being fought very much for Mugabe's personal gain and at devasting cost to the ordinary citizens of Zimbabwe. I am worried that the Minister is compromised by his past. There are two standards. In the case of Burma, Cuba and Zimbabwe, the Government do not take the strong line on civil rights, abuses of state power and kleptocracy—we heard about this in Zimbabwe—that they do in other areas.

Mr. Hain: I do not know where the hon. Gentleman was on Tuesday afternoon during Foreign Office questions, but if he had been listening he would have heard the clearest ministerial condemnation of what is happening in Zimbabwe. There was certainly nothing like it during the 18 years that his party was in power, when things went seriously wrong in that country and his Government did nothing about it.

Mr. Paterson: I was present at Foreign Office questions, and the Minister failed to answer my supplementary question. This referendum result is a possible breach in the dam if the forces of good push through it.

Mr. Roger Casale (Wimbledon): Given the hon. Gentleman's comments about double standards, is he prepared to condemn the handiwork of General Pinochet?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. If we could have a little discipline and brief interventions, preferably on the subject of the debate, we might proceed.

Mr. Paterson: I will observe your first injunction and be brief, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The remarkable result in the referendum gives the forces of good in Zimbabwe a chance. I thought that the Minister's initial comments about what Britian can do were limp wristed. There must have been a way of stopping the jet parts about which I asked a question. If the Foreign Office had used its lawyers, they would have found a way round that. There must be some way of insisting that the Commmonwealth becomes actively involved in the preparations for the general election and ensures that the two reports on the Matabeleland massacres are published. The Government must find a way of putting pressure on Mugabe to stop him silencing the press in the build-up to the general election, and to give advice to the democratic groups that need to unite and work against Mugabe. I want the Minister to say that he will take a strong line on Zimbabwe. Failing that, I strongly suggest that he find someone else who will.

4.42 pm

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): A significant number of hon. Members must have either lived and/or worked in Africa, and they must realise how much it has to give as well as how much it needs to receive. In the mid 1960s I spent some years teaching in Tanzania and I came back having learnt far more than I taught. I want to use the experience of that country then and since to emphasise the importance of looking at the quality and nature, as well as the quantity, of our aid.

Tanzania is one of the poorest countries in the world. There is a life expectancy of about 48. Illiteracy among men is 18 per cent. and among women it is significantly higher, at 38 per cent. By comparison with many other countries, that is not so high, but it is still significant in a severely indebted, low-income country. As debt is relieved and bilateral aid is given, it goes to programme aid, technical co-operation and humanitarian aid. I am proud that in 1998-99 this country gave £79 million in bilateral aid to Tanzania.

Tanzania has made progress, as an earlier speaker said. Economic, structural and political reforms are under way. However, education and health indicators are getting worse. I have learned that of the programmed aid, first we fund a range of general imports. I question the word "imports". Will the Minister tell us whether we are funding imports into the country, or out of it? It is essential that we understand the importance of Tanzania's exports. What matters is what is coming out. Trade with the rest of the world is vital for that country.

We have heard a great deal about investment in countries. I want to emphasise both the necessity of fair trade with them and the importance of what those countries export, especially Tanzania at the moment. Coffee is my example, and I have brought my example with me. I am delighted that the House of Commons takes part in fair trade and that Cafédirect and its equivalent in tea are used in the House. Would that more business and industry did the same. Yet Tanzania's export earnings fell by 8.1 per cent. during the past year. Low production of coffee, cotton, sisal, tea and tobacco is given as the cause. One realises how dependent it is on climate and the availability of water when one hears the list of exports, and therein lies part of the problem. Rich countries, such as the United States, stockpile coffee, so the price is stable from year to year, whatever amount is produced.

Mrs. Gillan: Does the hon. Lady think that the figures might also have been affected by the European Union ban on imports of fresh fish from east Africa, which was lifted recently? How will the resumption of the trade help Tanzania's economy?

Valerie Davey: I was going to mention the restoration of the trade in 50 tonnes of fresh fish from Lake Victoria. It was stopped nine months ago because of the fishermen's excessive use of chemicals. Who sold them the chemicals? I am sure that the fishermen of Lake Victoria would not normally have used chemicals in the trade. We must examine what we are exporting that is of value, and what we are using.

I can tell the hon. Lady, from many years of experience, that we have sold as part of our aid what we wanted to sell, when we have not been careful. Contracts have often not included parts. I am sure that many of my hon. Friends have seen high-tech agricultural equipment lying by the side of the road because spares were not available. African ingenuity in the use of equipment has been brought to my attention recently. Many of my hon Friends will know of Tools for Self-Reliance. In the past, it has sent Singer sewing machines for good use in parts of Africa, for example. It is now bringing back from Africa renewable parts of used machines for making tools that we need for forestry. That seems an excellent quid pro quo. Tanzania, especially, has the most incredibly self-reliant and able people. However, the provision of education is declining.

I want to praise Tanzania for the number of refugees that it is taking in. The last figure I saw was that it had taken up to 800,000 refugees from eight countries, including 300,000 people from Burundi and many from the Congo. The populaton is 31 million people. Think of the debates in the House about the number of asylum seekers that we might be willing to take in. Tanzania's generosity might be with United Nations financial help, but its support and reception for those refugees leave this country, yet again, with much to learn.

It is important to help with literacy. In the five years to 1996, the assistance that we gave was largely limited to English language support at secondary level. I again endorse the important work of the British Council, but I ask it to think again about its provision. A review has shown no positive impact on poverty from that support. Our aims for educational support—to give a widespread service—have not been achieved by the teaching of English in secondary schools. I am glad to say that we are now working to improve education services nationally, especially at a basic level.

We must revitalise primary education. Indeed, while the wider programme is being developed, we are considering giving interim support in the form of textbooks and school buildings. I want to put a big question mark over that and say how much more imaginative our approach should be.

I support what has been said about the World Service. How many more people might we reach via radio, with the agreement of educators in Tanzania? How much more we might do via e-mail. Before hon. Members say, "Where is the equipment at the other end?" I must emphasise the cost and energy of sending books. I was concerned by the reference to Cambridge university. Why are we setting Cambridge university exams in Africa? We need to support African countries to develop their own education in their own way. That might not be with textbooks in school buildings but through radio and women's groups, which are essential to the further development of African countries. We might need to learn from them.

I know that other hon. Members want to speak, so I shall cut my speech, but I want to emphasise one final point. Coming soon, in Dakar, Senegal, is the United Nations tenth anniversary conference on the importance of primary education throughout the world. I want to ask the Minister what contribution Britain will make? The United Nations has learned a lesson. I could tell the House of many ways in which UNESCO and other organisations have betrayed western countries by not listening and learning, but I shall not pursue that now. I shall simply ask the Minister what contribution we will make to the conference in Dakar—at least the conference is being held in Africa—and what support we will give over the next 10 or 15 years to ensure that the young people of Africa receive the level of education that they deserve, so that those desperately poor countries can develop and take their full role in the world community with dignity.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. Brady. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

4.51 pm

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): I am grateful to my hon. Friends for such vocal support. I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey) who made a sensible contribution that centred on the vital importance of education to improve the situation in Africa. Like myself, the hon. Lady is a member of the Select Committee on Education and Employment, so I know that she takes as great an interest in educational matters in this country as she evidently takes in such matters elsewhere. In speaking about whether it is appropriate for British aid to focus on secondary education and the teaching of English, I should like to ask the hon. Lady what she knows about other national or European Union and aid programmes and how all the programmes dovetail because, clearly, it is important that we do not take unco-ordinated decisions. If other countries are also contributing support for infant and primary education, it may be more sensible for us to concentrate our assistance on more advanced education.

In a somewhat partisan intervention earlier in the debate, which was not necessarily in the spirit of Westminster Hall, the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) called into question the previous Government's record on aid to Zimbabwe. I draw to her attention the fact that even with an increase in aid by the Government this year—the figure now stands at £29 million—that sum is still £6 million less than the total provided in 1994–95.

Dr. Tonge: I was referring not to aid, but to the Conservative Government's inactivity and encouragement of the regime in Zimbabwe.

Mr. Brady: It is very easy to criticise people for what has not been done without giving credit for the good efforts that have been made. It does the hon. Lady no credit to make cheap partisan points and to attack the previous Government's record in one area when so much good work was done elsewhere. [Interruption.] I am happy to give way to the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy) if he wishes to intervene.

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): No.

Mr. Brady: I thought that the hon. Gentleman wanted to intervene. It is important to set the record straight.

We have heard some good contributions. The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) spoke with considerable knowledge of Kenya, which some hon. Members pronounced "Keenya". I have less experience of Kenya and was encouraged to hear what he said about the opposition parties getting established. That was not the case when I was there nearly 10 years ago. It gives great cause for hope.

Much was said about the enormous problem of HIV and AIDS across sub-Saharan Africa. That should be taken seriously and tackled, but we must be cautious that we do not focus all our attention on that one concern. We cannot ignore other problems, especially health problems. Many hon. Members know that in parts of Africa—indeed, across much of the world—there is a resurgence of malaria. It remains an enormous killer, but it is virtually unreported and unnoticed. We must pay that some attention instead of focusing on a subject that catches headlines.

In my intervention, I mentioned the situation in Zimbabwe and I support the calls to take that seriously. The referendum result has opened a window of hope in the past few days. Not many of us expected the people of Zimbabwe to be permitted to express that view in a referendum. Now that the disgraceful proposed constitution has been rejected, we have reached the critical moment when Britain can exert influence and, hopefully, make a difference. We must use whatever methods are at our disposal to achieve that.

I am not saying that we must withdraw all bilateral aid tomorrow—a considerable amount of bilateral aid should continue to be given. The Minister said that we would give more if the regime in Zimbabwe were more acceptable to the British Government. The Government have accepted, then, that aid can be used as a lever. This is the time to make it clear to Mugabe's Government that we are prepared to use the levers that are at our disposal.

We must take a firm and tough line and back the people in Zimbabwe who are bravely making the opposition voice heard. We do not need to pull the rug on valuable programmes, but the aid that is given to Zimbabwe is wider reaching than the hon. Member for Richmond Park would have us believe. She mentioned aid, which I accept might be essential, for birth control and sexual health projects. Nearly £30 million a year—a large sum of money—is provided. Much of that is technical aid, aid and trade, grants and other aids in kind. A relatively small sum goes towards humanitarian assistance.

There are many different headings under which we are assisting the regime in Zimbabwe. The hon. Lady mentioned the £1 million a day, which the people of Zimbabwe can ill afford, spent on pursuing the war in the Congo. The British Government are providing £600,000 a day to Zimbabwe in one way, shape or form. Although that may not be going directly to support the war effort, there is a great danger that it is indirectly funding undesirable activities. The Government must focus on that if we are to achieve an acceptable outcome in Zimbabwe over the next few months and years.

4.59 pm

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): I am delighted to participate in this important debate, especially as I believe that it is the first debate on the subject in Westminster Hall. It comes 10 years after Nelson Mandela's release from prison in South Africa and shortly before Namibia celebrates its tenth year of independence from the control of apartheid in South Africa.

I have listened with great interest to all the comments made, especially those of Labour and Liberal Democrat Members. I thought that at least two out of the three Conservative contributions were at best imbalanced and unfortunate. If the Conservative party had shown a small proportion of the anger and rage that they spend on the Zimbabwe Government—who are, of course, acting reprehensibly—to the apartheid regime in South Africa, perhaps the millions of black South Africans who suffered under that regime would not have had to do so.

Mr. Brady: Would the hon. Gentleman like the present Government to take as tough a line against the appalling regime in Zimbabwe as they are taking against the current regime in Austria?

Mr. Murphy: I shall not be tempted into discussing Austria.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Very wise.

Mr. Murphy: When I am faced with a choice between the performance of the current Foreign Secretary and the previous Conservative Government's attitudes to apartheid in South Africa, there is only one thing that fills me with shame. I refer not to the actions of our current Foreign Secretary, but to the previous Conservative Government's support for the apartheid regime.

There is much to say about the continent of Africa, which has 53 countries, although I do not intend to spend even five seconds on each of them. It has more than 750 million inhabitants from the northern point of Bizerte in Tunisia to Cape Agulhas in South Africa. If one believes the tabloid press, the continent has unlimited problems and no cause for optimism. I do not hold that view, and neither do most hon. Members. Let us remember that the continent's GDP has grown faster than its population. It did so in 1998 for the fourth successive year. Although there are many difficulties and problems, there are also an awful lot of good and positive things.

Africa has grave economic problems and other dire difficulties. The per capita income in Africa is $688 per annum, by contrast with that of the UK, which is more than $20,000 per annum. Even within Africa, there are enormous inequalities within and between the various nations. In the countries to the north of the Sahara, the average annual income is more than $1,200; in sub-Saharan Africa, the average is $526. In the least developed nations in Africa, which account for two thirds of the 53 countries, the average income per day is just 61 cents. We should remember that that level of poverty applies to two thirds of the countries. The five most prosperous nations in Africa have 60 per cent. of the entire continent's GDP, and the country of South Africa contributes more than a quarter of the entire continent's GDP. We must be aware of the differences within the continent and the difficulties experienced by different nations within it.

I mentioned South Africa, for which I have a great affection. Unlike the Minister, I am not a son of South Africa, but I have lived there. For better or worse, it made me what I am today and has made my life as it is today. I met and married my wife there. I do not have time to dwell on my experiences in South Africa, because other hon. Members want to speak. I must say, however, that I find it remarkable that Nelson Mandela, the world's premier leader of the 20th century— or perhaps of any century—could grow in a country that was so scarred by the degree of racist discrimination that was prevalent there for decades. He is a living symbol and a force for change and reconciliation in that nation. It is a matter of historical regret that some people in the Conservative party would have had him treated otherwise.

South Africa has a long way to go. Everyone acknowledges that it has a problem with crime, but I do not enjoy reading the comments made in this and other countries about the stereotypes of Africa and South Africa: that it is a war-ravaged continent, that it is a continent of corruption and that we should have an affinity with the white people of Africa because they are our flesh and blood. I do not share that outlook on life.

A high-profile example is the bid for the world cup. I do not want to trivialise the issue, but England is rightly bidding for the 2006 world cup. I hope that England's bid to hold the tournament is successful—it is a strong bid—but I do not hope that they are successful in winning the cup. I hope that Scotland wins it. Of course, England's bid is strong, but South Africa also has a strong bid, yet some people have used the excuse that South Africa's bid should not be successful because it is part of a war-torn continent. They use the terrible experiences and occurrences in Angola as a reason why South Africa should not be allowed to host the world cup. We all know that Angola is further away from Cape Town than Kosovo is from London, so let us not allow any of those unfortunate stereotypes to be dressed up as logical explanations why South Africa or the African continent should not get a fair share of international events and the international economy.

Mr. Colman: A bid has been produced for the Rio plus 10 conference to be held in South Africa in 2002, rather than at the United Nations in New York. Does my hon. Friend support that bid from South Africa?

Mr. Murphy: Based on what my hon. Friend says, I think that would be an important step forward for South Africa.

I should like to comment on many other matters, such as diamond mining in Namibia and Angola, but I shall conclude my speech by referring to United Kingdom investment. Only 2.6 per cent. of all United Kingdom outward investment goes to Africa, half of which goes to South Africa. Therefore, slightly more than 1 per cent. of all United Kingdom external investment goes to the other 52 countries. We should work with British companies to develop that economic opportunity in future.

Mr. Paterson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Murphy: I am sorry, but time does not allow me to do so.

Business cannot take that opportunity simply by giving philanthropic support to develop the continent. That would be desirable, but naive. We must develop opportunities for business to prosper. We should bring down barriers and open opportunities in those nations, and the Department for International Development White Paper on globalisation, which will be published later this year, represents an important step forward for the United Kingdom in doing so.

Through debt relief and economic development, we must help to create populations in those countries that are educated, live in peace and are highly motivated, so that there is a skilled work force. We must ensure that British companies understand the opportunity of investing in that continent. I strongly urge that we continue with our crusade on international debt relief which, although it has to be conditional, is not just a moral imperative but an economic necessity.

5.10 pm

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): I want to cover very briefly one country-specific issue—the referendum in the western Sahara— and two general issues: the arms trade and debt cancellation. I congratulate the Minister on calling for this debate and recognise that he has a huge responsibility on his shoulders because of the impact that his interventions can have on people's lives. The people of the western Sahara have been waiting for years for a referendum on the right to self-determination. I note that 116 hon. Members signed an early-day motion expressing their concern that the referendum might face further delays because of the questionable 70,000 or more appeals from Morocco. The new millennium should mark a new start for the Saharawi people. The Minister's interventions could have a real impact, so I hope that he will tell us what actions he, together with the United Nations, can take to ensure that parties in the conflict strictly abide by the terms of the signed appeals agreements.

Other hon. Members have spoken of the human damage caused in Africa by the arms trade. The Government have done more than any other to try to combat the real problems that it causes. They have said that arms will not be supplied where they are likely to be used for external aggression or internal repression; and that code of conduct will be strictly enforced. However, we are big producers and exporters of arms and are likely to find the arms industry snuggling up to Members of Parliament and Ministers, asking them to support particular defence contracts. That can and probably will fuel this wicked trade. I remind hon. Members that so often it is the poorest people in Africa and other countries that suffer most from it. Of course countries have a right to defend themselves, but the availability of weapons in Africa is doing so much damage that we need to tackle the problem head on. We should use our talented engineers and workers for a positive agenda in Africa, not for a destructive one.

Debt relief is another important issue, on which the Labour Government have a fantastic record. Two years ago, many people would not have believed that we could come so far. The Government have offered 100 per cent. debt cancellation to countries that are committed to tackling poverty. The problem is, however, far from solved. Only three countries—two in Africa—have had their debts cancelled under the Cologne initiative. One is Mauritania, which received help through the heavily indebted poor countries initiative, but will still have to spend more on its annual debt service repayments than on health or education.

In Mauritania, 62 per cent of adults cannot read. What does that say about people who have to live in this increasingly globalised and technology-driven world? One in three children receive no education, yet the country has to make $80 million repayments every year, even after HIPC, which could more than double the health and education budgets. There is still such a long way to go.

Mozambique is one of the poorest countries on many indicators. It received help under HIPC I, having met all the IMF's strict requisite conditions. Yet the country will not benefit from HIPC II until June this year at the earliest. That may seem soon, but every day that passes destroys opportunities and takes away lives. One reason for the delay is the need for these countries to produce poverty reduction strategies before they may be helped. The lack of such a strategy causes the delay. We must pile in help so the country can devise its strategy and overcome the obstacle as soon as possible.

Even when June 2000 arrives, this poor country will still have to spend $62 million—more than it currently spends on health—on debt repayment. That is in a country where three quarters of the population have no access to safe water or sanitation. Those are countries that are in the HIPC initiative. There are others which, although very poor, are outside HIPC.

Nigeria was dropped last year for technical reasons. It is Britain's biggest debtor amongst the poorest countries, but it is not expected to benefit from the Chancellor's 100 per cent. promise. It is a new democracy with a new Government who are struggling to establish economic and social stability. They are under an impossible burden of debt. Creditor countries, including the UK, lent freely to previous military regimes, and we must share responsibility for freeing Nigeria from that debt crisis, which is constraining development.

I urge the Government to take still further action on debt relief. I congratulate them on everything that they have done, but we need to put more pressure on G8 countries to take forward the agenda for faster, deeper debt relief. We must urge the other G8 members who have not made the 100 per cent. commitment on bilateral debts to do so. Italy, Germany, Japan and France must follow the lead that this country has taken. We can be rightly proud of it. We must also urge the United States—the richest country in the world—to put money into an HIPC trust fund to cover some of the multilateral relief costs. There has been a proposal to Congress this week about that. We must ensure that that money is delivered.

Some of the subject matter of the debate can sound dry and technical, but it has inspired children and adults alike in this nation. We hardly remember the pain of hunger, but we sometimes have pangs after just a few hours of not eating. People in Africa go through that pain day after day. Perhaps all of us know someone with HIV or, worse, someone who has died of AIDS; perhaps we know someone who has lost an arm or even their life because of the arms trade. We know the pain that that causes when it happens to one person, but in Africa that pain is writ large in millions and millions of lives. The Government are doing a lot, but we cannot rest. There is so much to do before we can deliver opportunities for people in Africa.

5.16 pm

Mr. Hain: I am delighted to respond to the debate, which has been an outstanding example of how Westminster Hall can be used. I was especially delighted to discover another son of Africa in the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien). Speaking of sons, I welcome back to the House my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown), who has just returned after having a son. It is good to see her here and to hear the authoratative way in which she spoke about debt relief and Africa's problems.

I commend other hon. Members for the authoritative way in which they spoke. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) showed his deep knowledge of Kenya, while, in recounting her experience in Zambia, my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) was, if I may say so, a good advertisement for CPA visits. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey) obviously knows a lot about Tanzania; the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) showed her deep knowledge of Uganda and Sudan and my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy) showed his knowledge of South Africa.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) was at yesterday's business lunch on African issues, along with the hon. Member for Richmond Park, and her point about opportunities for business in Africa was well made. I was talking to a senior executive of Unilever, who said that his company gets its best returns in Africa. That should be a green light for invesment there by British-based companies.

The hon. Lady spent time attacking the Zimbabwean Government, as did her colleagues the hon. Members for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) and for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady). I share their criticisms of the policies that are being pursued by the Zimbabwean Government. Indeed, as my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) kindly reminded hon. Members, I spelt them out in yesterday's Financial Times. The hon. Lady might like to know, however, that President Mugabe plaintively refers to the nostalgic delights of doing business with Conservative Members, particularly the former Prime Minister, Lady Thatcher, whom he described as a great friend. He finds it difficult to deal with this Labour Government because we are critical of human rights abuses, bad governance and Zimbabwe's dreadful economic policy. So there is a large dose of rewriting history.

Mr. Paterson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hain: No, I do not have time.

In conjunction with international financial institutions, the Government are tackling—or at least, seeking to tackle—Zimbabwe's many deep problems.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hain: No, I am sorry, but I do not have time.

In relation to electoral education, we provided a £20,000 grant which was used to fund what became the civil society opposition in the referendum campaign. Indeed, that was attacked by President Mugabe.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham asked about aid levels. British aid to Zimbabwe is currently £10 million, which is a small amount, much less, indeed, than we would be prepared to give if the Government and their economic policies changed. That £10 million is overwhelmingly concentrated on policies to eliminate poverty, and almost entirely dispersed through non-governmental organisations, although there are some joint Government projects. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development assured the House that, to her knowledge, there was no evidence of British aid funds to Zimbabwe being used inappropriately.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hain: No, I do not have time.

The hon. Lady asked for an explanation of my statement about Jonas Savimbi being taken out of the Angolan conflict. I said that if Mr. Savimbi decided to retire to one of his many homes elsewhere in Africa, that would greatly aid the end of the conflict and the peace process—if there were to be one. He is a wealthy individual and his safe passage could be guaranteed under UN arrangements.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hain: No, I do not have time.

Mrs. Gillan: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. We are supposed to be engaged in debate. Would you therefore advise me whether, in this Chamber, it is right for the Government spokesman to avoid taking questions about points that are directly relevant to the Opposition parties? Do you agree, Madam Deputy Speaker, that Westminster Hall was set up to enable us to debate? However, the Government obviously want not a debate but a showcase.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair's life is complicated. However, I am not responsible for what Ministers do.

Mr. Hain: I am spending the first few minutes of my speech answering the hon. Lady's questions. I generously accepted many of her hon. Friends' interventions during my introductory remarks. I simply do not have time to accept interventions now, as I am trying to answer questions.

The hon. Lady asked about the work of the British Council. I endorse her comments as I strongly support the council's work. I also endorse the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting, who asked about education, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West. The position in Africa is devastating. There are more children out of school in sub-Saharan Africa than there were a decade ago. In five years' time, 50 million children will be out of school; by 2015, the number will have reached 57 million, three quarters of the world total.

Reversing the decline in school enrolment is probably the single most important investment that foreign nations, including Britain, can make in Africa. The Labour Government's aid and assistance programme has therefore been targeted to a great degree on funding education provision throughout Africa. My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) made that point. Having worked on aid and development over the years, he speaks with great authority on Africa. I acknowledge and pay tribute to that.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park asked several important questions about arms dealing, and made valid points about brokering and trafficking. We are committed to new legislation seeking to put that under some kind of control, however difficult that is to do in practice.

The hon. Lady spoke knowledgeably about the problem of AIDS, drawing on her experience of visiting Uganda. Uganda is a good example of how we can begin to turn the situation around if a Government leads and works with donor countries such as Britain. The hon. Lady mentioned landing at Entebbe airport. I am not sure whether she visited the centre which is tackling the AIDS epidemic and which Britain helps to fund—I visited the centre when I went to Uganda in October.

My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands talked extremely movingly about the problem of AIDS in Zambia, where the effect is devastating. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting for his generous tribute to the excellent high commissioner in Kenya, Geoffrey James, who does a very good job for us and for the people in Kenya. I agree that it is vital that we see the success of the economic and good governance recovery programme that is led by President Moi, with able assistance from newly appointed civil servants, including Richard Leakey. Kenya has been sliding down for some years and there is now an opportunity to turn it around. President Moi's commitment to the programme should have Britain's support, and we are giving it.

While I acknowledge the African origins of the hon. Member for Eddisbury, I did not think that he did himself any credit by almost obsessively attacking my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. My right hon. Friend has paid a number of important and successful visits to Africa, including, importantly, a joint visit with the French Foreign Minister, Hugo Vedrine, to try to forge an alliance on African policy. He has also visited Nigeria, South Africa and Ghana. Those visits were extremely successful in cementing the relationship between Britain and Africa.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that in the current climate of this Government's policy towards Africa, our standing there is very high. I cannot claim that it is at the highest level. The evidence is the persistent response that I get from African Ministers and others when I speak at the United Nations and visit the people of African countries who believe that the British Labour Government genuinely speak in support of Africa. That was echoed at the business lunch yesterday when one person after another said that they thought that our policies were a great advertisement for Africa, which assisted in the success of that continent.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury said that we must deliver on peacekeeping when we promise it. That is a legitimate comment. We are doing that by contributing to the peacekeeping operations in Sierra Leone and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. We cannot put troops in, but we have put in military observers. We are contributing more support to Sierra Leone to end its brutal conflict and estabish peace there than any other country outside Africa.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands for the way that she targeted sanctions busters in respect of Zambia. I am sure that, as she rightly said, President Chiluba will want to tackle that problem, given the lead that he showed in tackling the conflict in the Congo. Many other Governments need to show the same determination to crack sanctions busting in their own countries and to bear down on supplies going to UNITA to sustain their murderous war. The Governments of Rwanda, Cote d'Ivoire, Togo and Burkina Faso, to name just some, ought to show leadership because people in those Administrations are operating within the countries to supply UNITA with fuel, arms and other logistical equipment without which the war could not be waged.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood was right to speak of the stereotypical image of Africa simply as a continent ravaged by famine, conflict, AIDS and corruption, as if nothing good is happening there. There are lots of success stories in Africa, and my hon. Friend said that South Africa was the prime example. We need to build on those because they give tremendous opportunities for Britain and British business to build a close relationship and partnership with Africa.

Finally, in respect of western Sahara, may I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon, South that we are indeed urging all the parties to abide by the United Nations peacekeeping agreement, which includes a commitment to a referendum. I believe that more creativity is needed to tackle the problem. Legitimate grievances are held by the people of western Sahara. The recent dismissal of the Interior Minister, Mr. Basri, by the King of Morocco is a very encouraging sign because there were serious human rights abuses there.

Rural Poverty

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

2.30 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I welcome the opportunity to open this important debate about rural poverty—a subject that the House does not discuss sufficiently often.

It is a debate about perception. There is a fundamental dissonance between the perception of life in rural areas, which so many commentators and those who look on it from a distance seem to share—the cliché is the picture on the chocolate box that shows roses around the door—and the incidence of poverty that many hon. Members know to be the reality of life in many villages. There is also a dissonance between the prosperity that is claimed for many rural regions—regions with a high preponderance of rural areas whose prosperity is on the surface—and the poverty that underlies it. It is that mismatch between perception and reality that I want to address.

Today's debate was prompted by the fact that that perception might be shared by senior members of the Government—including the Prime Minister, judging by the comments that he made when he recently toured the west country. I realise that his remarks may have been taken out of context, and that that may not be his position; but if it is, I believe that it is our duty as Members of Parliament to make sure that the reality is made known.

I do not want to discuss whether we are dealing with absolute poverty or relative poverty. To a large extent, it is an artificial distinction. No one in this country shares the absolute poverty of many in the third world. However, people's lives are made immeasurably more difficult by a lack of disposable income in a society that assumes a reasonable affluence.

I am sure that the invisibility of the poor in rural areas is recognised by those hon. Members who are here today. Those who represent rural constituencies have it brought home to them at their surgeries that many people lead desperate lives.

Poverty is exemplified by the way that people have to live their lives and in the day-to-day difficulties they face. It is exemplified by difficulties of access—access to the sort of services that people in urban areas take for granted and sometimes even to those services that are specifically designed to make their lives easier. It is exemplified by the cost of living, which is often higher in rural areas. It is often more expensive because people do not have access to public transport and therefore have to use their cars, and because people often have to use smaller shops instead of supermarkets. Because those shops cannot share in the economies of scale offered by supermarkets the unit costs are inevitably higher.

People suffer from the fact that services cannot react to their position, and they also suffer from isolation. The latter is an important aspect of the problem. Someone who is relatively poor but who lives in a centre of relative affluence is isolated in a way that the poor who live among their peers are not. The one family in a small village who do not have a regular income or a reasonable pension will have a pretty miserable life, as will people who live on their own and who cannot share many of the things that other people take for granted.

This is a genuine cross-Government theme, and any of five or six Ministers could have responded to the debate. I welcome the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for City of York (Mr. Bayley). In the previous such debate, which was instigated by the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ), a Minister from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions represented the Government. They could just as easily have been represented by a Minister from the Cabinet Office, the Department of Health or a number of other Departments. Joined-up government—the phrase that we hear so often—must apply if it is to be addressed effectively.

I see no point in trading statistics with the Minister. We could spend the rest of the afternoon discussing numbers without getting to grips with the problem. How many people are living in poverty? Let us be honest—we do not know. In a document published two weeks ago, the New Policy Institute made the very conservative estimate of one in 10. That is a generous view of the number of people who are living below the poverty line, and it is probably an understatement. We know that people in rural areas are under-claiming and that the number of dependents upon people who are claiming is probably greater than is stated. We know that many people are not claimants because they exist on low pay or on seasonal employment that provides money for only part of the year. We know also that there is much migration from rural to urban areas and that people categorised as resident in urban areas of poverty are often from country areas but could not exist any longer with the privations that they suffered there.

Some indicators are simply unhelpful. For example, the incidence of car ownership could be used as an indicator of relative deprivation, but people in rural areas must have cars. I have quoted the following statistic before: people in Somerset have a high number of cars, but they are the oldest in the country. People keep their bangers together in one way or another because without them they simply cannot operate in modern society.

There is statistical evidence on poverty levels. Let us consider gross domestic product per head. It is not Merseyside, South Yorkshire, Tyneside or other such areas that have the lowest GDP per head, but places such as those represented here by my hon. Friends the Members for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) and for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand). However, even if statistics are as accurate as possible, they do not inform policy as they should. That is so partly because of aggregation and because policy formulation does not have a fine enough grain. That means that the south-west is considered to be relatively prosperous without taking into account that what makes it prosperous is the M4 corridor and Plymouth. Apart from that, the area is one of relative poverty.

[Mr. David Heath]

Unhelpful definitions mean that the traditional small market town falls through the gap between the rural area that might benefit from rural development area status and the urban area that benefits from urban support. Somehow, the market town does not exist between those categories, and yet it is to such towns that people in rural areas look for the provision of the services that they need. The Liberal Democrats have argued many times that mortality and sparsity factors do not inform the formulae that allow for distribution of funds, whether for education, policing or elsewhere. Whichever service one considers, the unit costs are often higher in rural areas, yet that is not recognised in the formulae.

How are we to identify those who are most affected by what I have described? To paraphrase a famous passage, I would tell people, if they live in a rural area, "Do not be old and poor, do not be young and poor, do not be a family with young children and poor and do not have a long-term illness or disability and be poor." Such people will suffer more than someone in the same condition in an urban area. If I had to pick one category of people who particularly concerned me it would be the older ones, perhaps with low occupational pensions, who do not qualify for many of the social security benefits that would otherwise kick in. They would probably have to keep a car running, as the only way of getting to the shops, and would probably suffer from extreme isolation in the village, trying to keep up appearances, which is desperately difficult.

The people that I am concerned about would probably live in detached houses, which, in a rural area, is not a sign of affluence—just of the way we build our houses. Many hon. Members who represent such areas will be familiar with what may be found behind the front door. Sometimes, if we make a house call on, say, an elderly lady, we might see that the roof is falling in, that no maintenance has been carried out and that the occupant cannot heat the place. It is perhaps in a damp area—in the sort of fenland that we have in Somerset. We know that that person is living a pretty squalid life, finding life extremely difficult, and is probably not claiming. A stigma still attaches to claiming benefits, possibly because of ignorance of entitlements, and because there is no one to give guidance and support in claiming.

What difficulties need to be tackled by Government? The most important in many ways, is access, including physical access. We talk a great deal about the public transport needs of rural areas, but they are extreme. My village has one bus a week. Anyone without transport can catch that bus, spend a week in Frome and come back again, but anyone who wants to use it for any other purpose is lost. Over a long period the services available in villages have been reduced. Shops and banks are no longer there. I could divert my argument here on to the future of the sub-post office, but I shall not do so because we have aleady debated that and the Minister knows perfectly well of hon. Members' concerns about that. The post office is a crucial element in the provision of support to people on low incomes in rural areas. It is the one thing to which they have access in a village. Losing that means losing a crucial connection between society in the wider sense and the individual.

Other problems of access relate more to the workings of the system. I have already mentioned the inequalities of funding. It cannot be right, as I pointed out to Education Ministers the other day, that schools in Somerset receive £1,500 a child a year less than equivalent schools in a leafy London suburb. Although we do relatively well with the money provided, the people who are disadvantaged by the discrepancy are those who need the most help. Because the local education authority, and the children affected, are not entitled to a basic level of funding, there are inequalities in what schools can provide. That may not affect the bulk of people, who are relatively well off and relatively high academic achievers, but there are those who miss out in the process.

What I have described also applies in the health service. If there were the same distances between accident and emergency services in the conurbations as there are in the west country, people in the conurbations would be up in arms, because it can be 25 or 30 miles to the nearest hospital. That makes it very difficult for people who do not have access to transport to go to hospital, even for a regular out-patient appointment. In Somerset, the hospital car service has recently been withdrawn, so unless a person is an acute case, no transport will be available. What do you do? There is no answer to that question at present. It is also more difficult to get a general practitioner to visit.

Then there are economic problems. We could discuss the present crisis in agriculture, but we have had many opportunities to debate that, so let us just recognise that there is a significant crisis in agriculture. Agriculture is not the be-all and end-all of rural life; not everyone is employed in agriculture. However, it worried me that the Prime Minister's response to the National Farmers Union the other day did not seem to recognise that a crisis in agriculture is not confined to agriculture; it filters down through the entire rural economy. Many industries, trades and professions depend on agriculture and the people who work in them are currently finding life extremely difficult. For example, agriculture engineers and book-keepers who maintain farm accounts are going out of business and a whole range of people in downstream industries are experiencing financial difficulties. I recognise that the Government have helped the rural economy by introducing the minimum wage, which is a bonus, but can the Minister tell us what the Government's position on the Agricultural Wages Board is likely to be, as it would be interesting to know whether it will be maintained or abolished? If it is abolished, my concern is that the minimum wage will become the standard wage for many people in agricultural industries.

We need to encourage diversification in order to provide new business opportunities in rural areas and to move away from seasonal employment. It is no help to an unskilled manual worker to be moved from shovelling muck to hoovering a chalet, if it means that he continues to receive dirt wages, unable to feed his family and in employment that may be terminated at any stage.

It is important that we revivify the economies of market towns. Anyone who travels across the country will see that regional centres with big shopping centres are prospering, but the story in smaller market towns is boarded up windows and a complete lack of economic activity. The Government must tackle that problem urgently. What are the barriers to employment? There are many arguments about that. There tends to be less long-term youth unemployment in rural areas, and much policy is aimed at long-term youth unemployment. Young people move into towns because they eventually realise that no jobs will appear, and that they cannot travel to them if they do, because they have no means of transport. Also, they have no access to training because there is no local higher or further education college, so their opportunities are restricted.

Then there is social support. Affordable housing is a recurrent theme. Many young people are sent into internal exile because they cannot find affordable housing. That is because the housing is bought by people on higher incomes who come to rural areas from elsewhere, and the whole housing market is artificially inflated as a result. Many old people who are trying to keep a roof over their heads do not have the support to enable them to do that successfully. I would like the Government to be much more active in their support for care-and-repair schemes, which are probably the way forward. We should use the voluntary sector and the funds that are available to maintain people in their own homes. The Government should also encourage the take-up of benefits in rural areas in a more proactive way. That is directly within the Minister's area of responsibility.

I discussed with the Minister some months ago the number of appeals against refusal of disability living allowance. I learnt that nearly 50 per cent. of appeals were upheld, which means that something is wrong with the system. That is causing a great deal of misery to disabled people in rural areas, who feel very isolated when their support is removed.

We must do something about long-term care, which is a great concern for many people. A relatively young man, in his forties, came to see me recently. His mother is in long-term care, and he is trying to run a pitifully small farm of 40 acres, which is barely viable. His problem was that his father had left the farm jointly to him and his mother. When his mother went into long-term care, the farm was considered to be a usable asset. The man's livelihood was being eroded because of his mother's care costs. I am sure that that is not how the rules were intended to work.

We have discussed socialisation and lack of community support. Many people retire to villages because they are taken by the idea of village life, only to find that they do not fit in because they have no connections and no family there. They are on low incomes, and the support that they took for granted in London or Birmingham is simply not available. Young people have no access to leisure facilities, so they hang around the bus stop, get bored and get into trouble, because that is all that they can afford to do.

What can the Government do? I do not pretend that there are any easy solutions; the Minister will be the first to recognise that. We do not want our countryside to be suburbanised or the differences between urban and rural areas to go unrecognised. We need to consider how the indicators are framed, to ensure that we recognise the problems in rural areas. Then we must adapt policies to fit the needs. That means a shift from policies to assist the efficient operation of the system to those that deal with individual objectives. It is a shift of position from centralisation to diversification in policy, so that individual needs are properly assessed.

It is crucial to extend outreach in terms of benefit take-up, but it is not easy to decide how to do that. We cannot have a Benefits Agency office in every village, but we must reach those people who cannot be reached by any other means. There should be a policy premium on accessibility, and every Government policy should be assessed on whether it improves accessibility for people in rural areas.

We also need a rural White Paper to deal with the issues. The White Paper has been delayed repeatedly, but I hope that it will be published soon and that it will encompass many of the points made today. It will be crucial to the Government's success in tackling issues in rural areas. Public perception is that the Government do not take those issues seriously, and they will have to work hard to overcome that and to understand the reality of life in rural areas.

I do not want to paint too black a picture of rural areas. They are still good places to live. I have lived in East India Dock road and Witham Friary, and I know which I prefer. However, let us not forget that some people do not share in the prosperity, or, because they have no private transport, the easy availability of services. Life for them is becoming not easier but more difficult every year, as those services are withdrawn. All service providers, commercial and non-commercial, appear to be retreating from rural areas. My plea is that the Government should reverse that process, make things available in rural areas to the people who need them and ensure that their needs are recognised every bit as much as those of people in our large towns and conurbations.

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree): I am pleased to be called in the debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) on bringing the issue before the Chamber. There was a debate some two years ago, initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ), in which many of the same questions were considered.

We have an almost cartoon-like picture of poverty. We are brought up with the urban paintings of Hogarth, with the reports in William Booth's "In Darkest England"—if we are learned enough—and with the novels of Charles Dickens, all of which create the impression that poverty is an urban phenomenon. The opposite of that is the golden-glow picture that people who live in towns have of the countryside—if it is not all "Cider with Rosie", there is at least pleasure, sunlight, health and vigour, and plenty. They think, "Countryside good, town bad."

Of course, the reality is far from that. People may want to commute from the country, holiday there, or spend weekends there: it is not quite the same for people born into modest circumstances in the country who do not have the resources to cope with changed times. The countryside has never been the idyll that many think. Most people lived in tied cottages, many of them would have been hired at annual fairs or markets, and their tenure of their cottage or home would last only as long as their employment, which might not have been for very long. If they lost their job and their home, there was no benefit system upon which they could fall back—they were destitute, save for the union workhouse.

We should say that things have moved on a long way. In particular, from the 1940s onwards, rural Britain enjoyed a renaissance. There was support for agricultural prices, regulation of agricultural wages, a national health service and a welfare state and the expansion of council housing in rural areas, all of which added greatly to the quality of life for people who lived in the country. Unfortunately, new threats have now appeared. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome had to deal with them in a panoramic sweep, because there is insufficient time to dwell on each of them.

Employment levels in the country have fallen drastically since 1945, when almost one million people were employed in agriculture. Two or three years ago, the figure stood at 250,000, and it is still falling fast. The real figure is certain to go lower still. It is a common feature that agriculture's ancillary industries—for example, sugar beet factories, such as that which closed recently in your constituency, Mr. Deputy Speaker, which is adjacent to mine—are no longer present in the same way. As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome mentioned, the agricultural engineers will not be there to service the farms if the farms are not there on the scale that they once were.

That is not the whole picture. The countryside is also losing many facilities, because of the changing nature of the population. The village shop and the village post office—we have debated the issues twice, once in the main Chamber and once here—are under threat and have been for some time. It is not only a question of the proposals the Benefits Agency might make with regard to payments, although it has not been entirely helpful in some respects. The main question relates to the population now living in villages. Many people commute to work in a large town and some of them may be in the village only at weekends. Such people do not shop in the village shop, but in major supermarkets, sometimes in the nearest market town, but more often in the nearest major town or city, where they work. That takes away a margin of trade from village shops and post offices with the result that they cannot compete and have to close. The same argument applies to public houses, schools and social organisations. People no longer keep villages alive by spending all their active life in them and they may become places in which people occasionally sleep or stay.

It is easy to paint a black picture. I could paint an even blacker one, but we must consider the way forward. Progress must be based on realistic employment in rural areas. We must ensure that we do not create a benefit culture by adapting a working society to the 21st century. Farms should diversify as appropriate and new businesses and industries—which may be attached to farms—should serve appropriate callings and needs.

I emphasise the importance of such action being appropriate to circumstances. Putting many unusual businesses into the middle of the countryside changes the area into one more suburb. However, in certain circumstances, there may be a case for relaxation of planning controls and conditions. Government and local authorities, however, should certainly encourage new industries into such areas.

Local authorities should tackle matters that they have recently been unable to deal with, including housing. We all talk about affordable housing, but that is difficult to achieve in country areas. Country people do not live in terribly picturesque cottages. In the main, they live in ex-council houses: many council houses have now been sold. If one wants to hear the local Essex accent, one should go to the council houses in which most local people now live. Farm workers' cottages have been knocked together so that two or three become a single dwelling which, almost certainly, only someone from outside can afford. The Government, local authorities and housing associations must devise effective schemes to provide houses for rent or sale at prices that can be contained at a certain level so that local people can remain in the villages in which they were born.

I am aware that other hon. Members wish to speak, so I shall conclude by touching on the provision of facilities. The Government have taken steps to encourage that by tackling rural transport and expressing a desire to integrate buses and trains. There is nothing more absurd than a train arriving 10 minutes after the last bus has gone: that breaks down the whole network essential to a rural area. We should extend taxation relief and business rate relief to shops and post offices so that it is worth their while remaining in rural areas. They should not have to shoulder yet another burden which may force them to close down and go elsewhere.

We must accept that the motor car is essential to rural life. Those who do not have cars are stuck in villages that they cannot leave. The Government have made progress by ending the fuel escalator, which bore down especially hard on rural communities. The ending of the scheme is welcomed in places in which the car is a necessity. Other schemes that recognise how essential a car is to people in rural areas may be of benefit. For example, we could encourage dial-a-ride schemes, community bus schemes and any scheme that facilitates travel between villages and between villages and towns.

We are analysing and understanding those interrelated problems. We must create employment in villages, so that people living in them are on the same level as those living in towns. We must ensure that services are appropriate for the community. There are encouraging signs. We have identified the problem and I hope that we shall have a constructive debate today on how we might move forward.

3.5 pm

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): We are indebted to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) for initiating the debate which has developed, not as some outside thought, on a farming basis, but rather on the basis of rural poverty. As it happens, I live on and own a farm. That is no secret to hon. Members who know me. A major debate on the Floor of the House on the farming industry and the rural poverty that has arisen in the past few years is long overdue.

I am well aware of all the issues that have been raised so far. The facts of rural poverty are well known to me. The local government ward in which I live has a high level of deprivation, even by Northern Ireland standards. I have always wondered just how those tables are drawn up. As the hon. Member for Somerset and Frome pointed out, people with cars are considered better off than those without. The fact that it is an old banger is not taken into account. Another factor is whether one's house is tied to a main sewer or septic tank. Those connected to a main sewer are considered to be better off than those with septic tanks. But the interior of the house has nothing to do with the sewerage. Someone needs to go back to basics and look at what constitutes deprivation and poverty in that sense. I am not happy with the measurements that are used.

We have already touched on the fact that many people in rural areas work outside agriculture. They are divorced from agriculture, which is the basic industry in rural areas, and divorced from the rural community in which they live at weekends but of which they are not in any real terms a part. I shall consider briefly the new poverty, which is apparent in rural areas and relates entirely to the crisis in farming. When I asked:

"How many claims for working families tax credit come from farming families? Would not that number of claims be reduced if the Chancellor and his right hon. Friends drew down the compensatory funds that are available for farming from Europe, owing to the changes in the value of the pound?"

the Chancellor replied:

"I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this issue. I know that substantial numbers of claims have come in the past and still come from farming families. Self-employed people are also eligible for the working families tax credit and there has been a distinct increase in the number of applicants."—[Official Report, 3 February 2000; Vol. 343, c. 1195.]

That answer points directly to the consequences of the present crisis in farming. It also shows that that level of poverty, which forces people to apply for working families tax credit, as it did its predecessors in social security benefit, is not a new phenomenon. There has always been far more poverty out there in the countryside than is generally realised. I am well aware of it. I am also well aware that many of those people in the countryside—the older generation especially have a great pride and will do almost anything before they are prepared to admit that they cannot live at a reasonable standard. They refuse, point blank sometimes, to apply for the benefits to which they are entitled. The consequence is that they live frugally. We should have great sympathy for them.

With regard to farm incomes, it might be interesting to consider the situation in Northern Ireland with which I am most familiar. From 1995 to 1999 there was a fall of 79 per cent. in farm incomes. In the same period hill farming income fell by 95 per cent. If that does not constitute new poverty, I do not know what does and yet 10 per cent. of our work force in Northern Ireland still depend on agriculture and the agri-industry and ancillary industries.

That situation did not arise overnight. To some extent it was a consequence of BSE. The strength of sterling in the past few years has had a major effect. The power of the purchaser from the primary producer in the market place has increased enormously in recent years as a result of such changes as the abolition of the Milk Marketing Board, which, it must be remembered, was created to give support and strength to the primary producer. The board was much criticised in its time but it put a welcome bottom on farm prices upon which huge chunks of the farming industry were built. I was one of those who expressed deep concern about the consequences of sweeping it away and I am sorry to say that they have come to pass. All the power in the marketplace has shifted from the primary producer to the purchaser. The real problem with farming has always been that farmers buy retail and sell at low wholesale prices so they are in a weak position unless there is a food shortage, and then we know what happens.

There has also been a constant increase in the standards demanded for the production of animals—pigs, sheep, poultry, cows and so on. The costs of the various sprays, medical treatment, feed and other things have increased. Also, urban dwellers and the Government forget that, because of our position on the globe, we suffer certain constraints of climate and soil that more favoured regions of the world do not have to contend with. I remember being in Minnesota some years ago on what was, by our standards, a very large farm. The farm was in a black soil area but the amount of fertiliser used was at least equal to that used in this country. I was astonished to find that the crops that that farmer grew could not be grown here, but he was doing well from them. We live in a wet and windy climate which means that there are certain basic constraints on production and on what can be produced at reasonable cost. Governments sometimes forget that. Hitherto in this farming crisis, the Government's action has not been effective because the fall in farm prices continues and the problems of farming are not getting any better.

I have not been my party's spokesman on agriculture for some time but it seems to me that the only way in which farming—only some sectors of it—could be helped in the near future would be by drawing down the agrimoney compensatory sums, which this year could amount to more than £300 million. The Treasury will argue, as it always does, that that will cost it money, but it is costing someone else money in social security payments, which quickly add up. In those circumstances, the Government should act.

Of course, that will not help the poultry and pig problems. In November 1998, I visited a farm in Northern Ireland that had a fairly large pig production unit. Anyone who talked to the group across the road last week would have had a clear picture of the problems of the pig industry in Great Britain. The farmer in Northern Ireland had more than 200 sows. He had carried on until the beginning of the year making a loss of £30 per pig produced. His losses were enormous. The farm was floating only on a large milk herd which he also owned and on the profits accumulated over many years. It has all gone. It decreased steadily until his last sow pigged three weeks ago. It was not just that the productive capacity of a herd of 200 or more sows had gone; 14 full and part-time jobs went too, which does not help the rural economy. There was simply no other work for them to do, so they are all on unemployment benefit—an aspect too often forgotten.

The age profile of farmers and the farming community is important. It is far too high with far too many grey heads and not enough young men and women going into it. I had a farm for many years before I entered the House of Commons and I have always been aware of the difficulties faced by the farming industry. It has always been bedevilled by a lack of clarity in Government intentions. Had farming communities known sooner that the Government were not going to take realistic steps to help them through the present crisis, we would not be in the current mess because folk would have taken evasive action much sooner. As it is, many people face ruin.

It is possible to attempt to diverisfy, but there are limits to it. Not every farm can be turned into a golf course; not every farmet's son can start welding gates; not every farmer can start bed and breakfast—they may not live in a tourist area. Farms exist to produce food for human beings. My concern is that the Government are treating farming in the same way as any other industry. We could get by without home-produced coal—and we are aware of the enormous difficulties, pain and misery suffered by mining communities—because electricity can be produced through gas or other means: there are alternatives, but no one has yet found an alternative to food.

We need to grow food and we will be extremely foolish if we allow the farming industry to deteriorate because of the paucity of men and women entering it. In a moment of crisis, we could find ourselves without the capacity to increase food production or to maintain a safe reserve for our people. That is what makes the farming industry different from all others. It needs to be supported by whatever means. We simply cannot continue raising our own standards of production, but buying food from the ends of the earth knowing that it was produced at lower cost than anyone here could match under systems that would be regarded as unacceptable in this country.

Our debate is so important, and if I have trodden too deeply into the farming community, it is because I believe that improving the farming industry is basic to combating and eradicating poverty in the rural communities of this nation.

3.17 pm

Mr. Tom Levitt (High Peak): I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate. My constituency of High Peak in many ways mirrors the wider English community in its social, urban-rural and industrial mix. In one respect—its levels of income—it does not reflect the whole of England. It is partly because we are in a rural area and partly because not just farming, but catering and tourism—traditionally low income industries—dominate the local economy.

I have lived all my life in rural areas or market towns. Before High Peak, I lived in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) earlier referred to areas that have a chocolate box appearance, but hide real problems of social deprivation and poverty—and High Peak is a classic example of such an area.

The community of Yorkshire Bridge has around 50 houses and used to be owned entirely by the water board for its workers on the Ladybower dam. It has a letter box, a telephone box and a pub, but nothing else. It is two miles from the nearest village school, two miles from the nearest village shop and post office and six miles from the nearest train station. Its bus service is very infrequent. Going to the cinema, supermarket or hospital means a journey of 12 or 15 miles in whatever direction. I would not claim that people living there are necessarily living in dire poverty, but it is certainly an area of rural deprivation which, combined with low income and poor access to services, makes it that much worse for people who live there.

The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) has just spoken about the agricultural industry. In my constituency, the main agricultural industry is sheep farming. A couple of years ago, the typical sheep farmer on an upland Pennine farm had an annual income of about £10,000. Comparing that net income with a subsidy of about £12,000 shows that such a farmer would have been working at an operating loss during the year to which I refer. If one is faced with a 40-mile round trip to take one's sheep to an abattoir or maket to sell them for pennies, one will not relish the idea of staying in the industry. There are huge structural problems in parts of the agricultural eonomy, and they cannot be solved overnight. There is a degree of over-production and some of the solutions will take a lot of hard biting to ensure that we get that part of the economy back on its feet.

As other hon. Members have said, however, all is not doom and gloom in rural areas, even where poverty can be found. Indeed, one does not have to look far to see it. A former Conservative local councillor for the Yorkshire Bridge area is on record as having said back in about 1994 that if poverty existed in his ward he would know about it. In view of that ignorance, he was duly removed in the 1995 local government elections. There are many ways in which the tide is turning. In my constituency of High Peak, some 2,000 people benefited from the introduction of the national minimum wage. The current level of £3.60—soon to be £3.70—is more than such people would have received without the minimum wage. In just a few weeks' time, they will be a further £1 a week better off because of the change in the national insurance contributions threshold, which will apply in addition to the reduction in the basic rate of income tax that is also in the cards.

Hundreds of families across High Peak are now benefiting from the working families tax credit. The incomes of some of the people in those families were raised to £3.60 an hour by the national minimum wage. Some of them now earn £5 a week or more extra, as they pay very little tax because of the working families tax credit, which gets more help to people who are most in need. Record increases in child benefit have assisted 14,000 families in my constituency. Following local press coverage over the past few days of my call for pensioners to take up their right to the pensioners minimum income guarantee, my office has received several calls from people who will clearly benefit from it. We are doing everything that we can to encourage such people. I take the point made earlier that people must see the minimum income guarantee as a right and entitlement, and not as a benefit, charity or handout.

I represent 16,000 pensioners in the High Peak constituency. The minimum income guarantee will help 2,000 of those pensioners, all of whom will be benefiting from reduced taxation on their savings, from free eye tests, which will be introduced in April, and from help with heating, insulation and home security. Indeed, from 1 November, people aged over 75 will benefit from free television licences. In what must be the coldest constituency in England—if you look at Buxton on the weather forecast, you will find that it is the coldest town in England—the £100 winter fuel payment is very welcome.

Other measures are assisting people who are suffering from deprivation and poverty. Derbyshire has a good record on keeping small schools open and on allowing old people to continue to live in their homes through the use of the home help service when otherwise they may have had to move away. In rural areas, if you move away to live in a care home, you invariably have to move out of your community, which can be upsetting for some people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. I know that this is a debate on rural matters, but there are too many "yous" in it. When the hon. Gentleman uses the word "you", he is referring to me, and I agree that Buxton can be quite bracing.

Mr. Levitt: Thank you for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you would be impressed to see the work being done by Derby university and others to bring new technology to rural areas to allow investment in remote learning so that people can benefit by increasing their skills, which will allow them to increase their earning power and, in many cases, to set up their own businesses. Teleworking and home working are also taking off in that area.

I welcome the fact that, as I understand it, about £15,000 per rural post office will be invested over the next few years, to allow post offices not only to thrive but to diversify and introduce more services, thereby allowing people to cut their transport costs. Derbyshire has benefited from the money for rural buses. We also have thriving community transport and car share schemes in our rural areas. Indeed, the ethos of self-help is very much at work, and making life better for people in such communities.

One especially interesting project underway is the prospect of the Hope Valley college becoming a technology college. Hope Valley college is an 11-16 school, 10 or 12 miles away from the nearest secondary school, and it hopes to build a network between itself and its feeder primary schools. As a community college, it has always encouraged people to use its facilities in the evening in order to benefit from increased skills and improved earning power.

In Derbyshire, unemployment is fairly low—about 3.8 per cent. according to the International Labour Organisation figures—and vacancies continue to be high. Many good things are happening, some inspired by the Government, some coming directly from local communities, and some from self-help schemes. That is all within the framework of tackling poverty and eliminating child poverty over 20 years, which is the Government's aim. There is, therefore, a bright future for people in the most deprived areas of those rural communities. Poverty is a real problem, but it is being tackled in a sustainable way. People are not looking for the quick fix, but are building over a generation after years of neglect.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I will be brief, because I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) wants to speak. I shall raise two issues. First, what have the Government done in response to the poverty agenda? Secondly, how can we ensure that that has an effect on the rural poverty that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) described? The hon. Gentleman gave us a panoramic view, and an insight into what is really happening.

The Government have identified the issue of poverty and signed up to the poverty agenda. We must congratulate them on that. In a speech on 18 February 1999, the Secretary of State introduced the Government's agenda and published the first annual report, "Opportunity for all—tackling poverty and social exclusion", a document that, although it largely considers the macro issue of poverty, relates just as much to the rural domain as it does to our urban problem areas. We must bear that in mind.

A series of documents published recently have shown that the Government are serious about tackling poverty. Just before Christmas, we had the document on rural economies. Since then, we have had "Sharing the Nation's Prosperity". Both those documents make it clear that tackling poverty, whether one describes it as deprivation or social exclusion, is part of the Government's agenda. It is essential that the Government understand that there is rural poverty as well as poverty in the urban setting which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) said, we know from various works of fiction. That debate should be taken up. We have failed to deal with poverty in rural areas for so long because it was unidentifiable. Either people chose not to identify rural poverty because of the stigma associated with it, or the statistical analyses to show that it truly existed were not available. We all knew that it existed, we all talked about it, but finding evidence for it was difficult.

The increasing amount of information on the subject has allowed the Government to set targets for rural as well as urban areas. I will concentrate on one particular area to highlight how we can take that further, drawing on the review of the index of deprivation carried out by the university of Oxford's department of applied social studies and social research. What the review is trying to achieve is highly laudable. It is aimed at identifying not only rural poverty, but deprivation in all its forms, but because of the way in which it deals with the complexities of the issue in different domains, it is worth inquiring into. I hope that in reply my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will be able to assure us that the document and the research that backs it up are being taken forward, because they not only identify poverty in all its forms, but allow us to put in place the policies that are needed.

What does the review allow us to do? It moves the debate towards a more concentrated effort in understanding what can be measured. It suggests analysis that is ward-based rather than by enumeration district, an examination of the indices to make them finer-grained and more finely tuned, and disaggregating the information so that it can be dealt with at local level. We could devise a series of principles that we can pick out and understand, and which can relate to all aspects of poverty across our countryside.

[Mr. David Drew]

If nothing else, I hope that the Minister will be able to say some encouraging things. Those of us who represent rural or semi-rural areas are not trying to capture that particular mechanism, but we believe that it is an important way to take the debate forward, and will allow us to come to some conclusions about how the Government should attack poverty and deal with difficult conditions. The debate will, I am sure, suggest an important direction for the Government, and the Minister may have some good things to say to us on that basis.

3.33 pm

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): Other Members have painted in much of the analysis, and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) has emphasised the importance of certain documents. The rural group of Labour Members produced our audit a year ago, and we have seen some documents from the policy innovation unit. There has been a fair amount of analysis, and I could add to that from the experience of my constituency.

My constituency is a vast rural one, which has suffered from agricultural decline and from some of the other ills that rural communities have experienced in the past 20 or 30 years. We need to take two points from the analysis into account. First, the problems that we are discussing are not new. During the lifetime of the previous Government, 100 village schools closed in Norfolk, and we have witnessed the decline in the numbers of those who work on the land. Agricultural workers have needed to move to market towns to take up low-paid employment, because they cannot afford the transport costs—and there is no public transport anyway. Empty homes have been bought by incomers for use by holidaymakers. That helps the economy, but the problems with which the Government are dealing have been left to fester for a long time. There are financial problems about low pay and incomes and problems of isolation related to transport and access to services, be it the doctor's surgery or the shop.

We must look for structural solutions as well as the band-aid measures that the Government provided in their first year or two. The minimum wage has provided first aid for many of my constituents, and the minimum income guarantee has helped many of the 22,000 pensioners in my constituency. The working families tax credit is helping large numbers of people as well. However, those measures are meant to deal immediately with the problems of poverty while time is taken to work out what must be done to change the structures. We must change the long-term future so that people no longer need to rely on the minimum wage, because they are paid more. They must have the ability to create their pensions, so that they do not need the minimum income guarantee. We will not succeed in government unless we put a medium and long-term programme in place at the same time as the crisis measures.

I hope that the analysis will result in a rural White Paper, which I presume has been delayed only because it has been coupled with the spending review. If we do not balance our policy on resources with the issues that must be faced, we will not solve the problems in the right way. That was the failure of the previous Government's rural White Paper.

My background is in electronic engineering, and modern technologies and computers will be important. Post Office modernisation could bring the ability to access Government services from the village post office, which would be of enormous significance. One of my ex-colleagues is working on a project that, if available in a post office, would mean that voice recognition technology would project on to a screen in sign language the speech of the person behind the counter. The scope for technology in rural areas is great, so we must ensure that it is exploited.

I have only a short time available, but I shall outline what I think the other key issues must be. We have to deal with low aspirations. For decades, the aspiration in too many of my constituents' families has been to get through school years and go into easily accessible but low-paid employment. Historically, unemployment in my constituency has never been great, but wage levels have been far too low. Educational opportunities will be taken only when we raise aspirations. We must consider education and training, which must be accompanied by other reforms to the rural economy.

I welcome the modest reforms of the common agricultural policy, and the modulations that the Government are trying to make to the development plan. That is a much better way to support the rural economy. We must ensure that our planners do not have a rulebook mentality about what should be prevented. The mood in local government must be such that planners consider how to help the economy and protect the environment. That balance has not always been struck.

The importance of transport and access has generally been recognised. I welcome 200 per cent. the abandonment of the fuel escalator, but I do not want another measure to replace it. The increases in fuel costs over the past year as a result of the rising price of oil have hurt poor workers in my constitutency who have to use a car to get to work. Whatever transport measures the Government introduce to help such people, they will never have bus services. We have had a wide-ranging debate, and I hope that the Minister can assure me that we can expect long-term solutions.

3.40 pm

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): I congratulate the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) on having initiated an interesting and informative debate. Most of our anti-poverty mechanisms relate almost entirely to urban areas, as that is where poverty has been most manifest. Rural poverty is largely hidden, and, because of the nature of the countryside, spread over a large geographical area. Nevertheless, the way in which we should approach rural poverty has many similarities to strategies, some of which have been successful, in urban areas.

The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) is absolutely right. The problem relates to aspirations. A single anti-poverty measure is not appropriate. The problem requires a combination of education, employment opportunities, housing, transportation and benefit incentives. The way in which those elements work together will determine whether the Government successfully tackle rural poverty.

I hope that the Government will tackle the problem of wilful blindness. I do not know what came over the Prime Minister on his recent visit to the west country. If he intended to persuade the countryside that he was on its side, he singularly failed. His "Crisis? What crisis?" attitude has hindered initiatives to restore the confidence of the countryside. Against the background of wilful blindness, we seem incapable of reversing a worsening trend.

In discussing countryside employment, we are not dealing only with farming, but farming is the mortar that holds together a lot of the countryside. As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome rightly said, farming has a knock-on effect on the rest of the rural economy. In the past two years, farm incomes have fallen by 75 per cent. Local government spending per head in rural areas is 60 per cent. of that in urban areas. Rural post offices face closure. We are aware of the effects of high fuel duty and we understand the lack of rural jobs and the high cost of housing. It is not surprising that the New Policy Institute found that one in 10 people in rural areas live below the poverty line.

The accountancy firm Deloitte and Touche, which has been investigating farming incomes over the past 10 years, recently reported that last year farming profits dropped by more than 50 per cent.—the greatest fall that it has recorded. It is perhaps not surprising that, according to a recent National Farmers Union survey, two third of farmers' children do not want to follow their father or mother into the family firm.

There is a time lag in the appreciation of the prosperity of the countryside. The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not give a clear answer to his parliamentary question about the number of people who would qualify for the working families tax credit. The National Farmers Union has said that 46 per cent. of farmers are on incomes that would qualify them for the working families tax credit.

We have some of the highest petrol prices in Europe, which means that the poor must spend a disproportionate amount on the running of their cars. Hon. Members may recall that in January a geographers conference was held in Brighton. It examined the problem and said that a new class of poor was being created in rural areas because of the rise in petrol costs. There was a debate in another place on the Joseph Rowntree Foundation's recent report on urban poverty. Research was also undertaken at the university of Aberdeen, which found that the cost of running a car often prevents young people from buying their own home. Most young people need their own transport to hold down work. Public transport is regarded as unreliable and often timetables do not match the work schedule. Such research puts a question mark over rural transport and the cost of running a car and it is no surprise that the Countryside Alliance found that the £50 miliion road transport package made little or no difference.

The Minister will have to reply to many questions for which he has no direct responsibility. However, he does have responsibility for rural post offices. The Government's plans to have benefits paid directly into bank accounts will put at risk a third of the country's sub-post offices, many of which are in rural areas. The National Federation of Sub-Postmasters said that the plans were a "disaster for sub-postmasters, disaster for those people who are drawing their benefits and pensions (and for) people who want their post offices that are closed".

We all know from our postbags about the difficulty that the closure of sub-post offices will cause. I have received several letters from the constituents and, to save time, I shall quote from just one. Mr. Johnson from Hook End, a rural area in my constituency, is a full-time carer for his wife, who suffers from multiple sclerosis. He wrote that, if the local post office were to close,

"I will have to request the assistance of a neighbour to sit with my wife while I have to journey into Brentwood for the total sum of £39.90, minus the expense of petrol and parking fees and the total inconvenience of doing so and all that it entails."

I am sure that the Minister is sympathetic to such a complaint, because, when in opposition, he was most diligent in writing to sub-postmasters. On 17 May 1993, he wrote:

"I am writing to you in response to widespread concern about the impact of Government proposals to change the method of the payment of pensions and other benefits...I can see no reason why people should not have a choice in the way they receive their payments."

He enclosed a petition with the letter and ended it by stating:

"If you have any points you would like to make to me on this issue please don't hesitate to get in touch."

I suppose that this debate provides the opportunity to contact him and I look forward to hearing how he intends to safeguard not only the post offices in York, but those in Somerton and Frome, High Peak, Brentwood and Ongar, East Londonderry and the constituencies of others who have spoken today.

In conclusion, the problem is that the Government mistakenly view the countryside as prosperous suburbs. It is important that we recognise that rural poverty is slightly different from urban poverty. To do that, we have to put together a package that takes into consideration the special characteristics of the countryside. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

3.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Hugh Bayley): I congratulate the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) on securing the debate. It has been a wide-ranging and extremely well-informed discussion, with contributions by hon. Members from the length and breadth of the United Kingdom.

There are real differences between urban and rural areas, but many elements draw together town and country, such as shared services and economic interdependence. Refreshingly, no hon. Member tried to play off the interests of rural areas against those of urban areas. As a Government who seek to represent all people in all communities in all parts of the United Kingdom, we need to respond to needs and to poverty, whether in rural or urban areas. Trying to set two areas against each other does a disservice to people in both.

The hon. Gentleman asked what the Prime Minister said on his recent visit to the west country. The Prime Minister acknowledges the depth of poverty in the countryside and we have responded to that—through our rural development plans, for example, which will provide an extra £1.6 billion over the next seven years for development in rural areas. The Prime Minister's personal intervention meant that Cornwall received objective 1 status, which will provide the assistance that it needs.

There are problems in rural areas. The hon. Gentleman raised that of bus services. He said that there was just one bus a week to his own village. Twenty-two per cent. of villages have no bus services. The Conservative policy of bus deregulation was a disaster for rural areas, as I know only too well. Somerset is a rural area, as is mine, but the population density of North Yorkshire is 70 per sq km, which is half that of Somerset.

The hon. Gentleman also welcomed the impact of the minimum wage on the countryside. Sadly, the Conservative party voted against that measure. I am pleased that the Liberal Democrats have abandoned their proposal for regional variations in the minimum wage. That policy would have led to many rural areas with lower wages having a lower rate of wage protection than that introduced by the Government through the national minimum wage.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) and the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome raised the important issue of improving the accessibility of benefits to people in rural areas. We have seen the value of NHS Direct in improving health advice to people in rural areas and we must learn the lessons from that for other national Government services such as benefits, and local government services such as social services.

Mr. David Heath rose—

Mr. Bayley: I have so many hon. Members to respond to that in fairness to them I shall press on.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) mentioned the lack of information on rural deprivation. The Government's review of the index of local deprivation addresses that. We propose to introduce elements in the index, including that of access to services. Increasing the weighting will benefit rural communities and their local authorities. It will also allow the data to be disaggregated at ward, rather than just district, level and help to pinpoint the pockets of poverty and deprivation in rural areas that so many hon. Members have been at pains to emphasise. Indeed, during the past two years the increase in standard spending assessments for shire counties has been higher than for England as a whole, which reflects the fact that the Government recognise the need for additional resources in shire areas—we are putting our money where our mouth is. In Plymouth, many local authorities have developed their own local strategies for combating poverty. That is important in dealing with the issues that we have discussed today, and I hope that more authorities, shire counties and urban authorities, will do that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) referred to the huge fall in the number of people working in agriculture during the past 50 years or so. However, there has been growth in other employment areas, and although I accept that averages mask many differences, unemployment is extremely low in many rural areas. In the constituency of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, unemployment is 2 per cent. In Plymouth, Sutton, it is 7.5 per cent. In Great Yarmouth, a very rural area, it is more than 10 per cent., so there is variation. There is a heavy burden of unemployment in many rural areas, as well as areas in which the burden is much less.

Since May 1997, there has been a significant fall in long-term unemployment of about one-third in all parts of the country, but interestingly, it has fallen by 36 per cent. in accessible rural areas, by 37.5 per cent. in remote rural areas and by only 30.9 per cent in urban areas. There has been a significant fall in long-term unemployment everywhere, but the largest fall has been in rural areas.

The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) referred to the working families tax credit. He said that there had been a good take-up of the tax credit, which reflects the problem of poverty and low income in rural areas. The Labour party supported the introduction of the working families tax credit—sadly, the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats opposed it—and it is making a big difference to the issue of poverty in rural areas. The same goes for the national minimum wage. My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Levitt) said that 2,000 people in his constituency had benefited from that. Again, that measure was introduced in the face of stiff opposition from the Conservatives, who said that it would destroy jobs, yet jobs are being created in rural areas, unemployment is falling, and the wages of people on low incomes are rising as a result of the Government's policies.

My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak also raised the important issue of the minimum income guarantee for pensioners, which boosts the incomes of the poorest pensioners in rural and urban areas. In the House last week, we agreed to increase the value of the minimum income guarantee in line not with prices, but with earnings. That increase was supported by all parties except, of course, the Liberal Democrats.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk asked when the rural White Paper would appear. It will be published later this year, in tandem with the urban White Paper, because the interdependence between the two is important.

The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) made several important points but, given the time, I can respond to only one of them. I must respond to his challenge about post offices. Like me, he might have received a document from the House of Commons Library, which lists the number of post offices that have been closed in recent years. The number of Crown post offices—directly controlled by the Government—that closed while the Conservatives were in power was 974. The number closed by the Labour Government is six. Of course, we do not directly control sub-post offices as they are private businesses, but 3,435 closed while the Conservatives were in power and closures continue at much the same rate. Something must be done about that. The Government propose to rectify the problem by modernising the Post Office. We shall allow it to provide a wider range of services in order to seek new business. When the Conservatives were in government, they wanted to use automated credit transfer, which would mean that people would not have the right to collect benefits in cash from the local post office. People should have choice. I argued for choice then, and I am pleased to say that the Labour Government are introducing choice.

Those who complain about the threat to post offices should do what I have done for many years. I have always supported my local post office, so I opened a Girobank account and went to the post office rather than the bank to withdraw cash.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Time is up. Would those hon. Members who do not want to stay for the next debate please leave quickly and quietly?

Rail Traffic (Lincoln)

4 pm

Gillian Merron (Lincoln): The debate is a tremendous opportunity to raise the real concerns of my constituents and of businesses, the local authority and community representatives in my constituency.

Our deep-rooted concerns result from Railtrack's commercial intention significantly to increase the number of freight trains passing through Lincoln without considering how that change might be managed to ensure that the city is not brought to a standstill. I share the fears of my constituents that, with the present road and rail layout, a further increase in rail traffic will be a burden rather than a bonus to the city.

I was determined to secure this parliamentary time to raise local issues because they highlight principles of wider significance, most notably the shortcomings of the Railways Act 1993 and of the fact that Railtrack is singularly and in my view unreasonably focused only on its part of the picture. I hope that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions will be able to assist in keeping the whole picture in our collective sight.

In using this opportunity to speak up for Lincoln, I wish to thank and pay tribute to those who have worked with me, some of whom are in the Chamber today. The rail forum includes representatives from Lincoln city council, Lincolnshire county council, the local chamber of commerce, Lincolnshire training and enterprise council and the university. I also thank the many individuals, including Mr. Carter, a retired railway man, who have taken the time to write, as well as the emergency services, including the fire service, and community groups such as the soroptomists society and the local media. That cross-section of opinion provides a measure of the overwhelming feeling of people in Lincoln. Everyone concerned has given the subject a good and open airing, which has informed the many aspects of the debate. It has been an important means of sending the message to Railtrack that it needs to work with us all to find a long-term solution that satisfies all parties.

The problem to which a solution must be found arises from Railtrack's intention to upgrade the east coast main line and develop the route to carry more passenger trains, faster trains and more freight services. To deliver those services, Railtrack intends to separate high-speed trains from slower trains by creating a four-track railway for much of the route. That will include a second parallel railway to the east coast main line, which will serve as a freight route.

What will that mean for Lincoln? In essence, there will be two extra freight trains an hour in each direction, and an increase in passenger services. Why does that present Lincoln with a problem? Lincoln has the rare distinction of having a railway line cut through the centre of the city, which necessitates a level crossing. When the barriers are closed, the railway cuts the high street in half for traffic and pedestrians alike. That now happens for 12 minutes in every hour, and it already causes congestion and inconvenience. It is estimated that the four extra rail freight journeys each hour will result in the barriers being closed for between 24 and 28 minutes an hour.

[Gillian Merron]

In January, I invited Railtrack executives to Lincoln to meet representatives from the rail forum. When asked at what point they would consider having to make alternative arrangements, they stated that the barriers would need to be down for about 40 minutes in every hour before they would feel compelled to act. Letting the high street of a vibrant city become impassable for 40 minutes in every hour is not good enough. If the increased freight traffic results in a down-time of 28 minutes, it will not take many passenger trains to cut the city in two for 40 minutes an hour.

To shed some light on the way forward, I refer to the joint statement from the rail forum. It states:

"Railtrack's intention to invest in Lincolnshire railways as part of its east coast main line investment is, in principle, welcomed.

Strong reservations are held in respect of the detailed proposals presently under active consideration due to their severe adverse effects on the city of Lincoln. Railtrack must ensure that full and proper consideration be given to finding a long-term strategic solution that avoids or minimises the unacceptable severance consequential with the present proposals."

I, too, am a great advocate of investment and development. I should very much like Lincoln to be at the heart of an improved road and rail network. We have already made considerable progress with the Government's much welcomed agreement to dual the A46 road between Newark and Lincoln. Railtrack's plans could bring even greater improvements, but not if it fails to accept its responsibilities to the people of Lincoln. The issue has generated much heat and, on Railtrack's part, little light. I have used every opportunity to raise the matter in Parliament, with Ministers and with Railtrack executives. Next month, at my request, I shall meet the chief executive of Railtrack, Mr. Corbett. I want to impress on him the need for Railtrack to consult and inform in a more meaningful way than it has done to date. Furthermore, Railtrack needs to be committed to finding a properly managed and funded solution to a fundamental change that will literally cut deeper into the heart of Lincoln.

The difficulties of congestion and severance caused by the location of the railway line have so far been undesirable, yet manageable to some extent as the area round the railway has been underutilised. However, that area is now a major focus of development as Lincoln goes from strength to strength as a tourist, shopping, education and employment centre, securing millions of pounds of Government money for regeneration.

In recent months, confidence in the city has been reflected in announcements that we are to have a new multiplex cinema and a new BT call centre with 900 jobs, and the confirmation, only last month, of the acquisition by Dynex Semiconductor, a Canadian company, of the Mitel factory on Doddington road, securing 350 jobs. The new university—the first in 25 years to be purpose-built in this country—goes from strength to strength while the associated housing, cultural and social developments also make their contribution to the economy.

My constituents identify strongly with their city. They are proud of it and the list I have given shows how justified that pride is. Lincoln has a rich heritage and an exciting future. The most commonly asked question about the unbelievable state of affairs that I have described is, "Can Railtrack really do this?" I regret that I am advised the answer is yes. We were let down by the previous Government, who, in pasing the Railways Act 1993, which gave Railtrack its powers, took no account of the impact that proposals to increase rail traffic would have on a constituency such as Lincoln.

Last week we suffered an extra transport setback as the Conservative county council passed a budget that did not include the requisite £1 million to secure the potential route of the eastern relief road. That would have helped to alleviate our difficulties. Lincoln county council's financial approach disadvantages and thwarts my constituents at every turn by failing to obtain funds at very low interest rates for such long-term projects—the opposite of the approach of most authorities.

Certain suggested diversions of traffic to avoid the railway line bring their own problems. It is fair to say that the matter is not new. Railway crossings in Lincoln have been a thorny issue across the centuries. The existence of a railway crossing in the centre of the city has always been the most contentious aspect of an unresolved debate. In May 1860, a headline in the Lincolnshire Chronicle asked "Who is to blame?" because of rail safety worries. Almost a century and a half later, in October 1999, the Lincolnshire Echo headline reading "Rail battle on track" shows that rail matters are still a cause for well-articulated outrage in my constituency. Pressure must be brought to bear on Railtrack to develop and execute the proper solution for my constituents.

On an environmental note, I have read the figures for the amount of pollution caused by traffic emissions. They measure nitrogen dioxide in parts per billion. Areas that are of potential concern are those in which traffic is expected to exceed 20,000 vehicles per day by 2005. The A15 at Pelham bridge and Broadgate has a permanent monitoring site at the drill hall which last year registered an average 34-plus parts per billion. The national guidelines set a target for the average, which should not exceed 21 parts per billion by the end of 2005. Lincoln has a potential pollution problem on its hands. It must not be worsened by the impact of rail developments on road traffic.

There are additional problems for the economy and the emergency services. Common sense tells us that if a city cannot be passed through at the High street for up to 40 minutes in any one hour, the ability of the emergency services to get where they need to be in the expected time will be greatly threatened. That is disturbing for my constituents. Likewise, increased traffic and pedestrian congestion is not conducive to businesses along and around the High Street doing well. I was staggered to read in a letter that Railtrack's chief executive sent to me on 9 August 1999 that "the issue of level crossing closures, including high street level crossings, has been made worse by the significant retail developments that have generated extra pedestrian and vehicular movements."

Is the success of Lincoln's commercial activity to be blamed for the limitations of the railway line?"

In the mid-19th century it seemed certain for a while that the main railway from London to the north would pass through Lincoln. It is often thought that this failed to materialise because of the attitude and influence of one of its two Members of Parliament, Colonel Sibthorpe, a Conservative with a reputation as a colourful character who first represented Lincoln in 1826. He was against the whole idea of railways, and enjoyed being a reactionary. I give the Chamber my assurance that, by contrast, the current Member of Parliament for Lincoln is greatly in favour of rail transport, and is keen for there to be an improved service to Lincoln. I ask my hon Friend the Minister to take full account of the comments that I have made on behalf of my constituents, including my reference to the lack of legislative protection for cities such as Lincoln. I hope that she will assist in bringing pressure to bear on Railtrack to get it to work with representatives in Lincoln to bring benefits rather than burdens to the city.

4.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Beverley Hughes): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on securing the debate. She set out with characteristic clarity the issues that she sees facing Lincoln as a result of the impact of the proposed increase in rail movements through the city.

Lincoln is a renowned history city. It is an important sub-regional centre for the east midlands and it provides significant employment and local services to a growing urban population. My hon. Friend realises that good transport access will play a vital part in its future prosperity. I recognise my hon. Friend's interest in transport issues as well as the considerable amount of work that she has done in the Lincoln area. She has been successful in addressing road issues. She mentioned lobbying for the A46 Newark to Lincoln road dualling scheme, which is now due to start. The knowledge and understanding of rail issues that she has demonstrated today shows that, like the Government, she is multi-modal in addressing transport issues.

The level crossing in Lincoln high street has been a local feature since the 19th century and it causes delays for pedestrians and local traffic. Over many years development close to the railway has exacerbated the problem. Unlike the extract from the letter to which she referred, we must welcome that development. I know that my hon. Friend recognises the continued and considerable investment in the centre of Lincoln in recent years. The opening of the new Brayford bridge in 1997 provided some relief for the high street and an alternative route across the railway line. However, the continued increase in both rail and road traffic has seen congestion in the high street approach previous levels.

My hon. Friend's concern relates to Railtrack's proposals for the increased use of the railway for rail freight and the potential for even greater delays, as she graphically outlined, in the high street area. Irrespective of Railtrack's current proposals, the railway line through Lincoln provides an important link to the rest of Lincolnshire. The number of passenger trains is likely to grow. The high street level crossing and the effect that the resulting congestion has on business need to be considered. I fully understand my hon. Friend's concerns and those of the people of Lincoln about the issue.

It is Government policy, as set out in the transport White Paper, to support initiatives to carry more freight by rail. As my hon. Friend has made clear, the increased use of the Lincoln route by freight trains is part of Railtrack's wider plans to increase the passenger capacity of the east coast main line. In 1998, the Government set up the shadow Strategic Rail Authority to oversee and regulate the operations of the rail industry. The establishment of that authority means that developing rail freight will finally be part of the strategic management of the whole network and the whole rail sector. The shadow Strategic Rail Authority is now fully engaged in steering the future development of the network and integrating it with other forms of transport.

The transport White Paper announced the move from a mainly road-based assessment by highways authorities in their bids for local transport funding, to a more widely focused approach through the development of local transport plans, which need to address all forms of transport. Local transport plans are important in this context. The part that rail plays in transport provision must be seen as part of the Government's integrated transport policy, as set out in the transport White Paper.

There needs to be a partnership between transport operators, local authorities, business, local interest groups and users to ensure that all modes of transport are properly integrated and transport networks are operated effectively across all forms of transport. We also recognise the need for local involvement in seeking solutions to transport problems. We have asked local highway authorities to produce five-year local transport plans covering all transport provision within their area. The local transport plans were introduced last year as the basis for Government funding for local transport policy and priority. The extra £700 million provided over three years through those transport plans enabled the Government to begin to address the underfunding of transport that the previous Government permitted.

Local authorities, including Lincolnshire county council, submitted provisional plans in July 1999 and decisions on those were announced in December. We were pleased to see the amount of effort that local authorities put into developing plans in line with Government guidance. As part of the development of a local transport plan, we expect wide consultation with all transport users, operators and businessess, so that all relevant issues can be brought into the picture. That will help to develop a strategy to address local transport needs and it will apply in Lincoln, as elsewhere.

My hon. Friend will know that the development of Lincoln's local transport plan is the responsibility of the county council, which attempted in its preparation of the full plan to consult a wide section of interests, including the shadow Strategic Rail Authority, Railtrack, local authorities and others. The county council has the opportunity to continue the integrated transport approach that it outlined in its provisional plan. The wider focus that it adopts over transport issues should help to develop a longer-term transport strategy.

The provisional plan included a section on a potential candidate for a major tranport scheme close to Lincoln city centre, costing in excess of £5 million. The Lincoln railway corridor scheme was one of four major schemes throughout Lincolnshire identified in the provisional plan for which further clarification is expected in the full plans to be published later this year. Early indications from the county council suggest that the Lincoln railway corridor may not feature as a major scheme—"major" accords with a specific definition in the guidelines based on cost. However, subject to further investigation, it could emerge as one of several related measures for Lincoln that will be identified in the full plan. It is important for my hon. Friend and other interested local people to grasp and pursue that point and I can tell her and her constituents that tackling congestion is central to the transport priorities of this historic city. We expect such priorities to be addressed as a pivotal feature of the full plan.

The county council and the city council are anxious that any future regeneration in the city centre should be sustainable. That led the county council to commission a central Lincoln development and transportation study. I understand that Railtrack is contributing towards the costs. A key element in the study will be an examination of the scope for alternative infrastructure options in the High street area in the light of the possible increase in the number of level crossing closures. I welcome that initiative, on which Railtrack, rail users and local businesses will be consulted. The study is expected to be completed in early July and its result should help to develop a strategy to address future needs and to indicate the scope of specific measures. I must tell my hon. Friend and the county council that if the main results of the study are to inform the content of the full local transport plan, which has to be produced for June, those time scales will have to be adapted. My hon. Friend will want to take that point back with her. The study offers potential, but its results must be known in time if they are to inform the full local transport plan.

Railtrack has issued a consultation document about its proposals for using the Lincoln line for re-routing freight trains off the east coast main line. Railtrack's current consultation and the transport study being undertaken by the county council have some common objectives. Railtrack has held a meeting with local councils and the chamber of commerce. It accepts that communication between all the parties needs to be improved.

I publicly take my hon. Friend's point that consultation by Railtrack must be meaningful and genuinely directed at achieving a long-term strategic solution. I expect close co-operation between the key partners so that the issues may be understood. The Government support local partnerships and consultations as the way forward on agreeing solutions to transport problems. Close dialogue and wider interest are needed to develop a workable strategy, which puts a responsibility on all partners, including operators, to engage in such a process and find local solutions.

The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions is in regular contact with the county council via the Government office for the east midlands, and provides advice and assistance about the local transport plan. I have asked the Government office to assist in any way that it can the meetings between key partners that aim to secure agreement on the appropriate way forward for Lincoln.

The local issues identified by my hon. Friend must first be considered by the partners, including Railtrack, rail operators, Lincoln city council and Lincolnshire county council. Other interest groups must then be involved in the consultation on the local plan. I am pleased that my hon. Friend and local partners welcome the principle of an increase in investment on lines throughout Lincolnshire.

Increased investment in Lincoln is especially important to my hon. Friend although, as she pointed out, the consequences of that must be tackled. There is no alternative to a locally agreed solution. I encourage and expect all partners, including Railtrack, to work together to find one. Local solutions must recognise the needs of all rail users and take into account pedestrians, essential traffic access and legitimate business that has developed in the city centre.

I am sure that all partners subscribe to those goals and I wish them every success in pursuing them. Under the auspices of the Government office, the Department stands ready to play a full, constructive part in those discussions. I shall watch those discussions carefully and look forward to the partners working out a long-term strategic solution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. The next debate will start three minutes early as all participants are now present. Those who do not wish to stay may leave quietly.

Anti-drugs Co-ordinator

4.27 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): I am sure that those extra three minutes will be put to good use.

At the election, I assured the people of Christchurch that a parliamentary priority would be responding to the scourge of drugs, which is every parent's nightmare and the cause of so much crime. I was not alone in highlighting that issue. In its manifesto, the Labour party stated:

"The vicious circle of drugs and crime wrecks lives and threatens communities. We will appoint an anti-drugs supremo to co-ordinate our battle against drugs across all government departments. The 'drugs czar' will be a symbol of our commitment to tackle the modern menace of drugs in our communities."

In January 1998, Keith Hellawell was appointed for a three-year period at an annual salary that is now reported to be £106,000. His first action was to review the position and, in April 1998, the Government produced a strategy document entitled "Tackling Drugs to Build a Better Britain". When progress was debated in the House, the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Jack Cunningham), then Minister for the Cabinet Office, spoke of the Government having a "strategic vision in place and resources allocated to support it."

He concluded:

"the targets have been set. It is time for us to start delivering."—[Official Report, 2 July 1999; Vol. 334, c. 545-49.]

We are debating the matter today because the Government are not delivering. The use of illegal drugs is increasing from a base point at which drug abuse in the United Kingdom was already up to five times higher than that in other European countries and by far the worst in Europe. The British people now realise that that is yet another policy area in which the Government's comfortable words have not been translated into action. Whitehall is alert to the hunt for scapegoats. The Minister for the Cabinet Office has complained to the press about a whispering campaign against her from No. 10. Mr. Hellawell has complained that he is also a victim of a whispering campaign. For example, on 31 January, The Guardian reported Mr. Hellawell as challenging his critics at Westminster to "put up or shut up".

He feared that the "negative spinning" directed at him was undermining his strategy. A similar story appeared in The Daily Telegraph on 1 February.

Meanwhile—no doubt in desperation—the Prime Minister responded by preaching to us through the internet last Friday. Perhaps he used the script that the Minister of State, Cabinet Office, will use in response to this debate. I hope not, because the right hon. Gentleman has a better record of using words of substance than the Prime Minister. I take issue with the empty expressions used by the Prime Minister in that broadcast. I wish to focus on one matter, in particular. He proposed to extend the "rat on a rat" scheme, so that children could telephone the police if they saw someone peddling drugs "near their school".

What about schoolchildren using or passing drugs to each other at school? What action should schools take? Some have requested the use of random searches and/or random testing. As a lawyer, the Prime Minister must know that there is no purpose in having a command without a sanction and that a sanction will be of no effect unless there is a likelihood of detection. Although the expressions "discipline" and "self-discipline" do not feature in the Government's drug strategy, teachers realise that firm boundaries have to be set in schools. The certain knowledge that anyone committing a drugs offence on school premises will be automatically excluded concentrates the minds of pupils and reinforces the behaviour of the law-abiding majority.

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment undermined the ability of individual schools to maintain such a zero tolerance policy against pupils using or being in possession of drugs. I have heard of the despair of head teachers in my constituency and elsewhere at the obstacles placed in their way. Mr. Hellawell said that he wanted a reduction in the number of young people excluded from schools because of drugs-related incidents, and he has made that a specific objective of his strategy. People assumed—wrongly, it turns out—that that would be achieved by reducing the incidence of drug activity inside schools rather than going soft on those who break the rules.

By concentrating on what is happening outside schools, the Prime Minister is again avoiding one of the key aspects of the problem. The problem is wider, because fundamental ambiguity and confusion lie at the heart of the Government's policy towards cannabis. That is well illustrated by a short quotation from Mr. Hellawell that was reported in The Times on 17 February this year. He said:

"We are concentrating on the drugs that cause most harm though this does not mean we are going soft on cannabis."

What does that mean? Perhaps the Minister can enlighten us.

The Government's confusion over cannabis is also reflected in Dorset. On 15 February, our local paper, the Daily Echo, reported that cannabis smokers are more likely to be convicted in Dorset than in any other county in Britain and that 37 per cent. of people arrested for possession in 1997 were cautioned, while 63 per cent. were charged and found guilty. Although the number of arrests is still very low, the police seemed to be sending out a clear message that cannabis was not to be tolerated. However, the bad news is that the newly appointed assistant chief constable for Dorset has announced that a different and less strict approach has been adopted to bring Dorset more into line with other areas of the county where cautioning for cannabis is the norm. It is none other than the Government's drug tsar who is held up as the person responsible for that softer line.

Last week, the Daily Echo's editorial under the heading Softer line? Go to Pot!" reflected the views of my constituents, when it stated:

"The area has a real problem and a softer line will only make it grow."

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

The chance of a young person being arrested for possession of cannabis is very remote. When that is coupled with a feeble system of penalties for those who are arrested, a clear message comes across that the police cannot be bothered about enforcing the law against cannabis. More seriously, young people's respect for the law is being undermined. The law seems to be enforced on only a random, spasmodic, arbitrary and inconsistent basis. That is given credence by announcements such as the recent one by the Cleveland constabulary—the police force in the area represented by the Minister for the Cabinet Office—that it would like cannabis to be legalised. We have also received persistent leaks to the effect that the Police Foundation will recommend a softer line on cannabis. The Government have said that they would never agree to that, but in the absence of firm leadership, the policy vacuum is being filled by conflict and counterclaim.

A further contradiction comes from the national crime squad, which warns that easing or ignoring the laws on cannabis possession for personal use would free up the drugs market and might make matters worse. At the root of the problem is the omission of any Government target for reducing cannabis use. That has sent the signal that cannabis has been degraded and, because there is no national target, local police forces are abandoning local targets for reducing cannabis use.

Cannabis use is not only unlawful, but anti-social, and those who still regard it as victimless are deluding themselves. The use of cannabis by motorists and motorcyclists contributes to a rising and significant number of deaths and injuries on our roads. Dorset experienced a graphic example of that when five young people were killed in a car crash near Puddletown after the driver had used cannabis. Road accidents are still the largest cause of premature death among young people, and drug use may already be the largest single contributor to that avoidable carnage.

What is the response of the Government's drug tsar? On 21 October 1998, The Times reported that he had spoken in favour of drug-drive tests on motorists to match spot checks on pilots and train drivers, yet the law has not been changed. We know the response of our magistracy. At October's annual general meeting of the Magistrates Association, the 700 representatives overwhelmingly passed a resolution to the effect that there should be a new, specific offence of driving with prohibited drugs in the body, leading to mandatory disqualification. Such an offence would be analogous to that of driving with excess alcohol. The motion was proposed by Hilda Brownlow JP, the chairman of the Dorset Police Partnership Trust and the Dorset youth court. She spoke in the presence of the Lord Chancellor and the resolution was circulated to Ministers, but nothing has happened since October, so far as I can ascertain.

Although a reliable roadside test for the presence of illegal drugs in the body is not yet possible, that is not a valid excuse for inaction. A simple roadside screening test is already available and could be used as a basis for establishing suspicion, which could lead to arrest and the obtaining of further evidence by blood or urine sample.

We need an urgent response to the statistics, which show a sixfold increase in the numbers of drivers and passengers killed in road accidents after taking drugs. The Royal Automobile Club reports that the figure has now reached 18 per cent. Breathtakingly, more than 750,000 passengers in cars in the past year have been driven by someone under the influence of drugs. That is an alarming statistic, to which there has been no response from a Government who, to judge from their words, should be eager to do something about it.

The subject is relevant to the issue of young people and drugs, because young people have a good record of compliance with drinking and driving laws. When I was Minister for Roads and Traffic, it was apparent that young people took the laws much more seriously than many middle-aged people did. I do not think that young people comply with the law because they are inherently more law-abiding, but because they realise that there is a high chance of detection if they offend and the certainty of a painful penalty if they are caught. No young people want to be disqualified from driving and subject to financial penalties on their insurance as well as court fines. If a similar regime were applied to driving with illegal drugs in the body, there is every reason to believe that young people would respond similarly. Would it not be better if the Government legislated to remove driving licences from those who drive with illegal drugs in their bloodstream rather than extending that penalty to those who do not meet their Child Support Agency payments? That is another example of the Government getting their priorities totally wrong.

We often hear the refrain from the police that it is difficult to prove evidence of possession of drugs because people discard substances before being searched by the police. Fundamental to that problem is a weakness in the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. As interpreted by the courts, if someone has drugs in his pocket, he can be convicted of possession, but if he has them in his bloodstream or urine, he cannot. Possession needs to be redefined in law so that the presence of illicit drugs in the body would become prima facie evidence of the offence of their possession. That principle already applies to drugs in athletics and to the detection of drugs in prisoners. That simple reform could revolutionise the ease with which possession of drugs could be detected and offenders prosecuted.

It is not only the Magistrates Association that wants such changes in the law. RoadPeace, the national charity for road traffic victims, reports that a number of their members have the impression that drugs played a significant part in the crashes in which their relatives were killed or injured. It draws attention to the problem of obtaining sufficient evidence to ensure that those involved in accidents that cause fatalities as a result of drug-taking are penalised to the same extent as those in similar circumstances with an excess of alcohol in their bloodstream.

The No. 10 performance and innovation unit recently chided the Government for putting emphasis on processes rather than outcomes. The Government's drug policy is another example of that. I believe that the time has come for action. We all know about the way in which the use of illicit drugs has brought personal tragedy into the Minister's life—no one is better qualified to get a grip on the subject—but it is clear, even from the Government's internal memorandum, that action has not happened. I wish the drugs tsar well—I know that he does not like that title, but that is what he was announced as in the Labour manifesto. He is fast becoming a symbol of the Government's failure in that all-important policy area.

The subject touches all of us, particularly parents. The Prime Minister referred to that in his internet broadcast last Friday, but the time has come for him to deliver something more than easy words. He said:

"So not just as a Prime Minister, as a parent too, we want to support hard working families and make sure that we engage in a real battle to combat the scourge of drugs in our society."

That is almost a mirror-image of what I said in my election manifesto. He went on to say:

"If we hold our nerve, we carry on with the strategy, tougher punishment"— yet all the evidence shows that at what is for many people the point of entry into the illegal drugs trade there is weaker, less effective punishment and less enforcement. That must change if we are to get a grip on that worrying aspect of Government policy.

4.44 pm

The Minister of State, Cabinet Office (Mr. Ian McCartney): I welcome the opportunity to debate these matters with the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope). I was hoping that we would have a serious debate about an issue that has been a growing menace in society for many years. The problems that exist in every town, village and city in Britain have the potential to affect every family in Britain.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned my personal circumstances. It is five months to the day since I had to go to a mortuary to identify my son's body. It is not only because of that or because of my having been involved for 10 years with young people with substantial problems relating to abuse, that I do not approach or debate the subject lightly. Nor does anyone in the Government. Nor was I given my portfolio because of my personal family problems. I received it last July, as a measure of the Government's committing additional resources to the ministerial team to support my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office and Mr. Hellawell, the drugs tsar. I hoped that we would debate how to create a healthy and confident society through activities in the community involving young people and their families. I hope that in the remaining minutes I shall be able to discuss that.

The hon Gentleman raised several issues. I shall write to him with a full explanation on some of them because I doubt that we have the time left for the intricate discussions that I should like to have on some legitimate issues that relate to all circumstances in which difficult decisions must be made about personal liberty, available resources and attitudes towards dealing with young people in difficult circumstances.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned cannabis, and tried to imply that the Minister for the Cabinet Office and Mr. Hellawell have gone soft. I reject that imputation entirely. The Government have absolutely no intention of relaxing the legal status of cannabis, or any other controlled drug, and nor do we recognise a need for a royal commission to review the law. All drugs are harmful. The strong evidence available on the toxic effects of cannabis justifies maintaining the ban on recreational use. The risks involved include impairment of concentration, short-term memory and manual dexterity, and respiratory diseases such as bronchitis and lung cancer, which are associated with smoking the drug, and are all too prevalent. The potential value of cannabis-based medicinal products does not support the argument for legalising cannabis. It is a medical issue that can be settled only through proper scientific research, and the Government have licensed projects to assess any benefits of medicines derived from cannabis.

The co-ordinator's annual report sets targets for the Government in supporting police trials for drug recognition training and for field impairment testing in respect of drug driving. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about the progress of that work.

The hon. Gentleman became rather political. If that is his approach, perhaps he will talk to his colleagues on the Front Bench. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) wrote a book entitled "Saturn's Children" in which he said:

"The only completely effective way to ameliorate the drug problem, and especially the crime which results from it, is to bring the industry into the open by legalising the distribution and consumption of all dangerous drugs".

He went on to say that drug use is not an especially threatening health problem and that there is no reason to suppose that the number of consumers would increase if dangerous drugs were legalised. That is not merely soft on drugs, but irresponsible. That person is now on the Front Bench, and that is an open encouragement. Young people are being offered not Smarties and sweets but dangerous drugs. He says that drugs present no health threat, but the first time could be the last—as it is for many young people. People in public life should be more careful about what they say and write in influencing young people. I hope that the hon. Member for Christchurch will withdraw what are perceived as scandalous remarks, especially by bereaved parents who have lost a child through drug abuse.

Mr. Chope: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will complete the record by saying that my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) has omitted from the latest edition of his book the references to which the right hon. Gentleman refers. That may reflect a change of view, and should be placed on record.

Mr. McCartney: It should never have been written in the first place. People do not distinguish between version one and version two. The book is widely available, and was promoted to be read. As a result, information is available that tells young people that taking drugs does not constitute a danger to health. But drugs kill, and the Tory party should take action when someone like that, on the Front Bench—a man of influence—makes such comments.

The recent Home Office drugs seizure and drug offender statistics show that Customs and Excise and other enforcement agencies play a vital role in preventing drugs from reaching United Kingdom streets. In 1998, we seized drugs with a total value of £710 million and dealt with 127,900 drug offenders—an increase of 13 per cent. on the previous year. The hon. Gentleman's remarks are not true; the Government have not gone soft on dealing seriously with drug offenders and those who peddle drugs to young people.

Keith Hellawell was appointed in January 1999. His remit was to review existing Government policies and make recommendations for their development, to ensure a coherent national and international strategy, and to explain Government actions to the widest possible audience. Since then, we have launched a new 10-year strategy, in which our aims are to help young people resist drug taking, have a positive life style and realise their full potential; to protect communities from drug activities and anti-social or criminal behaviour; to provide treatment to overcome addiction; and to reduce drug availability by the pursuit and seizure of drugs.

The 10-year strategy represents a shift from a reactive to a preventative strategy and involves new, shared objectives across Government. All Departments with responsibility for such matters will effectively co-ordinate their response to the menace of drugs. Until recently, the strategy had had the full support of all political parties, but I am not sure whether the Conservative party still supports it. I hope that it does, because it is absolutely shameful when we are fighting a war against drugs, drug criminals and the effects of their activities that a major political party is not on side or all square with the strategy—a non-partisan, non-political approach to one of the most difficult issues facing the country.

Mr. Chope: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McCartney: No. The hon. Gentleman spoke for about 20 minutes.

An extra £217 million has been pledged for action against drugs. That money is delivering new treatment services, supporting schemes to reduce drug-related offending and helping education and prevention work—an issue raised by the hon. Gentlemen. Some £6 million has been committed to research so that we adopt effective policies and find solutions. Drug action teams and drug treatment and testing pilot schemes have begun, and we are working with business. The Government have put in place a range of effective measures.

The Government want to work with every hon. Member to ensure that our 10-year strategy is effective. For every part of the strategy that is successful, a young person will not die, a young person will not be injured, or a young person's family will be able to see a child grow up and realise his or her dreams. When someone is lost, the hole can never be filled, and to lose someone because of drugs makes that hole deeper, wider and blacker. We politicians can debate such matters, score points and say, "We are stronger on drugs than you were", but the truth is that none of us has got the answer right. If we had, 3,000 young people in Britain would not die every year and we would not have inherited from the previous government a lack of strategy, and drugs and drug dealers out of control, communities across Britain living in fear of drug-related crime and a generation of young people being affected by drug abuse.

We have a long way to go. Drug addicts are human beings with a recurrent chronic illness and strategies are therefore difficult to implement, but the Government and all those involved in the strategy are absolutely committed to succeeding because when we do we shall have saved the lives of many young people. I just wish my son's could be one of them.

Mr. Chope: As there are six minutes remaining—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot make another speech but he can intervene.

Mr. Chope: I hoped that the Minister would accept an intervention that I sought to make earlier.

Mr. McCartney: Will the hon. Gentleman make his intervention?

Mr. Chope: It relates to what the Minister said about the previous Government not having a strategy. Does not the Government's own document state:

"The last Government's strategy for England, "Tackling Drugs Together" was an important step in the right direction. It has been implemented with some success. For the first time, Drug Action Teams set up partnerships to tackle the problem. We will build on that valuable work."?

Does not that quote from his own Government's new strategy document bear out that the Minister was slightly over the top in what he said about the previous Government?

Mr. McCartney: I am not over the top, for the following reason. Individual actions were indeed taken but there was no comprehensive UK-wide strategy. I will give a classic example of that. The Home Office was presided over by a Home Secretary who would do nothing about the industry, which operated protection rackets and had the most effective sales and distribution supply chain in Europe. After 10 years, that led to every club, pub or any other place to which a young person in Britain would go being utilised by these organisations for the distribution of all sorts of drugs, including ecstacy. The previous Government did nothing about it because they favoured deregulation instead of concentrating on crime prevention. Consequently, Britain now has an industry and a supply chain that are pumping out drugs worth millions of pounds designed for one simple reason—to attract our young people, make them addicts and commit them to a life of of drug-related criminal activity which, for so many of them, ends in the loss of their life. The Conservative Government had 10 years to do something about it, but they did nothing, even though people were crying out for help. The Tories did nothing because they took a partisan view of what was happening out there. My Government do not do that. For the first time a comprehensive plan is in place. I beg Opposition Members to get behind the plan because when it succeeds it will stop the carnage of 3,000 young people dying each year in Britain.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way again. Drug action teams involve local police, probation services, social workers and all Departments of Government. Can the Minister explain how Cleveland constabulary, which forms an important part of the Cleveland drug action team, is able to publicise its wish to see cannabis decriminalised?

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman has moved his ground again. I cannot stop individuals giving their views about cannabis. Drug action teams take a co-ordinated approach, working with every organisation in the community to deal not only with offending but to stop young people offending and to take them into rehabilitation and treatment. That is the important aspect of the new proposals. For the first time, people are being diverted into treatment and rehabilitation, not only in prison but out in the community. If we do not do this, young people will become abusers of drugs and there will be no way back for them from a criminal life style and—equally important—towards a healthy life style. The drug action teams offer a fundamental improvement on what went before. The hon. Gentleman should not confuse the comments of individuals, with which I disagree fundamentally, with the Government's policy. The hon. Gentleman has heard what I and the Government have had to say. Those comments do not alter the requirement on all of us to ensure that there is an co-ordinated, effective plan through which we work in the community with young people to prevent their becoming involved in drug abuse and, where they have abused drugs, to put treatment and other systems in place to assist them in ending the abuse and to deal with some of the criminal activity that arises in the community from their abuse of drugs. If we can achieve that, surely even the hon. Member for Christchurch must agree that it is a fundamental step forward and an improvement on what we inherited two and a half short years ago.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Five o'clock.

CABINET OFFICE

Heroin Addiction

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what support the Government gives to the work of the East-West Detox organisation in combating heroin addiction; and if she will make a statement. [108586]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The commissioning of services for drug misusers is essentially a matter for local agencies. The East-West Detox organisation receives no financial support from the Berkshire Health Authority. Health authorities and local authorities will receive an extra £70.5 million from 1999 to 2002 to commission and develop drug treatment services. The Government believe that a range of treatments should be available to allow drug misusers to benefit from those most appropriate to their needs and abstinence should be the primary aim of treatment.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

International Criminal Tribunals

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was his Department's financial contribution to (a) the International Criminal Tribunal on Yugoslavia and (b) the International Criminal Tribunal on Rwanda, in each year since these bodies were established. [107424]

Mr. Vaz: The International Criminal Tribunals for Rwanda (ICTR) and the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) are funded by a combination of assessed contributions by UN member states and voluntary contributions. UK contributions are as follows:

ICTY

Japan (Radioactive Materials)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning the sea shipment of plutonium MOX fuels and radioactive wastes from the United Kingdom to Japan from countries on the shipment route. [108693]

Mr. Hain: To date, we have received representations from the Governments of New Zealand, the Republic of Korea and the Commonwealth Caribbean countries, as well as the Fijian-based Pacific Concerns Resources Centre Inc.

Indonesia

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he held with the President of Indonesia during his visit to London about the loss of Indonesia's forest resource; and if he will make a statement. [108152]

Mr. Battle: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development discussed the question of illegal logging with President Wahid during his recent visit to the UK.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings Her Majesty's Government (a) hosted and (b) arranged for Indonesia's Forestry Minister during his recent visit to London. [108153]

Mr. Battle: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development called on President Wahid during his recent visit to the UK. The Indonesian Minister for Forestry and Plantation was present at the call.

PRIME MINISTER

Staff Bonuses

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister how much his Office spent in total on extra bonuses above usual payments for staff working over the new year period; what were the (a) maximum and (b) minimum bonuses paid; how many people received the (i) maximum and (ii) minimum payment; and if he will make a statement. [104475]

The Prime Minister: The Cabinet Office, which for the purpose of this answer includes No.10, and the Government Millennium Centre have paid 53 millennium bonuses and will pay 26 special bonuses at a cost of £20,750.

	Millennium bonus	Special bonus
Maximum	£150	£750
Received by	19 staff	8 staff
Minimum	£100	£250
Received by	34 staff	1 staff

Millennium bonuses were paid to staff working for a minimum of six hours between 9 pm Friday 31 December and 9 am Saturday 1 January 2000.

Special bonuses have been awarded to staff in recognition of the exceptional contribution they made throughout the preceding two years ensuring that any possible detrimental effects of the date change were identified and resolved before 1 January 2000.

Asset Sales

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the items in the National Assets Register sold by his Office, its agencies and associated public bodies since 22 February 1999, stating in each case the amount of money realised; if he will estimate the total amount raised from such sales to date; and if he will make a statement. [104680]

The Prime Minister: For the purpose of this question, this answer includes my Office and the Cabinet Office and its agencies.

IT equipment, and vehicles in the fleet of the Government Car and Despatch Agency, are routinely replaced at the end of their useful life. The old equipment and vehicles are sold where it is appropriate and economic to do so.

In addition to these replacement programmes, the Cabinet Office has sold a surplus property, Alencon Link in Basingstoke, for £1.3 million. A payment of £1.25 million has also been received, representing deferred sale proceeds following the privatisation of Chessington Computer Centre.

Internal Histories

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister for what reason it is established practice not to disclose the titles of internal histories which are planned or in progress. [106161]

The Prime Minister: Decisions about the publication of information about internal Departmental histories are a matter for the Department concerned. It is not uncommon for such histories, or for projects in the Official Histories programme, to contain classified information or for their subject-matter to evolve as work proceeds. Publication of the studies and information about them is therefore better decided when studies are completed and can be assessed.

Cabinet Committees

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions each Cabinet Committee has met in the past year. [107829]

The Prime Minister: It is established practice under section 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information not to disclose information relating to proceedings of Cabinet Committees.

Privy Council (Judicial Committee)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 1 February 2000, Official Report, column 545W, what assessment he has made of the compatibility between the United Kingdom's obligations to the Council of Europe and under other international undertakings and the United Kingdom Privy Council presiding over appeals in cases where the death sentence has been imposed following conviction in the High Court of an independent Commonwealth jurisdiction; and if he will make a statement. [108672]

The Prime Minister: In the cases mentioned by my hon. Friend, the Privy Council is acting as part of the judicial structure of the independent state concerned, and not of the United Kingdom. There is no incompatibility with any of the United Kingdom's international obligations including those under Council of Europe instruments. Nevertheless, as I have made clear, the Government actively oppose the use of the death penalty by all states, including those from whose courts there is a right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 1 February 2000, Official Report, columns 544–45W, on the Privy Council, if the Queen appoints any judges or members of the United Kingdom's Privy Council on the recommendation of her Ministers from countries other than the United Kingdom. [108675]

The Prime Minister: Yes. It is, of course, not the United Kingdom Privy Council as such. Membership is also accorded to eminent people in some independent countries of the Commonwealth, of which Her Majesty is Queen.

Baroness Thatcher

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions he has met Baroness Thatcher for discussions in the course of his official duties since 1 May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [108580]

The Prime Minister: I have meetings with a wide range of individuals and organisations.

Oath of Allegiance

Mr. Field: To ask the Prime Minister how many letters he has received since 1 May 1997 on (a) constituency matters and (b) other matters of Government policy from each of those Members of the House who have not taken the Oath of Allegiance. [108961]

The Prime Minister: In accordance with convention, correspondence received by Departments from hon. Members is treated in confidence.

Charter of Fundamental Rights

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 17 January 2000, Official Report, columns 267–68W, concerning the drafting of the draft Charter of Fundamental Rights in the European Union, if he will (a) place in the Library a copy of the letter he has sent to the two Chairmen of the Scrutiny Committees and (b) publish in the Official Report the names of organisations with which meetings have taken place, or correspondence has been conducted, and place copies of the correspondence in the Library. [108732]

The Prime Minister: A copy of the letters from the Minister of State for Europe in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) to the Scrutiny Committees have been deposited in the Libraries of both Houses. The Government will continue to have meetings with a wide range of individuals and organisations. These exchanges will be made public where appropriate.

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish the Government's response to (a) the proposals made by the Commission for the forthcoming intergovernmental conference and (b) documents submitted for that Conference by the European Union Institutions, member states and candidate states. [108734]

The Prime Minister: The Government's position on all the issues likely to be raised at the intergovernmental conference will be set out in a White Paper to be published shortly.

EU Defence

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answers of 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 538W, and 1 February 2000, Official Report, column 544W, if he will place a synopsis of Mr. Liddle's speech in the Library. [108817]

The Prime Minister: No.

World Economic Forum

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total cost to public funds of his attendance at the World Economic Forum at Davos. [108228]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 4 February 2000]: Not all bills have been received. However, the total cost to public funds of my attendance at the World Economic Forum is likely to be approximately £9,900.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list which Ministers of the Governments of (a) Austria, (b) Belgium, (c) Denmark, (d) Finland, (e) France, (f) Germany, (g) Greece, (h) Ireland, (i) Italy, (j) Luxembourg, (k) the Netherlands, (l) Portugal, (m) Spain and (n) Sweden he has met since 1 August 1999 and the date on which he met them. [108867]

The Prime Minister: I have met all EU Heads of State and some Ministers in multilateral fora since August. I have also held official discussions with the Prime Minister of Belgium on 30 November, the Prime Minister of Finland on 6 October and 30 November, the Greek Minister for Development on 13 December, the Prime Minister of Italy on 20 November and the Prime Minister of Portugal on 29 November and 6 January. I also met the French President, Prime Minister, Foreign Minister and Minister for Europe at the UK/French Summit on 25 November. There have been numerous meetings with the Taoiseach of Ireland in multilateral and bilateral fora. Most recently I had substantive discussions with him on 17 December and 3 February.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Sellafield MOX Plant

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the status of Japanese contracts with the new Sellafield MOX plant. [106713]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 2 February 2000]: Details of BNFL's contracts with their customers for the Sellafield MOX Plant are commercially confidential. BNFL will continue to pursue Mixed Oxide (MOX) fuel business in Japan, where the company is making major efforts to rebuild confidence.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if export credit for vessels designed for protection of a nation's maritime boundaries is treated by the Export Credits Guarantee Department as unproductive expenditure within the meaning used to define those credits which the Department refuses to guarantee. [108480]

Mr. Caborn: As the hon. Member knows, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced on 11 January a unilateral UK ban on export credits in respect of "unproductive expenditure" to 63 of the world's poorest countries.

Projects supported in future on these countries should be measured against the following indicative criteria:

assist social and economic development; or be of maximum benefit to areas most affected by poverty; or tackle problem areas where private investment is not available; or wherever possible, earn foreign exchange; or encourage viable self-financing projects.

These principles need not necessarily preclude ECGD support for the sale of defence or dual purpose equipment provided that such equipment is, for example, deemed essential for national security, or required to combat the drugs trade, piracy, smuggling etc. Support for projects must be cleared with the Department for International Development, who must be satisfied that the expenditure is consistent with the above.

Electricity Regulation

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact on jobs in the electricity industry of the cap on electricity distribution prices by the regulator; and if he will make a statement. [108975]

Mrs. Liddell: Decisions on the form and level of electricity price controls are a matter for the Director General of Gas and Electricity Markets. It is for the companies to decide how to meet the efficiency targets they have been set.

Trade Development

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to encourage British trade development and promotion abroad. [108507]

Mr. Caborn: I want an ever-growing number of firms to benefit from British Trade International, the new unified operation, which brings together DTI and FCO responsibilities for trade development and promotion. Support for exporters is part of the Government's programme, with business, to improve Britain's competitiveness. The National Strategy for International Trade Development and Promotion, published on 29 October 1999, demonstrates the exciting direction in which the new organisation is moving.

Copies of the Strategy have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Paper Industry

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received from the paper industry about the consequences of the recent strength of the pound. [108230]

Mr. Alan Johnson: None.

Government clearly understand the concerns of businesses, particularly manufacturers in the paper industry and elsewhere trading within Europe, about the level of the pound. But we are determined to take a long-term view; it would be wrong to let short-term pressures lead back to policies which produced boom and bust in the past. Short-term fixes would be the biggest threat of all to industry, creating the illusion of temporary relief followed by the reality of long-term damage. The Government's economic policies are aimed at achieving sustained growth.

Utilities Bill

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to publish draft guidance under Clauses 9, 13 and 90 of the Utilities Bill. [109176]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government have today published preliminary drafts of the social and environmental guidance to the energy and telecoms regulators provided for under Clauses 9, 13 and 90 of the Utilities Bill. Copies of these drafts have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Oath of Allegiance

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many letters he has received since 1 May 1997 on (a) constituency matters and (b) other matters of Government policy from each of those Members of the House who have not taken the Oath of Allegiance. [108397]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 3 February 2000]: Correspondence with Members of the House is treated in confidence unless the originating Member chooses to make it public.

Coal

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of (a) the cost per ton and (b) the total cost of supply in coal to retired miners from the cheapest foreign source. [107949]

Mrs. Liddell: I have not made such an estimate because I do not expect retired miners to be supplied with imported coal.

Nuclear Accidents (Insurance)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the size of the insurance liability fund set aside to underwrite accidents at United Kingdom nuclear facilities; what authority manages the fund; and if any part of the fund is invested. [108681]

Mrs. Liddell: Under the Nuclear Installations Act 1965, the operators of nuclear facilities in the UK are required to hold third party liability insurance to cover up to £140 million of damage resulting from accidents in nuclear installations. In the event of a severe nuclear accident in the UK, supplementary compensation would be made available in addition to this under the Brussels Convention Supplementary to the Paris Convention, providing an amount of compensation totalling £300 million Special Drawing Rights of the IMF. We are currently considering substantial increases in the amount of compensation available under the Act.

Insurance arrangements must be approved by the Secretary of State; operators without a Government indemnity purchase insurance from private sector insurers.

Textile and Clothing Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to ensure fair competition between the United Kingdom's textile and clothing industry and that of competitor nations. [108661]

Mr. Alan Johnson: As with other industries, the Government seek to promote fair competition between the United Kingdom and other textile and clothing industries through a wide range of national, European Union and international action.

Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will ensure that the appointee to the Chair of the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission has had scientific training; [108090]

(2) why the position of Chair of the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission was re-advertised; [108089]

(3) when he will appoint the Chair of the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission. [108088]

Marjorie Mowlam: I have been asked to reply because the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission will report to me.

The position of Chair of the Commission was re-advertised in order that we may choose from a wider range of candidates. Scientific training is not a prerequisite, but the person we are looking for must be able to understand what scientists are saying and to explain it clearly and simply in public. The appointment will be made as soon as possible.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

UNIDROIT Convention

Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he has made a decision about whether the UK should become a signatory to the UNIDROIT convention on the international return of stolen or illegally exported cultural objects. [109245]

Mr. Chris Smith: After a lengthy inter-departmental consultation, I have concluded that the UK should not become a signatory to the UNIDROIT convention due to conflicts with our current law. In order to implement the convention, changes to our limitation periods and to our personal property law would be required, resulting in a special regime for cultural objects and arguably a less generous position for original rightful owners of objects which are later stolen. I will, however, be considering the possible options for an alternative legislative approach which would share some of the objectives of the UNIDROIT Convention.

West Yorkshire Theatres

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list, for each of the last five years, total public funding in (a) cash and (b) current prices for (i) the West Yorkshire Playhouse and (ii) regional theatres in West Yorkshire. [108211]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Grant-in-aid allocated by Yorkshire Arts to the West Yorkshire Playhouse, Wakefield Theatre Royal and Lawrence Batley Theatre is shown in the table.

Coaching (Children)

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the effect of the Child Protection Act 1999 on coaching within children's sport. [106116]

Kate Hoey: The main effect of the Child Protection Act 1999 on coaching has been to raise awareness of the issues that need to be addressed by sport in this area. Sport England has established the Child Protection in Sport Task Force involving the National Coaching Foundation (NCF), the National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children (NSPCC), the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO), the Local Government Association (LGA) and the Central Council for Physical Recreation (CCPR). The Task Force is working on a cross-sport action plan and met recently to discuss how best to take this forward.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to issue guidelines to the sports bodies responsible for coaching on best practice following enactment of the Child Protection Act 1999. [106115]

Kate Hoey: There is already a great deal of guidance available to sports bodies and coaches in this area. The National Coaching Foundation (NCF) have been working with the National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children (NSPCC) in looking at guidelines since 1996. NCF Child Protection resources include the following:

Protecting Children (1998)

Protecting Disabled Children and Adults (1999)—Disability Sport England)

Code of Ethics and Conduct for Sports Coaches

Guidelines in Child Protection Policy and Implementation "Safe and Sound" leaflet (1999)

As well as publications and resources targeted specifically at coaches, the NCF also offers consultancy, workshops for coaches, officials and volunteers in sport.

The Child Protection in Sport Task Force established by Sport England will also be producing cross-sport action plan on child protection and sport.

TV Licensing (Five-year Formula)

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if the statement in paragraph 5 of his Memorandum, Cm 4258, dated February 1999, that the review will not reconsider the current five-year formula for the level of the income fee until 2002, remains the policy of Her Majesty's Government. [108453]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 4 February 2000]: Although the formula was not included in the terms of reference, the independent review panel, chaired by Gavyn Davies, did consider the possibility of reopening the five-year formula and, in reaching our decisions, we are taking account of the panel's views on this.

Lottery Funds

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to which existing lottery funds and which planned lottery programmes an application should be made for funding for dedicated premises for a pre-school group. [108448]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 4 February 2000]: An application for funding for dedicated premises for a pre-school group can be considered by the National Lottery Charities Board, provided the group is a charitable, philanthropic or benevolent body. The project may also be eligible for funding from other Lottery distributors, depending on its nature.

School Sports

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the DfEE about using national sporting standards of achievements to develop school sport. [107968]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 3 February 2000]: My Department has regular discussions with the Department for Education and Employment (DfEE) about a whole range of issues including the Sportsmark and Activemark recognition awards for secondary and primary schools.

The recent appointment of Sue Campbell on secondment from the Youth Sport Trust will help to strengthen these links and build good practice between DCMS and DfEE on a number of issues relating to sport and physical education, including national sporting standards of achievement.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Driving Accidents

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many reportable injuries there were in 1998–99 as a result of driving accidents caused while at work. [107659]

Mr. Hill: Data specifically referring to "drivers at work" are not currently reported as part of the national injury road accidents survey. However, data on heavy goods vehicles and buses and coaches are recorded and the driver casualty data are shown in the table.

HGV and bus/coach driver casualties[1] by severity: GB 1998

Severity	Buses	Lorries
Fatal	1	52
Serious	68	430
Slight	838	2,462
All	907	2,944

[1] Not necessarily incurred "at work"

Driving Licences

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 27 January 2000, Official Report, column 278W, on driving licences, (a) when the more flexible arrangement to assist driving licence applicants will be announced and (b) how the arrangement will be publicised to applicants. [108069]

Mr. Hill: The new arrangements are still under consideration. I hope to be able to provide further details very shortly. Officials will discuss the appropriate publicity arrangements with the Immigration and Nationality Directorate once agreement has been reached on the way forward.

Rail Freight and HGV Movements

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what change there has been in (a) rail freight usage and (b) heavy goods vehicle movements since 1 May 1997. [107863]

Mr. Hill: The changes in tonnes moved (billion tonne-kilometres) in Great Britain are as given in the table:

	Rail	HGVs[1]
Q2 1997	4.1	39.0
Q3 1999[2]	4.5	37.2
Percentage change	+9	-5

[1] GB registered vehicles over 3.5 tonnes gross vehicle weight
[2] Provisional figures

Monthly figures are not available. The question has therefore been answered by taking the second quarter of 1997 as a base for the comparison.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he has taken to ensure that modifications to Directive 90/220 (Deliberate Release of Genetically Modified Organisms) do not suppress technological developments in developing countries. [108092]

Mr. Meacher: The purpose of Directive 90/220/EEC is to protect human health and the environment against any adverse effects which might arise from the deliberate release or placing on the market of genetically modified organisms.

The Common Position on the revision of the Directive agreed by the Council on 9 December 1999 continues to reflect this purpose while increasing the efficiency and transparency of the decision making process under the Directive. It does not affect the operation of the Directive with regard to the technological developments in developing countries.

However, such countries which are without domestic legislation relating to the import of genetically modified organisms will in the future be able to decide, on the basis of a specific risk assessment, whether to accept the import of genetically modified organisms. Provisions to do this are included in the United Nations Environment Programme Biosafety Protocol to the Convention on Biological Diversity, adopted on 29 January.

Quiet Lanes

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many proposals for non-statutory quiet lanes have been included in provisional Local Transport Plans. [108208]

Mr. Hill: Authorities were encouraged to identify broad programmes rather than specific schemes in their Local Transport Plans. Accordingly, authorities looking to establish quiet lanes would not necessarily refer to specific proposals in their plans and our assessment has not attempted to identify the number of such proposals across the country.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many non-statutory quiet lanes had been introduced by 1 December in England. [108316]

Mr. Hill: This information is not held centrally. The quiet roads concept, being promoted by the Countryside Agency, is supported by my Department. Pilot quiet roads schemes in Norfolk and Kent are under consideration and are due to be implemented over the next few months, with one in Devon later on this year. My Department is assisting in the pre-implementation, monitoring surveys, currently being undertaken in Norfolk and Kent.

Vulnerable Road Users

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent surveys the Government have undertaken concerning intimidation of walkers, cyclists and horse-riders by fast-moving traffic. [108207]

Mr. Hill: The Government commission a wide range of research into traffic speed and road safety. Some of the studies include surveys of road users on the problems they experience, including seeking their views about fast moving traffic. As part of the monitoring of the Quiet Lanes project promoted by the Countryside Agency, my Department has commissioned the Transport Research Laboratory to conduct telephone and roadside surveys of equestrians, pedestrians and cyclists. One of the questions to be asked is how much they are bothered by fast moving traffic. The surveys are due to take place in the Norfolk Quiet Lane area at the end of February and in the Kent Quiet Lane area in March.

Local Government

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance has been given to district auditors about requiring local authorities to make preparations for (a) new local government structures and (b) the euro. [108282]

Ms Armstrong: The Audit Commission provides auditors it has appointed with a wide range of guidance about the implications, for their audit, of changes which affect local authorities. Such changes include local authority preparations for new local government structures and the euro.

Connex Rail Strike

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what estimate he has made of the number of commuters who were affected by the Connex rail strike on Tuesday 25 January; [108369]

(2) how many of the Connex trains that ran on Tuesday 25 January were delayed; [108368]

(3) how many Connex train services were cancelled on Tuesday 25 January; and how many Connex trains ran on that day. [108381]

Mr. Hill: On a normal weekday Connex run approximately 3,500 trains. On 25 January they planned to run 449 trains under an emergency timetable, but actually ran 697. Due to the way in which the emergency timetable was devised it is not possible to state how many of the trains which ran were delayed. Most of the 200,000 commuters who use Connex services were affected to a greater or lesser extent.

Rail Passenger Partnership Scheme

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Franchising Director will announce the successful bid under the Rail Passenger Partnership Scheme. [108777]

Mr. Hill: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 24 January 2000, Official Report, columns, 132–33W.

British Railways Board

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the criteria by which the British Railways Board decides on the sale of land. [108465]

Mr. Hill: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave on 17 January 2000, Official Report, column 253W.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the assets for which the British Railways Board has responsibility. [108467]

Mr. Hill: Following privatisation of the railways, the British Railways Board remains responsible primarily for the British Transport Police, residual property and certain residual liabilities.

At 31 March 1999 tangible assets on the balance sheet totalled £32.0 million comprising buildings (£25.0 million), plant and equipment (£6.7 million) and investments (£0.3 million). Non-operational property totalling £103.6 million was held in current assets.

In addition, the Board remains responsible for some 5,000 isolated engineering structures such as bridges, viaducts and tunnels.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the contacts which his Department had with the British Railways Board over the last 12 months; and what was the content of each contact. [108466]

Mr. Hill: Ministers and officials in my Department have had numerous contacts with the British Railways Board (BRB) and the shadow Strategic Rail Authority (SSRA) (of which the BRB now forms part) covering a range of issues including advice to Ministers.

Parish and Town Councils

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what applications for areas to become a parish or town council are outstanding. [108395]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The table shows the principal local authorities that have submitted recommendations to the Secretary of State for new parishes, either as a result of a review of parish arrangements in their area, or following receipt of a petition for a new parish, which are outstanding.

Swindon and Wiltshire Structure Plan

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to ensure that no parties to the examination in public of amendments to the Swindon and Wiltshire structure plan exert undue influence on the proceedings. [108154]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The panel of the examination in public which was held last year was appointed by the Secretary of State and is independent of any parties interested in the plan. Examinations in public are carried out in accordance with well-known procedures in a strictly impartial and open manner.

It is the responsibility of the relevant local authorities to ensure that the process of preparing structure plans is carried out fairly and is consistent with national Planning Policy Guidance.

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received regarding the extent of influence by developers on the examination in public of the amendments to the Swindon and Wiltshire structure plan. [108155]

Ms Beverley Hughes: None.

Local Bypasses

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will respond to the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire's request for a meeting with the Minister for Transport to discuss the criteria used by his Department to assess bids for local bypasses. [109007]

Mr. Hill: I replied to the hon. Member on 4 February.

National Bus Pensions

Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the distribution of the National Bus Company Pension Fund settlement. [109056]

Mr. Hill: The Government reached a settlement with the Trustees of the NBC Pension Fund in July last year. Responsibility for deciding on, and implementing, the distribution of the settlement now rests entirely with the NBC pension trustees who are independent of the Government. However, I have written to the Trustees to express my deep concern about the time it is taking to resolve this issue. I understand that the Trustees intend to make initial payments to some 8,000 older pensioners in March and April. They are urgently investigating the feasibility of making an initial payment to other pensioners as soon as possible.

Departmental Expenditure Limit

Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to amend his Departmental Expenditure Limits and running costs limits for 1999–2000. [109270]

Mr. Prescott: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates for Class III, Votes 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10 and 11, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions' Departmental Expenditure Limits for 1999–2000 will change as follows. All references to the take-up of end-year flexibility refer to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury's announcement of 27 July 1999, Official Report, column 393W.

(a) The DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit will be increased by £168,685,000 from £10,235,305,000 to £10,403,990,000. This increase reflects the net impact of a take-up of end-year flexibility of £66,168,000; net transfers into the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit of £27,517,000 and a call on the DEL Reserve of £75,000,000. The changes are set out in greater detail below.

(i) The changes for Class III, Vote 1 are as follows: £304,000 will be transferred to the Housing Corporation from Class XII, Vote 3 (Department of Social Security, administration) for homelessness administration costs previously carried by that department's Resettlement Unit; and the take-up of end-year flexibility of £689,000 for support to local authorities for Estate Renewal Challenge Fund projects. Transfers will be made of £1,500,000 to Class IV, Vote 1 (Home Office administration, police, probation, immigration and other services, England and Wales) for Youth Inclusion Programme spending by the Youth Justice Board; £155,000 to Class II, Vote 1 (Department of Health, Hospital, community health, family and related services, England) for health authority costs incurred in respect of the Rough Sleepers Unit Victoria pilot project; and £2,000,000 to Class III, Vote 4 (Local government, England) for Audit Commission 'Best Value in Housing' inspection work. There will also be inter-vote transfers of £4,504,000 to Class III, Vote 7 (Other executive agencies) for The Rent Service Executive Agency; £750,000 to Class III, Vote 5 (Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions: administration) out of departmental running costs held on this vote; and transfers from the non-voted element of the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit of £1,000,000 for capital projects by the Housing Corporation and £300,000 for grant in aid to Regional Development Agencies in respect of Derelict Land Grant.

(ii) The changes for Class III, Vote 2 are as follows: a transfer of £113,000 to Class XIV, Vote 1 (Welsh Office, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales and payments to the National Assembly for Wales) for a travel awareness campaign; an increase of £1,830,000 in respect of the re-classification as expenditure within the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit of Licence fee refunds to goods vehicle and public service vehicle operators and drivers; and a net increase of £1,000 for revised forecasts of expenditure and receipts associated with the Statistics, censuses and surveys programme. There will also be an inter-vote transfer of £500,000 to Class III, Vote 6 (Transport industries) for the start-up costs of London minicab licensing.

(iii) The changes for Class III Vote 3 are as follows: the take-up of end-year flexibility of £2,441,000 for the Energy Saving Trust's work on the Powershift Project (£300,000); for costs incurred on sustainable goods and services initiatives following the wind-up of the UK Ecolabelling Board (£118,000); to meet additional obligations under international environmental treaties (£333,000); for grant in aid payments to British Waterways (£340,000); for the Home Energy Efficiency Scheme (£1,350,000); a transfer of £335,000 to Class XIII, Vote 1 (Scotland and transfers to the Scottish Consolidated Fund) and of £150,000 to Class XIV, Vote 1 (Welsh Office, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales and payments to the National Assembly for Wales) for environmental publicity work. In addition there are increases of grant in aid to the Environment Agency of £2,303,000 funded by a transfer from the non-Voted element of DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit; and a transfer of £1,655,000 from the non-Voted element of DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit and a transfer from the DETR Departmental Unallocated Provision of £900,000 for the Home Energy Efficiency Scheme.

(iv) The changes for Class III, Vote 5 are as follows: take-up of £1,000,000 gross running cost and £3,500,000 other current provision from end-year flexibility entitlement for the Health and Safety Commission grant in aid; a transfer to Class XI, Vote 1 (Department for Culture, Media and Sport: programme expenditure and administration) of £592,000 gross running cost provision for the management and maintenance costs of Marlborough House; a transfer to Class XIV, Vote 1 (Welsh Office, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales and payments to the National Assembly for Wales) of £50,000 gross running cost provision in respect of publicity costs for energy conservation; a transfer to Class II, Vote 2 (Department of Health administration, miscellaneous health and personal social services, England) of £60,000 gross running cost provision towards the cost of the Teenage Pregnancy Unit; a transfer to Class X, Vote 2 (Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food) of £107,000 for minor occupier costs; and a transfer to Class III, Vote 4 (Local government, England) on the DETR Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit of provision from gross running costs of £100,000 and other current of £350,000 for mapping costs. There will also be inter-vote transfers within the DETR gross running cost limit of provision from Class III, Vote 1 (Housing, construction, regeneration, regional policy, and countryside and wildlife, England) of £750,000, Class III, Vote 7 (Other executive agencies) of £8,500,000, and from Class III, Vote 8 (Highways Agency) of £3,500,000; and a transfer to the Maritime and Coastguard Agency on Class III, Vote 7 (Other executive agencies) of £44,000 gross running cost provision towards the salary and travel costs of an agency employee. Gross running cost provision and appropriations in aid provision have also both been increased; by £3,250,000 for increased expenditure and the subsequent recovery of VAT on contracted out services; and by £700,000 for the rent and other associated costs paid by the Greater London Authority Implementation Team in respect of Romney House.

(v) The changes for Class III, Vote 6 are as follows: an agreed claim on the Reserve of £75,000,000 for London Transport; a transfer of £35,000,000 from Class XIII, Vote 1 (Scotland and transfers to the Scottish Consolidated Fund) in respect of Bus Fuel Duty rebates; a transfer of £6,000,000 from the non-Voted element of the DETR Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit in respect of the Docklands Light Railway; a transfer of £2,600,000 to the Office of the Rail Regulator Departmental Expenditure Limit (Class III, Vote 11); and the take-up of £17,600,000 end-year flexibility by Docklands Light Railway (£12,000,000), Civil Aviation Services (£3,000,000) and London Transport (£2,600,000). There will also be inter-vote transfers of: £500,000 from Class III, Vote 2 (Planning, roads, local transport and vehicle safety) in respect of Minicab licensing start-up costs; £59,000 to Class III, Vote 7 (Other executive agencies). In addition to these changes Voted DEL provision for London Transport and British Rail will increase by £1,050,000 and £19,600,000 respectively, offset by equivalent decreases in the non-Voted DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit associated with Vote 6.

(vi) The changes to Class III, Vote 7 are as follows: a transfer of £93,000 from Class X, Vote 2 (Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food); to the Maritime and Coastguard Agency for engine testing on fishing vessels and the take-up of end-year flexibility of £10,061,000 for: the Maritime and Coastguard Agency for stationing an additional emergency towing vessel in the Fair Isle (£561,000); to offset a shortfall arising as a consequence of the revaluation of the Queen Elizabeth II Conference Centre Trading Fund Executive Agency (£8,500,000); a loan to the Vehicle Inspectorate to enable them to cover investment costs arising from revised rules relating to single vehicle approvals (£1,000,000); There will also be inter-vote transfers of: £44,000 from Class III, Vote 5 (Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions: administration) to the Maritime and Coastguard Agency to cover half of the salary and travel costs of a shared employee who works primarily at the International Maritime Organisation; £59,000 from Class III, Vote 6 (Transport industries) to the Maritime and Coastguard Agency to cover expenditure for Formal Safety Assessment for Bulk Carriers; £4,504,000 from Class III, Vote 1 (Housing, construction, regeneration, regional policy, and countryside and wildlife, England) to the Rent Service Executive Agency for the development of new IT systems; £8,500,000 gross running cost provision to Class III, Vote 5 (Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions: administration); and £1,500,000 from the DETR Departmental Unallocated Provision to the Planning Inspectorate to cover a receipts shortfall.

(vii) The change for Class III, Vote 8 is a reduction of £3,500,000 to reflect a transfer of running costs provision to Class III, Vote 5 (Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions: administration).

(viii) The change for Class III Vote 9 is the take-up of £14,520,000 end-year flexibility to cover the cost of introducing Graduated VED.

(ix) The change for Class III, Vote 10 is a token increase of £1,000 to allow an increase in gross expenditure, to be offset by the Appropriation in Aid of additional receipts, to reflect the performance of the Train Operating Companies.

(x) As a consequence of the changes to Class III, Votes 1,5,7,8 and 9 the DETR gross running cost limit has been increased by £21,874,000 from £649,195,000 to £671,069,000. These changes total; £750,000 reduction for Rent Assessment Panels (Class III, Vote 1): £9,969,000 increase for Central Administration, £1,209,000 increase for Government Offices in the Regions and £726.000 increase for PSA Services (all Class III, Vote 5); £353,000 increase for the Marine Coastguard Executive Agency, £250,000 reduction for the Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency and £8,500,000 reduction for the Queen Elizabeth II Conference Centre (all Class III, Vote 7); £3,500,000 reduction for the Highways Executive Agency (Class III, Vote 8); and £22,617,000 increase for the Driver Vehicle Licensing Executive Agency (Class III, Vote 9). The Health and Safety Executive gross running cost limit has been increased by £1,000,000 from £169,898,000 to £170,898,000.

(xi) Provision within the non-Voted element of the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit will be decreased by £19,551,000 from £1,716,805,000 to £1,697,254,000. This reflects a transfer of: £1,300,000 to Class III, Vote 1 (Housing, construction, regeneration, regional policy, and countryside and wildlife, England) for capital projects by the Housing Corporation and grant in aid to Regional Development Agencies; £3,958,000 to Class III Vote 3 (Environmental protection and water) for the Home Energy Efficiency Scheme and grant in aid to the Environment Agency; £20,650,000 to Class III, Vote 6 (Transport industries) for London Transport and British Rail. It also includes transfers from the DETR Departmental Unallocated Provision of £900,000 to Class III, Vote 3 (Environmental protection and water) for the Home Energy Efficiency Scheme; £1,500,000 to Class III, Vote 7 (Other executive agencies) for the Planning Inspectorate; and £7,600,000 to Class III Vote 4 (Local government, England) on the DETR Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit for preparation costs of the Greater London Authority and associated bodies. Non-voted provision will be increased by the take-up of end-year flexibility of £15,848,000 for National Air Traffic Services and £509,000 for the Civil Aviation Authority to fund capital investment.

The net increase in the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit will be offset by transfers to the DETR Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit, Office of the Rail Regulator Departmental Expenditure Limit, Home Office Departmental Expenditure Limit, Department of Health Departmental Expenditure Limit, Wales Departmental Expenditure Limit, Scotland Departmental Expenditure Limit, Department of Culture, Media and Sport Departmental Expenditure Limit; from the DETR Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit, Scotland Departmental Expenditure Limit and Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food Departmental Expenditure; and by a charge on the DEL Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

(b) The DETR Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit will be increased by £7,170,000 from £34,211,567,000 to £34,218,737,000. This increase is the net effect of a take-up of end-year flexibility of £3,120,000, transfers from the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit of £10,050,000, and a transfer of £6,000,000 to the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit. The changes are set out in greater detail below.

(i) The changes for Class III, Vote 4 are as follows: transfers of £2,000,000 from Class III, Vote 1 (Housing, construction, regeneration, regional policy, and countryside and wildlife, England) for Audit Commission 'Best Value in Housing' inspection work and £450,000 from Class III, Vote 5 (Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions: administration) for mapping costs arising from periodic electoral reviews by the Local Government Commission; a transfer of £7,600,000 from the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit Departmental Unallocated Provision for preparation costs of the Greater London Authority and associated bodies, including publicity; and a transfer of £7,800,000 to a new non-Voted programme, within the Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit, for returning officers' expenses in the London elections of May 2000.

(ii) Provision within the non-Voted element of the Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit will be increased by £4,920,000 from £366,986,000 to £371,906,000. This reflects a take-up of end-year flexibility of £3,120,000 for the Local Authority Capital Challenge programme; a transfer of £7,800,000 from Class III, Vote 4 for returning officers' expenses in the London elections of May 2000; and a transfer of £6,000,000 to the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit for the Docklands Light Railway.

The net increase in the DETR Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit will be offset by transfers from the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit and by a charge on the DEL Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

(c) The Office of the Rail Regulator Departmental Expenditure Limit will increase by £2,634,000 from £1,134,000 to £3,768,000. This increase for Class III, Vote 11 will be partly effected by the take-up of £34,000 of end-year flexibility. The remainder of the increase is the result of a transfer of £2,600,000 from Class III, Vote 6 (Transport industries) on the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit. The running cost limit for ORR will be increased by £2,208,000 from £10,033,000 to £12,241,000.

The increase in the Office of the Rail Regulator Departmental Expenditure Limit will be offset by a transfer from the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit and a charge on the Departmental Expenditure Limit Reserve and will therefore not add to the planned total of public expenditure.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Operation Lancet

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Solicitor-General what action the Crown Prosecution Service has taken regarding files on Operation Lancet forwarded by the Cleveland Police to Treasury Counsel. [108768]

The Solicitor-General: A large number of files relating to serious allegations of police misconduct have been forwarded by Operation Lancet to the Crown Prosecution Service for review to decide whether or not any prosecutions should be brought. Treasury Counsel has been instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service to advise. The Crown Prosecution Service and Treasury Counsel have undertaken a considerable amount of work in respect of these files. Further work on this complex matter is necessary before any decisions can be taken.

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Solicitor-General when the Crown Prosecution Service will reach a decision on the files regarding Operation Lancet. [108806]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service has received a large number of files from Operation Lancet relating to many and complex serious allegations of police misconduct. Further files are expected. Decisions will be taken as soon as is properly possible. It is anticipated that decisions will begin to be taken during the course of the next two or three months.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Millennium Bug

Mr. Maclean: To ask the President of the Council if she will list the main recipients of Government expenditure on dealing with the millennium bug. [107508]

Mrs. Beckett: The main Government expenditure on dealing with the Millennium Bug was on departmental programmes to check, fix and test systems. Central Government Departments and agencies spent an estimated £380 million on tackling the Bug in their own systems. Detailed information about each department's programme expenditure is not held centrally.

Action 2000's budget to raise awareness and encourage action in the private sector and to ensure no material disruption across the national infrastructure forms the main expenditure on the Government's central programme. Action 2000 is a private company, set up by the Department of Trade and Industry in 1998, which receives grant from both the DTI and the Cabinet Office totalling approximately £58.4 million.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the President of the Council if she will list those principal individuals and organisations who gave her advice on the dangers of the millennium bug. [107494]

Mrs. Beckett: I have received information and advice on the risks posed by the millennium bug from a considerable number of individuals and organisations in both the public and private sectors and from the governments of other countries, as well as representations from a variety of pressure groups. The advice has been both written and oral and based largely on the direct experience within these organisations of problems they have themselves experienced. I have also, of course, had advice from the Public Accounts Committee and the National Audit Office on further action which should be pursued.

My principal advisers on this issue have been Dr. Iain Anderson, Don Cruickshank, Gywnneth Flower and Action 2000, the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency and the Year 2000 Team in the Cabinet Office.

EU Charter of Human Rights

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the President of the Council, pursuant to her answer of 8 December 1999 to my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble, (Mr. Borrow) Official Report, column 532W, on the European Union Charter of Human Rights, if she will state (a) by what means the delegates were appointed and what consultations were undertaken concerning the appointments, (b) by what means and to whom the delegates will report and (c) if draft papers containing proposals by the European Union to the delegates will be available to hon. Members prior to their consideration by the drafting body. [105125]

Mrs. Beckett: Delegates were appointed after appropriate consultations through the usual channels.

The Cologne and Tampere European Council Conclusions set out the procedures for drafting and delivering the Charter. The Charter Drafting Body will produce its draft report and seek endorsement from the European Council.

The Charter drafting process is designed to be transparent. The Charter website, which will contain the various working documents can be reached through hhtp://ue.eu.int.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EU Documents

Mr. Bercow: To ask the President of the Council how many EU documents have been considered by the European Legislation Committee and the European Scrutiny Committee in each year since 1 May 1997; and for how many hours those committees sat during that period. [108217]

Mrs. Beckett: The number of documents considered by the European Legislation and Scrutiny Committees are listed in the sessional returns for the relevant sessions: (1997–98) HC142, and (1998–99) HC1. Information on the length of sittings is not recorded.

Official Report

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, how many copies of the Official Report were printed during the 1998–99 session; at what (a) total and (b) unit cost; how many copies were sold; and what was the total revenue generated. [106976]

Mr. Kirkwood [holding answer 26 January 2000]: A total of 397,486 copies of the Official Report daily part, comprising 154 issues, were printed during the 1998–99 session at a total cost of £658,167. That provides a unit cost of about £1.65. Sales to Parliament were paid for by the two Houses under a bulk charge arrangement which, in addition to the cost of copies supplied, covered all aspects of the printing process. House of Commons subscribers accounted for 47,432 copies and 168,000 copies were supplied to the two Houses under the direct delivery arrangements for distribution to Members and other uses within the House. Sales to customers outside Parliament amounted to 182,054 copies, a substantial proportion of which were sold to public libraries, local authorities and educational authorities at discounts of up to 50 per cent. off the cover price of £5. Information about the total revenue generated is not available and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Staff

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, how many House of Commons Clerks are employed by the House of Commons Commission; and how many of those are of ethnic minority origin. [106980]

Mr. Kirkwood [holding answer 26 January 2000]: There are presently 73 clerks in the Department of the Clerk of the House. Of these approximately 85 per cent. have supplied information on their ethnic origin. Fewer than five of these are non-white.

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what is the current establishment of employees of the House of Commons Commission; and what percentage are of ethnic minority origin. [106979]

Mr. Kirkwood [holding answer 26 January 2000]: The Commission currently employs 1,421 members of staff. Of these 1,073 (just over 75 per cent.) have completed ethnic monitoring forms. The table shows the percentage who say they have an ethnic minority origin.

Ethnic minority origin	Number of staff on whom information about ethnic origin is held	Number of staff in group as percentage of those on whom information is held
White	960	89.5

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Global Free Trade

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to include in the next development White Paper the target of achieving global free trade by 2020. [109240]

Clare Short: We will be covering trade issues in the next Development White Paper. Trade is important for developing countries as a way of helping to generate the economic growth necessary for poverty eradication. The Government support the early launch of a comprehensive round of trade negotiations aimed at a substantive package to remove trade barriers and to promote growth in the world economy.

Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to her answer of 6 December 1999, Official Report, columns 337–38W, what restrictions were placed on contractors carrying out research projects funded by her Department in 1999 in respect of them discussing their findings with journalists (a) before and (b) after publication. [108198]

Clare Short: Our standard research contract makes no provision for veto over publication but does require contractors to obtain our agreement before communicating with the media. In 1999 no such requests were received by departments who commissioned research and therefore no requests were refused.

DEFENCE

Gulf War

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British civilians were (a) seconded and (b) contracted to Her Majesty's Forces in the war theatre during the Gulf War; if they came under military discipline; and what insurance arrangements were made on their behalf by Her Majesty's Government. [107284]

Mr. Spellar: Civilians, including foreign nationals, based in the UK and overseas, played a vital role in supporting British Forces during the 1990–91 Gulf conflict, but the precise number seconded (that is attached to British Forces) has not been determined. However, a review of Ministry of Defence (MOD) records shows that on 22 February 1991, 931 MOD civilian staff were reported as being in the Gulf theatre, but not all were working in direct support of British Forces. Of these, 785 were members of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary. In addition, there were a significant number of civilian contractors' employees working in direct support of British Forces in the Gulf theatre. My Department conservatively estimates that the number of civilian contractors' employees involved would have been in excess of 1,000 people.

All civilians (including contractors) serving with any part of British Forces who were on active service would have been subject to military discipline.

The MOD does not normally purchase insurance. In accordance with Treasury guidelines and in common with other Government Departments, the MOD underwrites its own financial risks and pays claims for compensation directly out of current expenditure. When compensation claims are submitted, they are considered on the basis of whether or not the MOD has a legal liability to pay compensation. Where there is a legal liability to pay compensation we do so. No insurance would have been purchased by the MOD covering British civilians seconded or contracted to British Forces during the Gulf conflict. This would be a matter for the employing organisations and the individuals themselves. The MOD would expect the cost of any insurance to be reflected in the contract price.

Northern Ireland

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) full-time and (b) part-time members of the armed forces were stationed in Northern Ireland on 31 January 1998, 31 January 1999 and 31 January 2000; and if he will make a statement. [108109]

Mr. Spellar: The number of members of the Armed Forces serving in Northern Ireland are set out in the table:

	Strength as at[1]
	31 January 1998	31 January 1999	31 December 1999[2]
Army (General Service)	9,840	9,063	8,697
Royal Air Force	1,152	1,150	1,133
Royal Navy	321	182	179
Royal Irish Regiment[3]	2,703	2,627	2,511
Royal Irish Regiment[4]	1,967	1,923	1,799
Total	15,983	14,945	14,319

[1] Excludes those forces fully committed to Northern Ireland but rear-based on the mainland

[2] Strengths given for December 1999 as the January 2000 figure is not yet available

[3] Home Service full-time

[4] Home Service part-time

RAF Pilots

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the NATO recommended minimum flying times for (a) rotary pilots, (b) multi-transport pilots and (c) fast jet pilots; what percentage of RAF pilots in each of these categories met or exceeded NATO recommendations in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [107545]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 2 February 2000]: The NATO recommended minimum flying times are in the table:

Pilots	Flying times (hours per year)
Rotary	Not defined
Multi engine	240
Fast jet (readiness 1—3)	180
Fast jet (readiness 4)	160

Information relating to the percentage of RAF pilots who met or exceeded NATO recommended hours is not held in the format requested and could only be provided at disproportionate cost. However, the average hours per crew in the fast jet (not defined by readiness states) multi-engine and rotary categories for each of the last five years are shown in the table, indicating in broad terms that the NATO minimum figures have been comfortably exceeded in each year.

Aircraft category	1995	1996	1997	1998	1999
Rotary	345	389	382	354	319
Multi engine	361	448	462	479	451
Fast jet	239	236	235	238	211

Army (Welfare Services)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he would (a) list the MoD funding received by the Army Welfare Service as separate from the Personal Welfare Service in each year between and including financial year 1996–97 and the current financial year, (b) provide an explanation of the remit and function of the AWS, (c) list the MoD funding received by the Personal Welfare Service as separate from the Army Welfare Service in each year between and including financial year 1996–97 and the current financial year, (d) provide an explanation of the remit and function of the PWS and (e) provide an explanation for the change in the combined AWS/PWS budget allocation and spend between financial year 1998–99 and 1999–00. [108094]

Mr. Spellar: Although the Army Welfare Service (AWS) has been operating since 1996, records of total expenditure have only been recorded since centralising funding was established on 1 April 1999. Expenditure for the AWS before 1999–2000 therefore could only be provided at disproportionate cost. A breakdown of funding between the AWS and the Personal Welfare Service (PWS) is provided for 1999–2000. Figures for 1996–97 to 1998–99 are for the PWS in Northern Ireland only.

Year/Organisation	Spend	Allocation
1996–97
PWS	87,165	88,000
1997–98
PWS	87,368	90,000
1998–99
PWS	88,002	90,000
1999–2000
AWS	5,941,000	6,528,000
PWS	[1]81,000	[1]99,000

[1] Spend to date

The AWS's mission is to provide a comprehensive, professionally based and confidential welfare support service responsive to the needs of individuals, the chain of command and statutory requirements, in order to maximise the operational effectiveness of service men and women.

The AWS provides support for soldiers and their families in recognition of the greater turbulence, and a lack of the wider family support resulting from military service. The AWS supports Commanding Officers by developing a long term static welfare infrastructure at garrison and station level through which units can move with the assurance of expert welfare assistance and advice that is complementary to, and integrated with, civil agencies whose help can be drawn upon when required.

MoD policy adopts and reflects UK national legislation for its Service community overseas. In the welfare area this means that the AWS, using the Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen and Families Association (SSAFA) Forces Help personnel, is given the same statutory responsibilities with regard to the protection of children as those of local authority social service departments. The AWS also uses other specialist agencies, such as RELATE and HomeStart, to provide specific assistance.

The PWS provides comparable services in Northern Ireland.

Imphal Barracks

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the annual cost of maintenance of The Keep at Imphal barracks, York; and what estimate he has made of the cost of renovation; [108665]

(2) what area of Portakabin office accommodation will be hired at Imphal barracks, York; for what reason; and at what cost; [108668]

(3) what (a) area and (b) proportion of custom-built office accommodation at Imphal barracks, York, will be used for document storage. [108669]

Mr. Spellar: The average annual cost of maintenance per year of The Keep at Imphal Barracks is some £600. In financial year 1998–99, however, exceptional work totalling £18,800 was carried out to repair the roof and re-point brickwork. There are no plans to renovate it.

There is no requirement to hire portakabins for use as office accommodation, as the existing office accommodation available within the Garrison is sufficient to meet our needs.

At present, there is no area of office accommodation at Imphal Barracks set aside for document storage. The relocation of the Defence Vetting Agency (DVA) to the Barracks in April 2000, however, will also involve the setting up of the DVA Library, estimated at 535 metres square, which will represent approximately 2.65 per cent. of the total office accommodation within the Barracks.

National Ignition Facility (US)

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement on the Government's policy of investing in the US National Ignition Facility; [107734]

(2) how much the Government (a) have invested and (b) are planning to invest in the US National Ignition Facility. [107735]

Mr. Hoon: The decision to invest in the US National Ignition Facility (NIF) was announced by my predecessor in June last year. The currently projected UK total investment is some £100 million over a period of 10 years. Of this, expenditure of some £11 million has been approved so far to fund measures aimed at increasing the laser shot rate, and initial feasibility work related to the second target chamber. Decisions on future UK investment will depend largely on the outcome of the feasibility study, which will also take into account the US Government's assessment of the status of the NIF project.

Credit Ratings

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how often the credit rating of companies supplying services to his Department is checked. [107752]

Dr. Moonie: During the period of a contract, the Department will only carry out checks if it has reason to believe that any of its contractors may be in financial trouble.

Fuel Allocations

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many driving hours per year were provided for in Army fuel allocations for (a) Warrior variants, (b) Challenger 1, (c) Challenger 2, (d) Saxon variants, (e) AVF 430 variants, (f) Sabre, (g) Striker, (h) Scimitar, (i) Spartan, (j) Sultan, (k) Samaritan and (l) Samson in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [107551]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 2 February 2000]: The information is not available in the required format and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Driver hours are not used as an allocation currency for fuel. Overall activity levels for the vehicles in question are based, in all cases, on annual track mileage allocations for each vehicle type. Specific exercise activity levels are, in turn, determined against these allocations through the annual planning cycle and in-year management process. Fuel is allocated through this planning process based on comparisons of previous activity levels with future plans.

Satellite Systems

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his US counterpart on the introduction of space-based infra-red satellite systems; and if he will make a statement. [108419]

Mr. Hoon: None. But matters relating to the Space Based Infra Red System are the subject of regular discussions between my officials and their US counterparts.

Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 7 December 1999, Official Report, columns 454–55W, what restrictions were placed on contractors carrying out research projects funded by his Department in 1999 in respect of them discussing their findings with journalists (a) before and (b) after publication. [108203]

Dr. Moonie: MOD approval is required for any proposed publication of research findings, or any open discussion of such findings, between contractors and third parties, including journalists. Decisions are made on a case-by-case basis with a presumption that approval will be given unless security, commercial or other overriding reasons dictate otherwise.

Air Accidents

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many accidents there were in which deceased air crew were found guilty of gross negligence in aircraft that were not fitted with cockpit voice recorders and flight data recorders since 1980; and what proportion of accidents involving military aircraft this represented. [108491]

Mr. Spellar: There was one such accident: the RAF Chinook HC2 which crashed on the Mull of Kintyre on 2 June 1994. This represents one such finding in approximately 550 military aircraft accidents.

Iraq

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 12 January 2000, Official Report, column 165W, on Iraq, how many British aircraft came under fire before dropping their laser-guided bombs. [108433]

Mr. Hoon: On the morning of 28 November 1999, coalition aircraft patrolling the southern no fly zone came under fire from Iraqi anti-aircraft artillery. During a further patrol later that day, coalition aircraft were again fired at by Iraqi anti-aircraft artillery. Coalition aircraft responded in self-defence by attacking one fire control radar and two batteries of anti-aircraft artillery. I am withholding information on the number of aircraft involved in specific incidents under Exemption 1a of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Ministerial Meeting

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what (a) discussions were held and (b) agreements were reached during his recent meeting in Washington with his US counterpart. [108685]

Mr. Hoon: I had a wide-ranging discussion covering matters of mutual interest with Defense Secretary Cohen during my recent visit to Washington.

Old Ranges, Shoeburyness

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 28 January 2000, Official Report, column 383W, on how many occasions he has used Exemption 7 of the Code of Access to Government Information in the past 12 months; and for what reason he used it in relation to the sale of the Old Ranges in Shoeburyness. [108226]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 3 February 2000]: Of 3,097 Parliamentary Questions answered in the past 12 months, information was withheld under Exemption 7 of the Code of Access to Government Information on 5 occasions. This exemption was used in relation to the sale of Old Ranges in Shoeburyness to protect commercially sensitive information which could have prejudiced negotiations with the prospective purchaser.

RAF (Aircraft Accidents)

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF aircraft crashed in United Kingdom airspace in 1999. [108359]

Dr. Moonie: Eight.

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason there were more crashes of RAF aircraft in 1999 than in 1998 and 1997; and if he will make a statement. [108360]

Dr. Moonie: The number of RAF aircraft accidents in 1999 went against the trend in the accident rate, which has been one of overall decline over the past 10 years. Fluctuations in this trend have occurred before, and we will be looking carefully to see whether there is any significance in last year's pattern of accidents. Initial investigations into the accidents have shown no common causal link.

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will initiate an inquiry into the reasons for the higher incidence of crashes of RAF aircraft in 1999; and if he will make a statement. [108362]

Dr. Moonie: As is normal practice, a RAF Board of Inquiry has been convened to carry out a full investigation and establish the cause of each crash. Once all the Inquiries have been completed, their reports will be scrutinised in depth to see whether any overall causal link may be established. Initial investigations indicate no common cause.

RAF Pilot Training

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the quality of training of RAF pilots; and if he will make a statement. [108361]

Mr. Spellar: Assessment of the standards of training of RAF pilots is a continuous process. Pass rates are examined to ensure that they are correctly set in order that only suitable candidates graduate to the next stage of training and, eventually, to the front-line. Course syllabi are subject to review by both staff and students at the end of each course.

Last year the RAF adopted the Integrated Training Quality Management System; this assesses the efficacy of the flying training system by questioning pilots at each stage of the training on the suitability of the preceding course in preparing them for the next stage of training.

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what sums were spent on training RAF pilots in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000 and are planned for (e) 2000–01 and (f) 2001–02. [108363]

Mr. Spellar: The information is not available in the form requested. I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

RAF (Aircraft Maintenance)

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what sums were spent on the maintenance of RAF aircraft in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000; and what sums are planned for this purpose in (e) 2000–01 and (f) 2001–02. [108364]

Mr. Spellar: The information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Defence Medical Services

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for part of the Defence Medical Services to use the former Staff College buildings at Camberley; and if he will make a statement. [108774]

Mr. Spellar: We are presently examining a number of options for the future location of headquarters elements of the Army Medical Services. I hope to be in a position to make an announcement shortly.

Defence Catering Organisation

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the headquarters of the proposed Defence Catering Organisation will be moved to York; and how many (a) military and (b) civilian staff will be employed there. [108670]

Mr. Spellar: The Defence Catering Group will be located at Ensleigh, near Bath.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many times Ministers in his Department met members and officials on the United States Government between 2 May 1997 and 1 January 1998; on what dates and at which locations; and which (a) Ministers and (b) US counterparts and officials attended each meeting. [103181]

Dr. Moonie [pursuant to the reply, 10 January 2000, c. 86W]: I regret that one detail contained in the response was inaccurate. The appointment held by the hon. Joe Reeder, who was met by the Minister for Defence Procurement in the UK on 1 July 1998, should have read, the Under Secretary of the Army and not Secretary of the Navy, as stated.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

New Deal

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if it is the policy of the Government to continue the New Deal beyond 2002; and if he will make a statement. [107794]

Ms Jowell: The different New Deal programmes we have put in place are all helping people move from welfare to work. Almost 180,000 young people have moved into work from the New Deal for young unemployed people; nearly 30,000 have found work from the New Deal for people aged 25+, and more than 28,000 people have found work from the New Deal for lone parents. We are also offering help through the New Deal for disabled people, New Deal for partners and New Deal for 50+.

The precise shape of this government's welfare to work programme for the new Parliament will be settled as part of the spending review 2000.

Ofsted

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the local education authorities inspected by Ofsted during the autumn term 1999. [109011]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Local Education Authorities inspected by Ofsted and the Audit Commission during the autumn term 1999 were as follows:

Barnet
Bristol
Derbyshire
Doncaster
Greenwich
Halton
Hertfordshire
Lancashire
Leeds
Lewisham
Oxfordshire
Plymouth
Rotherham
Salford
Sheffield
Solihull
Southwark
Walsall
Worcestershire

Leeds LEA

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of responses to the survey of schools undertaken in connection with the Ofsted inspection of Leeds Local Education Authority rated the Local Education Authority's strategy and services as satisfactory or better. [109010]

Ms Estelle Morris: This is a matter for Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools, Chris Woodhead. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend and to place a copy of his letter in the Libraries.

Social Exclusion Unit

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the implementation of the Social Exclusion Unit report on truancy and school exclusion. [108515]

Ms Estelle Morris: Our latest assessment is set out in the First Annual Report of the Ministerial Task Force on Truancy and School Exclusion, a copy of which I am sending to my hon. Friend.

Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 10 January 2000, Official Report, column 39W, on departmental research contracts, if he will place in the Library a copy of standard research contracts used by his Department (a) between May 1997 and October 1998 and (b) after October 1998. [107104]

Mr. Wicks: A copy of the standard research contracts used by the Department (a) between May 1997 and October 1998 and (b) after October 1998 shall be placed in the Library by 17 February 2000.

Educational Achievement

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of 19-year-olds had at least one level two qualification or equivalent at each autumn quarter in each of the last three years. [108357]

Mr. Wicks: The proportion of 19 to 21-year-olds in England with at least one level two qualification or equivalent, as measured by the Labour Force Survey, was 72.3 per cent. in 1997, 73.9 per cent. in 1998 and 74.9 per cent. in 1999.

Learning to Succeed

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish a detailed analysis of the anticipated net administration savings arising from the restructuring proposals of Learning to Succeed, Cm. 4392. [107644]

Mr. Wicks: The new arrangements for learning and skills will cut through the present duplication and bureaucracy and will secure savings of at least £50 million a year across post 16 learning, which will be invested in improving the quality of learning. The savings come from two main sources. Nearly £15 million will be saved because Government Offices for the regions will no longer need to contract with 72 TECs. The remainder will come partly from operating through fewer local branches—47 instead of 72, and partly from operating through more efficient systems, with less negotiation and contracting.

Learning and Skills Council

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will announce the names of the chairperson and members of the Learning and Skills Council. [107643]

Mr. Wicks: In the Learning and Skills Council Prospectus, we published the timetable for appointments to the Learning and Skills Council. However, we are currently reviewing the timetable and I will write to the hon. Member with further details shortly.

Oxbridge Intakes

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the (a) total number and (b) percentage share of (x) applicants and (y) successful applicants to (i) Oxford and (ii) Cambridge universities from (1) private schools, (2) state comprehensive schools, (3) sixth form colleges, (4) state grammar schools and (5) general further education colleges in each of the last five years. [106982]

Mr. Wicks: The information is given in the tables.

Recruitment and Retention

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what consultations he has held with the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals on their most recent analysis of recruitment and retention problems in the higher education sector. [107876]

Mr. Wicks: My right hon. Friend meets representatives of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals from time to time to discuss a variety of issues of interest to the higher education sector. He last met them on 25 January.

Teaching Staff (TUPE Regulations)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the application of TUPE as it affects existing employees of (a) TECs and (b) the FEFC; and what steps he is taking to encourage a smooth transition of essential staff to the new local learning and skills councils. [107646]

Mr. Wicks: In respect of TECs, their functions are being split several ways; some will transfer to the Learning and Skills Council (LSC), some to the Employment Service and some to other bodies. We expect a significant proportion of TEC staff to transfer under TUPE to these organisations. In respect of the FEFC, some functions transfer to the LSC, some to the Adult Learning Inspectorate and some to OFSTED. Again we expect the majority of staff to transfer under TUPE to these organisations.

We are working closely with partner organisations to ensure a smooth transition to the new arrangements.

Independent State Schools Partnership

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the number of state school pupils receiving lessons from independent school teachers as a result of the Independent State Schools Partnership scheme. [108573]

Ms Estelle Morris: We estimate that over 18,000 pupils in maintained schools and 12,000 pupils in independent schools have been involved in the Independent/State School Partnership scheme so far. Many of the partnerships also focus on staff development, through joint INSET training, sharing ideas on curriculum development and classroom observation. Some involve joint teaching, particularly in minority subject areas, to provide a broader curriculum for pupils and a wider experience base for teachers in both sectors; but information is not collected specifically on the number of state school pupils taught by independent school staff.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list (a) state schools and (b) independent schools participating in the Independent State Schools Partnership scheme. [108574]

Ms Estelle Morris: There are around 300 state and independent schools participating in the Independent/State School Partnerships Scheme. These schools are listed in the Department's Press Notices 241/98 and 200/99, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much (a) has been spent and (b) was planned to be spent in support of the Independent State Schools Partnership scheme in each year since its inception. [108575]

Ms Estelle Morris: Actual expenditure in support of the Independent/State School Partnerships scheme is given in the table, together with the originally announced planned expenditure which was later supplemented in the light of the response to the scheme:

Financial year	Actual expenditure[1]	Planned expenditure[1]
1998–99	600,000	500,000
1999–2000	925,000	675,000
2000–01	n/a	675,000

[1] Including £250,000 joint funding from the Sutton Trust in 1998–99 and £100,000 in each of 1999–2000 and 2000–01.

Playing Fields

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list by local education authority the total acreage of playing fields sold by schools in each year since 1990. [108119]

Jacqui Smith: The tables list, by local education authority, the total area (in acres) of sports pitches that the Secretary of State has given approval to sell since Section 77 of the Schools Standards and Framework Act 1998 took effect on 1 October 1998. Before that date, this information was not collected by the Department.

Section 77 protects school playing fields by requiring local authorities to obtain the Secretary of State's consent before they dispose, or change the use, of any school playing fields. Before approving any application, the Secretary of State must be satisfied that:

a. any sale proceeds are used to enhance sports or education facilities;

b. the sports pitch needs of the school, and neighbouring schools, are met;

c. there is no loss of sports facilities to the community; and

d. there has been adequate consultation on the proposed disposal.

New Deal (Blyth Valley)

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the number of jobs that have been created in Blyth Valley as a result of the New Deal. [106825]

Ms Jowell: New Deal is not a job creation scheme. It is designed to help unemployed people improve their skills and compete effectively for vacancies. The latest figures to the end of October 1999 show that this policy is working; in the Blyth Valley constituency, 329 people have found employment through the New Deal (275 young people under the New Deal for young people and 54 people through the New Deal for long term unemployed adults).

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the destination of those who have left the New Deal for those aged 18 to 24 years (a) at the time at which they left the New Deal, (b) 13 weeks after leaving the New Deal and (c) 26 weeks after leaving the New Deal, for the parliamentary constituency of Blyth Valley. [106826]

Ms Jowell: The table summarises the immediate destinations of the 392 young people who have left the New Deal in Blyth Valley. In addition to those recorded as leaving for unsubsidised employment, many of those recorded as leaving for unknown destinations will have found work but not told the Employment Service. In fact, a recent survey found that of those leaving for unknown destinations from the Gateway stage of New Deal, 57 per cent. entered paid employment.

Young people who return to claim Jobseeker's Allowance within 13 weeks of leaving New Deal are not regarded as having left the New Deal. By definition, the leavers in the table below have not returned to Jobseeker's Allowance within 13 weeks.

In Blyth Valley, evaluation shows that 80 per cent. of young people had not returned to claim Jobseeker's Allowance within 26 weeks.

Nuclear Engineering

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the nuclear engineering courses available at higher education institutions in England. [108232]

Mr. Wicks: At present there are two postgraduate courses in nuclear engineering. These are at the University of Birmingham and the Royal Naval College. It is understood that the nuclear industry also provides its own specially designed training programmes for suitable graduates, enabling them to meet the required standards in the field.

Higher Education

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to introduce ethnic monitoring in relation to academic and academic-related staff working in higher education institutions. [108276]

Mr. Wicks: As independent bodies, higher education institutions appoint their own staff. Like other employers, they are responsible for implementing equal opportunities legislation and fair employment policies. My right hon. Friend has asked the Higher Education Funding Council for England to ensure that all higher education institutions have equal opportunity policy statements and that they are accountable for their implementation. He has also asked the Council to encourage institutions to give proper emphasis to racial equality in their policy statements.

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many higher education institutions in the United Kingdom have a racial equality policy. [108278]

Mr. Wicks: Most higher education institutions have equal opportunity policy statements which cover racial equality but the latest research which drew upon a sample of 123 responses from HEIs showed that one third had specific racial equality policies.

Textile and Clothing Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what initiatives his Department has set in place to develop training opportunities for students interested in pursuing careers in the United Kingdom textile and clothing industry; and if he will make a statement. [108659]

Mr. Wicks: The Secretary of State and I announced on 3 February a major new advice, guidance and support service for all 13 to 19-year-olds, called the Connexions Service. This will be a universal service but with intensive help for those in greatest need. It will be at the heart of the Government's strategy to prepare all young people for a successful adult and working life.

My Department also works through the two relevant employer-led National Training Organisations (National Textile Training Organisation (NTTO) and CAPITB, the NTO for the Clothing Sector). CAPITB has placed particular importance on providing high quality careers guidance and actively supports the placement of graduates with employers. Following the restructuring of the industry both NTOs are refocusing their attention on meeting skill gaps at technologist, management and technician levels.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what initiatives his Department has taken to improve (a) the marketing skills of the United Kingdom textile and clothing industry and (b) employment opportunities within the United Kingdom textile and clothing industry. [108660]

Mr. Wicks: The National Training Organisations for the Textile and Clothing industries (NTTO and CAPITB) are refocusing their work in line with the restructuring of the industries, both bodies having recognised that although the demand for traditional skills is declining there is increased demand for specialist skills. Competitive success depends on the development of such skills with marketing very much to the fore. My Department is encouraging the National Textile Training Organisation and CAPITB, the National Training Organisation for the Clothing and Apparel industries, to develop Skills Foresight for their industries. Skills Foresight involves the collection of skills intelligence in a conscious and planned manner, engaging directly with employers. My Department will help the employer-led NTOs to use this intelligence as the basis for Workforce Development Plans, reviewing the study of education and training to meet the ends identified by Skills Foresight, establishing the necessary partnership arrangements needed to ensure the skill needs of employers and individuals are met and ensuring their plans link to the expected strategies of the Learning and Skills Councils, nationally and locally. In addition the Government support the Apparel and Textile Challenge whose activities include developing marketing skills among textiles and clothing suppliers. We also support the raising of the profile and marketing of "generic brands" such as Scottish Cashmere.

Pupil Attainment

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list in rank order, for the latest year for which information is available, pupil attainment for (i) Key Stage 1, (ii) Key Stage 2, (iii) Key Stage 3, (iv) Key Stage 4, (v) GCSE and (vi) A levels for the following local education authorities (i) Leeds, (ii) Sheffield, (iii) Liverpool, (iv) Islington, (v) Hackney and (vi) Hull. [109009]

Ms Estelle Morris: The available information for 1999 is shown in the table. For the Key Stage 1, 2 and 3 results, the Local Education Authorities have been ranked using the sum across subjects of the percentage of pupils attaining the given levels in the tests/tasks. There is no measure of pupil attainment for Key Stage 4.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Policing Powers

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what powers are available to the police to impose crowd control and safety measures on the organisers of popular events which are held on private land; and what plans he has to strengthen them. [108112]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There are no specific police powers relating to crowd control or safety for events on private land. For an organised entertainment event where there are no trespassers, the local authority for the area would be the lead body to ensure public safety, and fire and police services would also be consulted with regard to both safety and emergency planning. Once this consultation has been completed, the local authority can issue a Public Entertainments Licence under the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982.
There are no plans to amend the legislation.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take measures to enable the police to remove more promptly motor vehicles which have been abandoned on (a) public and (b) private land; and if he will make a statement. [108113]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The enforcement of road traffic law is an operational matter for chief officers of police. The legislative provisions governing the removal of vehicles are contained in the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, the Refuse Disposal (Amenity) Act 1978 and the Disposal of Vehicle Regulations 1986. Under the 1986 Regulations, the police have powers to remove vehicles abandoned without lawful authority which are left in breach of local traffic regulation orders or left where they are causing an obstruction or likely to cause a danger. In these circumstances, removal would be arranged as soon as possible.

Where vehicles are not illegally parked but otherwise appear to be abandoned, the responsibility for removing and ultimately disposing of them rests with local authorities. The police do not have the power to remove abandoned vehicles from private land.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number and percentage of ethnic minority officers in each of the 18 specialist departments within the Metropolitan police; and if he will make a statement. [108185]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that there are four Specialist Departments within the Metropolitan police, comprising over 50 branches. The numbers and percentages of ethnic minority officers in each specialist department is shown in the table.

Department	Ethnic minority officers	Percentage
Specialist Operations (SO)	84	3.17
Headquarters Department (CO)	20	2.25
Deputy Commissioners Command Department (DCC)	5	1.79
Personnel (P)	28	4.0

Stop and Search (Dover)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) articulated lorries, (b) commercial vans and (c) private motor cars were stopped and searched on arrival at Dover in 1999. [108175]

Mrs. Roche: The immigration service does not keep records of the searches of individual vehicles it conducts. However, immigration service staff based at Dover dealt with 8,878 clandestine illegal entrants who had arrived through the port of Dover in 1999.

Macpherson Inquiry

Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost of conducting the Macpherson inquiry; and what estimate he has made of the cost of implementing its recommendations. [108218]

Mr. Straw: The final costs of the inquiry have yet to be determined as there are outstanding bills for settlement in terms of legal fees. However, the costs incurred to date are as follows:

Pay and allowances	£
Inquiry Team, Advisers and civil servants	667,000
Accommodation and Associated Costs	710,000
Legal Representation and Treasury Solicitors Costs	2,084,000
Miscellaneous Running Costs	777,000

This provides a total cost to date of £4.238 million. I explained in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) on 23 July 1999, Official Report, column 729W, the Metropolitan police service are, in accordance with section 49(5) of the Police Act 1996, meeting the full costs of setting up and establishing the inquiry, together with all costs which directly accrued from Part 1 of the inquiry relating to the police investigation of the murder of Stephen Lawrence. These costs amount to £3.1 million to date of the total costs. The costs of Part 2 of the inquiry, on the future handling of racially motivated crime, will be met by the Home Office as the findings were of more general application.

Arrangements had been made to reimburse the costs arising from the need of 18 families and individuals to be moved by Greenwich Council or to sell their houses as a result of the inquiry's error in publishing Appendix 11 of the inquiry's report in full. The final amount is not yet known but is likely to be about £350,000, which is significantly less than the estimate given in that earlier reply.

I made it clear in the Action Plan I published in March 1999 in response to the inquiry's report that the changes required by the inquiry will work only if they are systemic and implemented within the mainstream of the police service at every level. We have recognised the need for proper investment in the police service to help achieve that, which is why we are investing an extra £1.24 billion in policing over three years following the comprehensive spending review. Several of the changes called for by the report, including some of the most far-reaching, require further study or piloting before they can be implemented on a national basis. It is not, therefore, possible at present to give an overall figure for the costs of implementing the report's recommendations.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the total cost of dealing with asylum seeking was in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99; and what the budgeted and estimated figures are for (i) 1999–2000 and (ii) 2000–01 respectively. [108159]

Mrs. Roche: Figures and estimates are available for the cost of providing support to asylum seekers and the cost of operating the immigration and nationality directorate, which includes dealing with asylum seekers.

In 1997–98, the total cost of operating the immigration and nationality directorate was £215 million. A further £375 million was provided for supporting asylum seekers by the Department of Social Security and the Department of Health. In 1998–99, the total cost of operating the immigration and nationality directorate was £209 million. A further £470 million was provided by the Department of Social Security and the Department of Health for the support of asylum seekers.

Responsibility for the budget for supporting asylum seekers transferred to the Home Office from April 1999. It is anticipated that the total cost of operating the immigration and nationality directorate and supporting asylum seekers for the financial year 1999–2000 will be in the region of around £800 million. Estimating costs for 2000–01 is subject to a large number of variables such as the level of new asylum applications, the speed of processing claims and the resources directed at processing cases and other work. Those estimates are currently under review.

Police Funding

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he is taking to increase the funding for police constabularies broken down by each constabulary in England and Wales. [108286]

Mr. Charles Clarke: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell), on 27 January 2000, Official Report, columns 241–42W, the funding allocations for police authorities in England for 2000–01. Allocations for 2000–01 for each police authority in England and Wales are set out in the table.

Funding for police authorities will increase by £202 million to a total of £7,415.3 million in 2000–01. In addition, the Government are making available £35 million in 2000–01 as part of the crime fighting fund to recruit 5,000 police officers over and above the number forces would otherwise have recruited over the three years from April 2000. Additional funding will be available in the following two years. All forces will receive a share.

Mike Tyson

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will break down the costs of policing related to Mike Tyson's visit to (a) London and (b) Manchester, indicating the sources from which the costs were met. [108379]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan and Greater Manchester Police forces inform me that manpower costs of policing the visit of Mike Tyson were met within current resources. The Metropolitan police estimate net additional costs of approximately £9,700 for Mr. Tyson's visit to Brixton. Greater Manchester police charged costs of £21,713 in respect of policing the boxing match and venue to the event organisers, Manchester Evening News Arena.

Travel Documents

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set a target date for clearing the outstanding travel document applications made between January and August 1999. [108210]

Mrs. Roche: We are aiming to clear this backlog by the end of August this year.

HMP Blantyre House

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what options he has considered for the future use of HMP Blantyre House; and when he will make an announcement. [108417]

Mr. Boateng: As a key part of the Government's wide-ranging reforms of the youth justice system the Prison Service is developing a distinct estate for under-18-year-old boys. This forms part of a wider strategy, overseen by the new Youth Justice Board, to improve the coherence of the juvenile secure estate and drive up standards. Initially the estate will consist of 13 establishments, but the Prison Service and the Youth Justice Board have drawn up a strategy for securing further improvements in due course.

One area targeted for improvement is the provision of places in London and the south-east. To ensure that boys from the region can be held closer to home, the option of including Blantyre House within the under-18 estate has been considered. However, the proposal is contingent upon the availability of resources and trends in the prison population and it is not possible to say when a final decision will be taken. In determining Blantyre House's future, the Prison Service will seek to weigh up all the competing strategic needs. This will include the role that Blantyre House currently fulfils as a resettlement establishment.

Police Indices Formula

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the Police Indices Formula. [107590]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Police Negotiating Board is responsible for considering all matters concerned with police pay and allowances. There are no plans currently to review the pay formula.

The formula for calculating the annual pay award for the federated ranks of the police service has been in use since 1994, and is intended to keep police pay in line with inflation. The pay award for 1997 was 3.5 per cent, for 1998, 4.0 per cent. and for 1999, 3.6 per cent, paid from September each year.

Animal Procedures Committee

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is regarding the number of members with medical qualifications on the Animal Procedures Committee. [108233]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: There is no specific policy in relation to the number of members of the Animal Procedures Committee with medical qualifications. The legislation requires that at least two thirds of the Committee's members be persons who hold full registration as a medical practitioner or veterinary surgeon or have qualifications or experience in an approved biological subject, and the Government fully recognise the importance of this requirement.

Operation Lancet

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what decision has been made by Treasury Counsel regarding files on the Operation Lancet inquiry held by Cleveland police force; [108769]

(2) if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable of Cleveland Police on the action they have taken regarding Operation Lancet files which were returned by Treasury Counsel on 6 December 1999. [108805]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Chief Constable has been informed that Treasury Counsel has provided advice to the Crown Prosecution Service on a number of files from Operation Lancet and that these files are now receiving final consideration at the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) Headquarters. The Chief Constable is currently considering the disciplinary issues arising from the investigation.

Harvey Hector

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department between which dates Harvey Hector was held in the custody of CIB3; for what reasons; and if he will make a statement. [108075]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that Mr. Hector Harvey was arrested on 3 August 1998 for armed robbery. On his first appearance at court on 5 August 1998 he was remanded into police custody. He was subsequently remanded into the custody of Complaints Investigation Branch Number 3 (CIB3) under section 29 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, as amended by section 41 and schedule 1 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997, to assist in the investigation of further robberies and other criminal acts.

Christopher John Paddle

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the circumstances of the shooting of Metropolitan police officer Christopher John Paddle on 16 April 1993. [108076]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis informs me that Constable Paddle was accidentally shot in the hand while on an operation to arrest a team of armed robbers.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the complaint by Mr. and Mrs. Christopher Paddle made to the Metropolitan Police Commissioner on 19 January 1998 was not acted upon until February 1999; and if he will make a statement. [108077]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that following an incident in January 1998, solicitors acting on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Paddle wrote to the Metropolitan police seeking the return of property. Following lengthy correspondence between the solicitors and the Metropolitan police, Mrs. Paddle made a formal complaint, which was received on 23 February 1999.

SAL 2 Forms

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the number of forged SAL 2 forms in circulation. [107951]

Mrs. Roche: It is impossible to make a reliable estimate of the number of forged or counterfeit SAL 2 forms in circulation.

Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) Bill

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultation there has been between his Department and HM Treasury concerning the Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) Bill; and if he will make a statement. [108087]

Mr. Straw: Her Majesty's Treasury were consulted as part of the normal procedure for reaching collective agreement on policy changes, including the financial implications for the criminal justice system.

Police and Fire Service Pensions

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will announce plans to change the way pensions for police and fire service personnel are allocated and funded; and if he will make a statement. [108084]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Following major reviews of the Police Pension Scheme and the Fire Service Pension Scheme, I am currently considering what long-term changes, if any, are required to the funding arrangements for the two schemes. I hope to publish specific proposals in the spring. Any such proposals will be subject to consultation—in particular with the Police Negotiating Board and the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Committee.

Police Recruits

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the total cost to police forces of employing 5,000 additional recruits; what is his estimate of the total cost of retaining 5,000 officers for a year; and if he will make a statement. [108086]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Forces will be recruiting 5,000 officers over a three-year period. The cost of employing a police officer and retaining an officer for a year will vary between forces.

The estimated annual cost to police forces of 5,000 police constables would be around £150 million.

SCOTLAND

Staff Bonuses

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies spent in total on extra bonuses above usual payments for staff working over the new year period; what were the (a) maximum and (b) minimum bonuses paid; how many people received the (i) maximum and (ii) minimum payments; and if he will make a statement. [104499]

Dr. Reid: The maximum level of bonus paid to staff in my Department for working over the new year period was £250. The minimum level was £150. One member of staff received a bonus of £250 plus overtime payments for hours actually worked and two members of staff received £150.

Departmental Properties

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those properties held by his Department and agencies responsible to him which are (a) wholly and (b) mainly unoccupied at present, giving locations and when they became so unoccupied in each case. [105310]

Dr. Reid: My Department has no unoccupied properties.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Retirement Provision

15. Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to help people on low incomes make provision for their retirement. [107202]

Mr. Rooker: Our plans to reform SERPS through the introduction of the State Second Pension are set out in the Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Bill. This was introduced to this House on 1 December 1999 and is currently subject to the usual Parliamentary processes.

The State Second Pension will help low and moderate earners, together with carers and some long-term disabled people with broken work records, to build up increased pension entitlement.

Low earners will receive a dramatic boost to their additional pension entitlement which will more than double under State Second Pension. Moderate earners will also benefit, including those who choose to contract out of the State scheme.

Minimum Income Guarantee

17. Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on his plans to launch a take-up campaign for those pensioners entitled to the minimum income guarantee. [107204]

Mr. Rooker: We are committed to taking action to find more effective ways of encouraging eligible pensioners to claim their entitlement to the Minimum Income Guarantee. We will announce details of a national programme shortly.

23. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the impact on savings by low earners of the introduction of the minimum income guarantee. [107210]

Mr. Bayley: We made a commitment in the Pensions Green Paper to "better reward" savers. We will bring forward our proposals later in this Parliament.

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to increase the level of the minimum income guarantee for pensioners and to include a clawback element. [107203]

Mr. Rooker: The minimum income guarantee will be increased in line with earnings for the rest of this Parliament. We have no plans to taper the guarantee.

Stakeholder Pensions

18. Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how he intends to promulgate stakeholder pensions. [107205]

Mr. Rooker: Publicity campaigns will be used to communicate the benefits of stakeholder pensions and how to contact providers, while the annual pension statement will help to make people aware of the need to save.

Pensioners

19. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to help pensioners with small second incomes who do not qualify for benefits. [107206]

Mr. Rooker: We made a commitment in the pensions Green Paper to "better reward" those individuals who have made provision for their retirement. We will bring forward proposals during this Parliament.

Housing Benefit Fraud

20. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will report on progress in tackling housing benefit fraud. [107207]

Angela Eagle: We are committed to taking tough action to combat Housing Benefit fraud. We have:

reformed the anti-fraud financial incentive scheme for local authorities to ensure they can be rewarded for detecting and prosecuting cases of fraud; made an additional £100 million available over the next three years to encourage them to adopt the Verification Framework, which, through a series of checks throughout the period of a benefit claim, will help make Housing Benefit administration more secure;

invited all local authorities to participate in the Royal Mail "do not redirect" initiative which prevents benefit claimants from using Royal Mail's postal redirection arrangements to make false claims to benefit from multiple addresses. Already, around 250 local authorities are operating this scheme and many more are preparing to implement it; made £4 million available to install computer terminals in local authorities which provide access to the Department's benefit systems. We are now looking to extend this initiative to include exchanging information electronically between local authorities and the Department, providing further scope to prevent fraud and error occurring in the first place.

Jobseeker's Allowance

21. Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on trends in payments of jobseeker's allowance to those aged 18 to 24 years (a) between 1993 and 1996 and (b) since January 1998. [107208]

Angela Eagle: Expenditure on payments of Jobseeker's Allowance to those aged 18–24 years has fallen slightly more quickly in the period since 1997 than it did during the period 1993–96. The same is true of the numbers of 18–24-year-olds in receipt of JSA and of the proportion of the total number of JSA recipients who are aged 18–24.

Disability Benefits

22. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the numbers of persons on disability benefits whose entitlement has been cancelled in the last year. [107209]

Mr. Bayley: About 160,000 awards of Disability Living Allowance and 275,000 awards of Attendance Allowance stopped in 1999. These benefits provide help with extra costs which arise from disablement, and awards stop in a range of circumstances, including when people's condition improves, they go to live abroad, or they die, or enter long-term residential care.

Child Support Agency

24. Sir David Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the new arrangements for contact between the public and the Child Support Agency at a local level will begin operating; and if he will make a statement. [107211]

Angela Eagle: The CSA is currently rolling out a programme of face-to-face customer service across the country. This will be completed by March this year, when there will be 600 staff in 86 locations providing face-to-face interviews.

33. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received on his proposed reforms of the Child Support Agency; and if he will make a statement. [107221]

Angela Eagle: We have received widespread support for our proposed reforms. The legislation, giving effect to these reforms, is currently before the House.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 6 December 1999, Official Report, columns 375–76W, if he will make a statement on the Child Support Reforms New Rules Implementation Project, including the progress to date and the amount which has been spent. [106803]

Angela Eagle: I refer the hon. Member to the written answer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security gave my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) on 31 January 2000, Official Report, columns 465–66W.

The Child Support Agency has so far incurred expenditure of around £800,000 on implementing the new child support rules.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on progress made with establishing the computer system designed to provide a link between the Child Support Agency and Income Support systems; and if he will estimate the amount spent on this aspect of the Affinity Project to date. [106774]

Angela Eagle: Discussions are ongoing between the Department and the Affinity Consortium to agree the detailed business specification for Child Support Reform, including enhanced links between the Child Support and Income Support systems, with a view to agreeing a contract for a new computer system. An announcement about the contract will be made in due course. The cost of developing and implementing the computer system to link Child Support and Income Support will form part of this contract.

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for each Child Support Agency centre in the years 1993 to 1999 (a) in how many cases an inspector was appointed under section 15 of the Child Support Act 1991 as a result of information coming to light of the section 18 review procedure; (b) in how many cases an inspector was appointed as a result of direction by a tribunal; (c) in how many cases a tribunal direction to appoint an inspector was not acted upon; and for the cases in which inspectors were appointed what were the average sums recovered and audited to (i) parents with care and (ii) Her Majesty's Treasury for each of the above years. [107952]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Mrs. Faith Boardman, the Chief Executive. She will write to my hon. Friend shortly.

Letter from Mrs. Faith Boardman to Mr. David Stewart, dated January 2000:

I am replying to Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency.

The information requested is not currently held. However, as part of the Child Support Reforms fraud is a major issue and tough sanctions are proposed for those parents who deliberately supply false information.

Dealing with fraud allows us to play a full part in the Government's plans for tackling fraud and incorrectness, in a way that fits in with our priorities and the Government's proposed reform.

CSA is developing a child support programme review (to determine the level of fraud) and an anti-fraud strategy which will work hand in hand with the Agency's improvements to service delivery.

The Agency intends, as part of the CSR reforms, to appoint full time inspectors and issue penalty notices to uncooperative parents and employers. It will also introduce a fraud training and awareness package for all CSA staff., along with clear operational procedures.

The current sanctions available to the Agency will be reviewed and a Head of Security will be appointed together with a small team of highly skilled staff to develop and continue the security strategy.

To ensure that the security strategy is working, we propose to seek assurance through internal audit, external assistance by BFI and by benchmarking security with other organisations.

I hope that this is helpful.

Child Poverty

25. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures he is taking with other Government Departments to meet the Government's objective of eliminating child poverty. [107213]

Mr. Bayley: We are making real progress in tackling poverty. We are the first Government to be committed to eradicating child poverty in a generation, and halving it within 10 years.

In all, we will provide an additional £6 billion a year in new tax and benefit measures for families with children by the end of this parliament. 800,000 children will be lifted above half average income through measures in the last two Budgets. All families will be, on average, £740 a year better off.

Later this year we will be publishing our second annual report on tackling poverty and social exclusion, monitoring progress so far.

Benefit Payments

26. Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions he has had with banks regarding the proposed transfer of benefit payments to automated credit transfer between 2003–05. [107214]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the Written Answer I gave the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on 7 December 1999, Official Report, column 494W.

Winter Fuel Payment

27. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to ensure that every man and woman who reaches retirement age during the course of each winter will be entitled to a fuel payment. [107215]

Angela Eagle: We want to ensure that people receive their payments in good time to contribute towards winter fuel bills. To ensure the payment process is completed in time it is necessary to put in place a qualifying week during which eligible people can be identified.

Under these arrangements, those who reach their 60th birthday after the qualifying week will not receive a payment until the following winter. Our policy of making payments at the earliest opportunity ensures that the very elderly, who will include the vast majority of those who are most frail, have their payment in their hands when they need it.

Benefits Payment (Norwich)

28. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to speed up the payment of benefits to claimants in Norwich. [107216]

Angela Eagle: We have no specific plans to speed up the payment of benefit to claimants in Norwich. The Benefits Agency has published targets for the clearance of benefits and every effort is made to clear claims within that period. There are, however, always a number of cases where further investigation is required and payment of the full rate of benefit cannot be made from the date of entitlement.

Published clearance targets for claims to contributory benefits are as follows:

Retirement Pension—60 days

Incapacity Benefit—30 days

Job Seekers Allowance—21 days

Minimum Income Guarantee (North-west)

29. Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of north-west pensioners who are entitled to but not claiming the minimum income guarantee. [107217]

Mr. Bayley: Estimates of numbers of pensioners entitled to but not claiming the Minimum Income Guarantee are not available at regional level.

Benefit Withdrawal

30. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what safeguards he will introduce to protect the welfare of the dependants of those who have had their benefit withdrawn. [107218]

Angela Eagle: Under proposals contained in the Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Bill, offenders who are referred back to Court for an alleged breach of a Probation Order, Community Service Order or a Combination Order will be subject to a benefit sanction. The measure will initially be piloted in England and Wales; during the pilots the period of the sanction will be four weeks.

In the case of Jobseeker's Allowance and certain Training Allowances, benefit will be withdrawn. The welfare of the claimant and any dependants will be safeguarded by hardship payments. These will be available for vulnerable groups and others at risk of hardship. The conditions for receiving a hardship payment will be broadly similar to those currently applied to people who are subject to an employment sanction. Income Support will not be withdrawn, but will be reduced by 40 per cent. or 20 per cent. of the single person's adult rate, depending on their circumstances.

The best safeguard for dependants is for the offender to comply with the terms of the community sentence. Providing there is no breach of the sentence, then no benefit sanction will be applied and the question of hardship payments will not arise.

Single Room Rent Restrictions

31. Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received in the past 12 months from (a) voluntary organisations and (b) others on the impact of single room rent restrictions on young people aged under 25 years. [107219]

Angela Eagle: The representations we have received from voluntary organisations and others suggest that the single room rent restriction is causing localised difficulties for some young people under 25 years in that the accommodation to which the restriction relates is not readily available.

ONE Service Pilots

32. Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the implementation of the ONE Service pilots. [107220]

34. Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the ONE Service pilots. [107222]

Angela Eagle: The ONE service is a radical new initiative designed to streamline the operation of the benefit system and help claimants move from welfare into work. The first four ONE pilots were launched in June last year and a further eight commenced in November.

The changeover to the new system was achieved with minimum disruption to services and all of the pilots are settling in well. While it is too early to measure the degree of success we have had in helping people move into sustainable employment, the improved level of customer service and the focus on individual needs have been well received by our clients.

Disability Living Allowance

35. Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to ensure that the mobility component of Disability Living Allowance is paid directly to those in residential care and not into the bank account of organisations running residential homes. [107223]

Mr. Bayley: Benefits Agency (BA) normal practice is to ensure that the mobility component of Disability Living Allowance is paid directly to the beneficiary, and that remains the case whether a person lives at home or in residential care.

Regulations provide, however, that if a person is unable to act, for example because of senility or mental illness, the Secretary of State can appoint a suitable person, the Appointee, to act on that person's behalf. In such cases, the Appointee will be empowered to receive and deal with, subject to the discretion of the Secretary of State, any sums of mobility component payable to the beneficiary. BA instructions allow a proprietor of a residential care home to be made Appointee but only if no other suitable person (for example, a relative) can be found.

Miners (Compensation Payments)

36. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the proposed clawback of benefits relating to the compensation payments being made to miners and miners' widows. [107224]

Mr. Bayley: No. The provisions of the compensation recovery scheme apply to miners and miners' widows in the same way as they do for other victims of accident, injury or disease. The compensation recovery scheme is intended to ensure that victims do not receive double compensation for the same need.

Compensation paid in respect of loss of past earnings, cost of past care or loss of past mobility is therefore reduced to take account of benefits paid, but only for a maximum period of five years from the date of claim to benefit in respect of the disease. Whether miners see a reduction in the amount of compensation they actually receive, therefore, will depend on the make-up of their compensation payment. However, compensation awarded to miners and miners' widows in respect of pain and suffering will be paid at the full amount awarded under the terms of the handling agreement and is not subject to any deduction.

Staff Bonuses

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies spent in total on extra bonuses above usual payments for staff working over the New Year period; what were the (a) maximum and (b) minimum bonuses paid; how many people received the (i) maximum and (ii) minimum payments; and if he will make a statement. [104485]

Mr. Rooker: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Automated Credit Transfer System

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will make it his policy to ensure that recipients who collect their benefits on a weekly basis will be able to continue to do so when Automated Credit Transfer is introduced in 2003; [108418]

(2) what recent representations he has received on the decision to pay benefits through Automated Credit Transfer. [108416]

Mr. Rooker: This is one of a number of issues to be considered on the move to payments by Automated Credit Transfer. No decisions have yet been taken, but we will ensure that the new arrangements from 2003 continue to meet people's needs.

On recent representations, I refer my hon. Friend to the written answer I gave the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on 28 January 2000, Official Report, column 372W.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what steps he has taken to ensure the accuracy of benefits payments made through the automated credit transfer system; and if he will make a statement; [107963]

(2) what is the total amount by which benefits have been (a) overpaid and (b) underpaid in error using the automated credit transfer system in the last full year for which records are available; [108056]

(3) what is the annual administrative cost of making benefit payments through the automated credit transfer system; and what proportion of that cost relates to the administrative cost of correcting payments made in error; [107962]

(4) how many people were (a) overpaid and (b) underpaid benefits in error by his Department using the automated credit transfer system in the last full year for which records are available. [107964]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 2 February 2000]: The administrative cost of making benefit payments through automated credit transfer (ACT) is a small fraction of the cost of other methods. For example, it costs 49p every time an order book foil is presented, and 79p per giro cashed, against 1p for each ACT payment. We expect savings in administrative costs of £400 million a year when ACT becomes the norm.

Under and over-payment of benefit may occur for a number of reasons. I am aware of only one occasion (involving nearly 112,000 customers being overpaid a total of about £10.5 million) where the ACT process itself has been the cause of under or over-payment. The Benefits Agency is taking urgent steps to recover the money and to ensure it does not happen again.

Social Fund (Funeral Expenses)

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the rules governing payments for funeral expenses from the Social Fund to make them easier to understand and to implement. [108439]

Angela Eagle: The Funeral Payment scheme was revised in April 1997 to make it easier to understand and to increase the level of help available to eligible people. The previous provision was complex, making it difficult for claimants to work out how much was allowable for individual items which were specified in regulations, and this led to inconsistent decision making. Further changes were made in November 1997 and again in January of this year. The latest revision has reduced the complexity of the scheme further by setting out more clearly the arrangements for meeting burial and cremation charges.

Under current legislation, therefore, where an eligible person is deemed to have good reason for taking responsibility for funeral expenses, the scheme allows for the fees levied by the burial authorities and crematoria (in so far as it is necessary to incur them), specified travel expenses and up to £600 for any other funeral expenses. We do not plan any further reforms in the immediate future but will continue to review the policy periodically.

Armed Services Pensions

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if those in receipt of an armed services pension are entitled to unemployment and other benefits; and if he will make a statement. [108739]

Angela Eagle: Armed services pensions are taken into account in the benefits system in the same way as any other occupational pension.

Occupational pensions are taken fully into account in income-based Jobseeker's Allowance, Income Support, Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit. Working Families Tax Credit also takes occupational pensions fully into account.

Contribution-based Jobseeker's Allowance is reduced on a penny-for-penny basis for any amount of pension received in excess of £50 a week.

Incapacity Benefit is not currently affected by occupational pensions. However, from April 2001, any occupational pension above £85 a week will affect entitlement for new claimants. The amount of benefit payable will be reduced by 50p for each £1 of pension received above £85.

Benefits

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many Benefits Agency claimants were overpaid (a) benefit and (b) income support in each of the last 12 months; and how many of these claimants have repaid that (i) benefit and (ii) income support in full; [108643]

(2) how much (a) benefit and (b) income support was overpaid in each of the last 12 months; and how much of this (i) benefit and (ii) income support was recovered from claimants; [108642]

(3) what estimate he has made of the annual administrative costs of recovering unpaid (a) benefit and (b) income support per claimant; and how much was spent by the Benefits Agency recovering overpaid (i) benefit and (ii) income support in each of the last 12 months; [108644]

(4) what is his policy in respect of recovering overpaid benefit from claimants overpaid by (a) over £5.00 and (b) under £5.00; [108645]

(5) what methods are used by the Benefits Agency to recover overpaid benefit from claimants who do not repay such benefit voluntarily; and in what percentage of overpayment cases these methods are used. [108646]

Angela Eagle: Administration of benefits and recovery of overpayments is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, Peter Mathison. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mark Fisher to Mr. Paul Burstow, dated 4 February 2000:

The Secretary of State has asked Peter Mathison to respond to your recent questions about overpaid benefits. As he is unavailable I am replying on his behalf.

The Benefits Agency (BA) aims to obtain the recovery of overpayments as quickly and efficiently as possible by the most cost-effective method, without causing hardship, and in accordance with Government Accounting and Departmental Policy.

The BA spent £44m on recovering overpayments in the period April to December 1999. A monthly breakdown of this figure is set out in the attached appendix. Some of the information is not available in the format requested. For example, the BA does not break this down by benefit or by the number of overpayments recovered. Prior to April 1999, the BA did not separately identify costs relating purely to overpayment recovery across the whole BA.

The BA captures information on the value of recoveries made. The number of overpayments arising during 1998/99 totalled just over one million, and 707,000 have been raised so far this year. A monthly breakdown of the recovery figures for the last 12 months is attached, they also provide a breakdown showing Income Support (IS) and all benefits (including IS) as you have requested.

The BA does not normally seek repayment of overpayments less than £25. This is based on cost-effectiveness and in line with Government Accounting. However, there may be occasions when this is not adhered to, for example, when the overpayment has been quickly identified and the sum to be recovered is still likely to be held by the claimant and easily recoverable.

The BA recovers overpayments by deductions from ongoing benefits, instalments, by a lump sum, or by civil proceedings. Typically, the BA will firstly invite repayment and in the vast majority of cases, recovery is implemented by mutual agreement between the debtor and the BA.

Where the debtor remains in receipt of benefit and is not in a position to repay the overpayment immediately, recovery is normally pursued by deduction from ongoing benefit entitlement. This deduction can also be imposed compulsorily if no offer of repayment is forthcoming. Deductions from benefit, whether voluntary or compulsory, account for 74% of the overpayments currently being recovered.

Where customers are not in receipt of any benefit, repayments will be expected. A person's failure to respond to an invitation to repay (or making an unreasonable offer) could lead the BA to consider seeking recovery through a civil action. The threshold for acceptance for civil action is currently £150. There is a six year time limit on proceedings.

6.5% of overpayments currently being recovered have been subject to civil proceedings. The remaining are being recovered by other voluntary arrangements.

Policy on civil proceedings to recover overpayments is that litigation is not pursued where the debtor remains in receipt of benefit. For those not in receipt of benefit, litigation is pursued as a last resort where voluntary arrangements are unsuccessful or break down.

Recovery procedures follow guidance as provided in Government Accounting, where the recovery is likely to be detrimental to the health and/or welfare of the debtor or a member of their family, the Secretary of State has the power to exercise discretion and abandon recovery.

Recovery of an overpayment arising as a result of an official error is pursued if the overpayment is identified quickly and it is reasonable to expect the customer to have been aware of the overpayment. Duplicate payments are classed as over provisions of benefit and are recoverable under common law. The Secretary of State has a duty to seek recovery of such overpayments where it is cost effective to do so.

I hope this is helpful.

HEALTH

Ronkswood, Worcester

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost of providing temporary operating theatres at the NHS site at Ronkswood, Worcester. [104035]

Yvette Cooper: The cost of providing additional theatre capacity at the Ronkswood site of the Worcester Royal Infirmary National Health Service Trust is £491,000, forming part of an overall development of £1,699,000. The development, which enables certain services to be transferred from the Castle Street site in Worcester, will generate savings of £1,728,000 over a three-year period, thereby paying back the capital investment.

The development addresses a number of clinical safety issues, including the current separation of accident and emergency and trauma services at the Worcester Royal Infirmary, and the need for 24-hour anaesthetic cover and on-site paediatric cover.

Preventive Medicine

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate (a) NHS expenditure on cholesterol-lowering statins, on nicotine replacement therapy and on all smoking-cessation treatment for the three years of the Comprehensive Spending Review and (b) the cost-effectiveness in cost per discounted quality-adjusted life-year saved for treatment with statins, for nicotine-replacement therapy and for the range of smoking-cessation treatments. [104640]

Yvette Cooper: The estimated expenditure on cholesterol lowering statins for the three years of the Comprehensive Spending Review were as follows:

1999: £200 million

2000: £245 million

2001: £275 million.

In "Smoking Kills", published in December 1998, the Government announced that up to £60 million would be invested over three years in National Health Service services to help smokers to quit. £10 million has been invested in smoking cessation services in Health Action Zones in 1999–2000. No decision has yet been made about budgets for 2000–01 and 2001–02. It has been estimated that around 12.5 per cent. of the overall smoking cessation budget will be spent on one week's free nicotine replacement therapy for poorer smokers.

Estimates of cost effectiveness of these therapies exist in the literature, though not in the precise form requested. Copies of the following literature will be made available in the Library:

Parrott S, Godfrey C, Raw M, West R, McNeill A. Guidance for commissioners on the cost effectiveness of smoking cessation interventions. Thorax 1998;53 (Suppl 5, Part 2).

Minimum Wage

Mr. Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost to the NHS of the introduction of the minimum wage in the current and each of the next three financial years. [106793]

Mr. Denham: The introduction of the national minimum wage will add between £2–3 million to the National Health Service paybill from 1 April 1999.

Patients (Transfers)

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many patients were transferred from private hospitals to NHS hospitals in the last three years; [107430]

(2) how many deaths occurred in NHS hospitals of patients transferred from private hospitals in the last three years. [107431]

Ms Stuart: The information available is set out in the table:

Source of admission	Admissions	Deaths
1995–96
Non-NHS institution[1]	21,160	1,345
1996–97[2]
Non-NHS hospitals[1]	5,153	298
1997–98[3]
Non-NHS hospitals[1]	6,978	414

[1] In 1995–96 the code for 'non-National Health Service institution' included non-NHS hospitals, nursing homes, health care and residential institutions.

[2] In 1996–97 the category was sub-divided so that admissions from non-NHS hospitals formed a single classification.

[3] Figures for 1997–98 are provisional and no adjustments have been made for shortfalls in data.

Dentistry

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists have ceased to treat NHS patients in each of the past five years for which figures are available. [107727]

Mr. Hutton: There are a number of reasons why dentists leave the General Dental Services (GDS) including retirement and career breaks. The 1998–99 figures are inflated by the transfer of some dentists from the GDS to some Personal Dental Service pilots.

The available information for the number of dentists leaving the GDS for the years 1994–95 to 1998–99 is shown in the table.

Clinical Negligence Claims

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many claims were made against the NHS for clinical negligence in each of the last three years. [108174]

Ms Stuart: Historically, data on the number of claims made have not been collected centrally. Costs of clinical negligence claims are as follows:

1995–96: £173 million

1996–97: £235 million

1997–98: £144 million.

It should be noted, however, that changes to accounting practice required by the National Audit Office mean that these data are not directly comparable.

Scientists

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his oral statement of 14 December 1999, Official Report, column 35WH, how many trainee biomedical scientists have received a 26 per cent. pay rise. [108305]

Mr. Denham: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Thamesmead (Mr. Austin) on 31 January 2000, Official Report, column 453W.

NHS Finance

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list for each year since 1989–90 the amount in (a) cash and (b) real terms allocated to each NHS region (i) in total and (ii) on a per capita basis; [107408]

(2) if he will list for each year since 1989–90 the amount in (a) cash and (b) real terms provided to each health authority in the west midlands (i) in total and (ii) on a per capita basis. [107407]

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the Hospital and Community Health Services revenue allocation (a) for each health authority, (b) per head of population and (c) in each health authority in total, for each of the last five years. [107263]

Mr. Denham: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Health authorities have existed in their current form since 1 April 1996. Allocations are calculated in respect of individual health authorities based on the health authority weighted capitation formula. Prior to 1 April 1996 allocations were made to regional health authorities.

Tables showing the allocation, the allocation per crude head of population and the allocation per weighted head of population in cash real terms have been placed in the Library. The allocations for 2000–01 are not comparable with those for 1996–97 to 1998–99, which cover hospital and community hospital services only. 1999–2000 was the first year of unified allocations, which cover HCHS, prescribing and discretionary general medical services.

Includes increase for targeted funding for health authorities with health action zones.

Health Spending

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans there are for (a) hospital building and (b) total capital spending on the NHS over the period of the Comprehensive Spending Review. [108163]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is shown in tables A and B.

Table A:

Shows all major private finance initiative and public hospital development schemes that are currently either:

(a) approved and work has started on site, or

(b) under financial procurement.

Table B:

Shows total planned spending in the National Health Service over the period of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

1. For schemes still in early stages of development, estimates are based on highest costed option.
2. Figures may not sum due to rounding.
3. The capital value of PFI schemes are approximate and defined as:
Total capital cost to the private sector includes the cost of land construction, equipment and professional fees but excludes VAT, rolled up interest and financing costs such as bank arrangement fees, bank due diligence fees, banks' lawyers fees and third party equity costs. As PFI procures a service rather than the underlying asset, capital values shown are necessarily estimates.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the (a) weighted and (b) unweighted average spending by EU countries as a proportion of gross domestic product on public-funded and private-funded health systems has been for the last 20 years; and if he will set out the basis for the figures. [108303]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not collected by the Department. It is collected by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and can be obtained from the OECD 1999 health database.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the level of spending on the NHS at current prices in each of the last 20 years. [108304]

Mr. Denham: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on 2 February 2000, Official Report, column 630W.

Care Statistics

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the (a) mean and (b) median rate per 1,000 people aged 65 years and over in England of households receiving (i) intensive home care and (ii) community-based care for each of the last two years. [108346]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 3 February 2000]: The information available is in the table. The community based services which have been included are home help/care services, meals services and day centres. Information is only available on number of households for home help/care services.

Rates of "intensive[1]" home help/home care and [illegible] community-based[2]" care for England

	Rates per 1,000 people aged 65 and over
	1997		1998
	Mean rate	Median of rates	Mean rate	Median of rates
Households receiving "intensive" home help/care	15.4	15.6	17.6	19.1
All households receiving home help/care	61.5	58.3	57.0	55.5
People receiving meals at home, aged 65+	22.8	23.6	20.6	20.5
Attendances/attendees at day centres[3] of those aged 65+	21.3	19.6	14.9	14.6

[1] Intensive home help/home care is defined as households receiving six or more visits and total contact of five or more hours in a week.
[2] Community based services has been defined as those receiving home help/care, meals in their own homes and those attending day centres.
[3] In 1997, the number of attendances at day centres was collected. In 1998, there was a change in definition to collect attendees at day centres. Therefore figures for 1998 are not directly comparable with earlier years.

Smoking

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of people in England aged 16 years and over smoked in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999. [108342]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 3 February 2000]: The available information is given in the table:

1998–99	27

Notes:
1 The data are rounded to the nearest whole figure.
2 The sample size for England was 13,381 in 1996–97 and 12,295 in 1998–99.

Amputations (Ethics)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent discussions he has had with the BMA concerning the ethics of amputating healthy limbs as a way of addressing a mental health problem. [108577]

Mr. Hutton: No discussions have taken place with the British Medical Association concerning the ethics of amputating healthy limbs as a way of addressing a mental health problem.

Doctors' decisions about treatment and care for a patient are based on a thorough assessment of the individual's condition, taking account of the patient's needs and wishes, the evidence base for the effectiveness of treatment, and the resources available.

Primary Care Groups

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if it is the Government's intention that the support of a primary care group and its constituent general practitioners will be required by the Secretary of State before he approves its progression to primary care trust status. [108870]

Mr. Denham: Each application for Primary Care Trust (PCT) status will be carefully considered against the national criteria published in Health Service Circular 'HSC 1999/167'. This guidance makes clear that those wishing to form PCTs should demonstrate broad local support and include the relevant Primary Care Group, constituent general practitioners, community and practice nurses, other clinical professional staff and partner organisations in their consultations.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 1 February 2000, Official Report, column 565W, on waiting lists, for what reason he did not list the weeks in which information on waiting lists would be published in the next 12 months. [108764]

Mr. Denham: Because it is not usual practice under this Government or the previous Government for the Department to announce publication dates of official statistics more than one month in advance.

GP Training

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to develop continuing medical training and education for general practitioners. [108509]

Mr. Denham: Continuing professional development (CPD) in general practice is important. Learning must be lifelong and cannot cease at the end of formal training. To provide the best possible service to their patients general practitioners should keep up to date with advances in patient care and continually review and improve their knowledge, skills and abilities. We are considering proposals for developing CPD in primary care, building on the many examples of good work already being done by GPs and extending these principles to all primary care staff.

HIV/AIDS

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of trends in the number of HIV/AIDS related deaths; and if he will make a statement. [108513]

Yvette Cooper: An estimate of the trend in HIV/AIDS related deaths has been made by looking at the number of deaths reported by the end of the year in which they occurred for the last decade. Since 1990 the number of HIV/AIDS related deaths rose each year until 1994 and then declined so that in 1998 they were less than a third of those in the mid-1990s. This decrease was maintained in 1999, but without further decline from the 1998 number of deaths.

Prison Health Care

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to develop prison health care. [108511]

Mr. Hutton: We have accepted the recommendations made in the report on 'The Future Organisation of Prison Health Care' published last year[1]. Two new joint Prison Service/National Health Service Executive units are being established: a prison healthcare task force and a prison health policy unit to help support and lead the reform of prison healthcare.

Prisons and health authorities are being asked to examine together the health needs of prisoners, identify appropriate services to meet those needs and effective ways of delivery. This work is being co-ordinated by the Prison Health Task Force, supported by Prison Service Area Managers and the NHS regional offices, and early pilots are underway in 12 prisons. More generally ten joint Prison Service/NHS Executive regional seminars were held in the past three months to help reinforce links and support joint planning.

Homeless People

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to combat mental health problems amongst the homeless. [108510]

Mr. Hutton: The Department is working with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to fund services through the Homeless Mentally Ill Initiative in line with the principles of the Government's national strategy for rough sleeping.

We are making available £9.6 million for 1999–2000 to 2001–02 to provide services for homeless people with mental health problems in London. An additional £1 million is being provided in 2000–01 to support additional specialist mental health workers and housing and resettlement services to support the launch of our strategy to reduce rough sleeping in England by two thirds by 2002.

21 areas outside London with rough sleeping problems are receiving funding of £4.5 million over 1999–2000 to 2001–02 for local authorities to provide social care services for the homeless mentally ill. This is mainly in the form of specialist mental health support workers who work as part of a team doing outreach work and undertaking assessments of needs.

The needs of the homeless mentally ill will also be addressed through the Mental Health National Service Framework. Standard one of the Framework relates to health promotion and specifically highlights the homeless as one of the vulnerable population groups whose mental health, local authorities and health authorities should seek to improve.

Spongiform Encephalopathies

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the proliferation of spongiform encephalopathies. [108508]

Yvette Cooper: Sporadic Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease (CJD) is the most common form of spongiform encephalopathy in people, with an incidence in the United Kingdom and world-wide of approximately one per million of the population, per year. For variant CJD—the form of CJD linked to exposure to the BSE agent—a total of 52 definite or probable cases have so far been confirmed in the UK. The Department publish data on the incidence of all types of CJD in a monthly press release. The next one will be issued Monday 7 February. Copies will be available in the Library.

There are on-going assessments of spongiform encephalopathies made by the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee and its sub-committees.

Blood

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of blood provision within the National Health Service. [108512]

Mr. Denham: Progressively over the last two years the blood service has become more integrated into the National Health Service, building a partnership to ensure a high standard of patient care. There has been steady recruitment of donors, an ongoing modernisation of donor services and a reliable supply of blood.

To ensure that there continues to be an adequate and safe supply of blood used effectively in first class transfusion practice, we required NHS trusts to ensure from March 1999 that hospital transfusion committees were in place to oversee all aspects of blood transfusion. We also required them to have agreed by March 2000 local transfusion protocols to ensure the safest and most effective use of blood and we will audit the outcome.

NHS Patients (Forms)

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reports he has received about NHS patients needing major surgery using forms E111 and E112 to obtain faster treatment. [108778]

Ms Stuart: Form E111 provides entitlement to immediately necessary treatment for conditions arising during a temporary visit to another European Economic Area Member state. Only a minority of emergency treatments involve major surgery. Referrals specifically for treatment of pre-existing conditions require Form E112, and each application is considered individually by the patient's health authority and by the Department. The criteria for a successful application are based on medial and social considerations. Full information is given in the Department's leaflet "Health Advice for Travellers", copies of which are available in the Library. We have received no recent representation on the subject.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 2 February 2000, Official Report, column 630W, if he will list the values of UK total gross NHS expenditure which underlie his estimates of UK total gross NHS expenditure as a percentage of GDP. [108989]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is set out in the table.

£ million

Year	United Kingdom total gross NHS expenditure in cash terms
1978–79	8,103
1979–80	9,633
1980–81	12,486
1981–82	14,041

TREASURY

Bank of England (Profits)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what profit the Bank of England made on its (a) foreign exchange and (b) gold dealings in each of the last three years. [108447]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 4 February 2000]: The 1997–98 accounts of the Exchange Equalisation Account, the account at the Bank of England which holds the United Kingdom's foreign currency and gold reserves, published on 26 January, provides details of the return earned by the Treasury on the foreign currency reserves. This was the first time the Exchange Equalisation Account has ever been published. The accounts for 1998–99 will be published once the National Audit Office have completed their audit.

Working Families Tax Credit

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families have benefited from the working families tax credit in (a) Staffordshire, Moorlands, (b) North Staffordshire and (c) Staffordshire. [107190]

Dawn Primarolo: Reliable estimates for the number of families in receipt of the Working Families Tax Credit are not yet available on a constituency or county basis, but will be available shortly.

Disabled Persons Tax Credit

Angela Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to encourage take-up of the disabled persons tax credit. [107186]

Dawn Primarolo: Disabled Person's Tax Credit has been advertised through a number of different media in order to attract attention in various ways.

A national press campaign began in October, with a national radio campaign in November. Both gave a freephone number for further information.

This was supported by providing a free supply of information leaflets and posters to over 21,000 welfare organisations such as Citizen's Advice Bureaux, disability and welfare groups.

An audio tape and video were produced featuring DPTC and these were distributed free through RNIB and RNID.

Ten ministerial roadshows promoted DPTC to delegates from local welfare organisations throughout October.

Leaflets and a video about DPTC also featured in main post offices throughout October.

Tax Inquiries (Belgium)

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the backlog of information to be provided by the Inland Revenue about the affairs of named United Kingdom taxpayers requested by the Belgian tax authorities; [108375]

(2) what arrangements exist for the provision of information by the Inland Revenue about the tax affairs of United Kingdom taxpayers to the Belgian tax authorities; and under what powers this is done. [108376]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 3 February 2000]: Inland Revenue procedures for dealing with requests for information received from other fiscal authorities are set out in the report of the National Audit Office "Exchange of Information on Direct Taxation within the European Union" of November 1997. A copy of this report is available in the Library of the House. The UK exchanges taxpayer information under the provisions of the EC Mutual Assistance Directive, as given effect under section 77, Finance Act 1978, and under the terms of the Double Taxation Agreement with Belgium, as given effect under section 788, Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals who qualified for retirement relief from capital gains tax made chargeable gains of less than £250,000 for capital gains tax purposes in tax years (a) 1992–93, (b) 1993–94, (c) 1994–95, (d) 1995–96 and (e) 1996–97. [108804]

Dawn Primarolo: The estimated number of individuals who claimed capital gains tax retirement relief of less than £250,000 for the years 1992–93 to 1996–97 is given in the table.

Year	Estimated number of retirement relief claims less than £250,000
1992–93	2,750
1993–94	4,500
1994–95	3,750
1995–96	5,750
1996–97	9,750

Foreign Earnings

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals qualified for the foreign earnings deduction for income tax purposes in tax years (a) 1992–93, (b) 1993–94, (c) 1994–95, (d) 1995–96 and (e) 1996–97. [108802]

Dawn Primarolo: This information has only been available since Self Assessment was introduced in 1996–97. About 35,000 people received a foreign earnings deduction for this year.

Company Car Drivers (Insurance)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce a duty on insurance premiums for company car drivers; and if he will make a statement. [108382]

Dawn Primarolo: There are no plans to introduce a duty on insurance premiums for company car drivers.

VAT (Church Repairs)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what legal advice he has received on the application of a derogation under the 6 VAT Directive to exempt church repairs from VAT or allow a lower rate of VAT on such repairs. [108187]

Dawn Primarolo: Derogations are normally permitted only to simplify the procedure for charging VAT or to prevent tax evasion or avoidance. It would therefore be inappropriate to seek a derogation for church repairs. EC law does not permit an exemption or a reduced rate for church repairs.

Tax Competition

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will deposit in the Library a copy of the (a) OECD report on offshore centres of tax competition and (b) code of conduct paper discussed at ECOFIN on 29 November 1999; and if he will make a statement. [108280]

Dawn Primarolo: A copy of the OECD report "Harmful Tax Competition: An Emerging Issue" has already been deposited in the House of Commons Library.

The Code of Conduct states that it is for ECOFIN to decide whether to publish the final report. The UK is pressing for the report to be published.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 6 December 1999, Official Report, columns 398–400W, what restrictions were placed on contractors carrying out research projects funded by his Department in 1999 in respect of them discussing their findings with journalists (a) before and (b) after publication. [108192]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor's Department has not sought to control or veto contacts between contracted researchers and journalists, before or after publication, but does require that the researchers provide advance notice and/or brief details of the interview. For further details the hon. Member should consult the copies of the standard form of contract placed in the Library as indicated in my written answer of 4 February 2000, Official Report, column 764W.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the dates since 16 December 1999 on which he (a) met and (b) spoke by telephone with the French Minister of Agriculture and Fish. [108426]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 3 February 2000]: I met the French Agriculture Minister on 24 January at a meeting of the EU Agriculture Council.

Farming (Berkshire)

Mrs. May: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total number of pig units in Berkshire in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99. [108422]

Ms Quin [holding answer 3 February 2000]: Information on the number of holdings with pigs is provided in the table.

Suicide Rates

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what have been the rates of suicides among (a) farmers and (b) vets in each of the last 10 years. [108503]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 February 2000]: The number of suicides and deaths from undetermined injury between 1988–98 is set out in the table.

Farm Acreages

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average acreage of land of a farm in England and Wales in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [108172]

Ms Quin: The information requested is provided in the table:

Number and area of main holdings in England and Wales: June 1999

Over-30-months Scheme

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food at what point ownership of a cow over 30 months old transfers to the Intervention Board under the over-30-months scheme in the case where a livestock market is used as a collection centre and animals are tagged by the Board at that centre. [108130]

Ms Quin: For the purpose of the Over-30-months scheme the Intervention Board does not take ownership of the cattle until they are presented for slaughter, and it is at this point that eligibility for compensation is determined. Producers have the option of submitting animals into the scheme directly to abattoirs on a deadweight basis, or via auction markets who act as agents for producers in submitting animals into the scheme on a liveweight basis. At auction markets animals undergo preliminary eligibility checks, in particular weighing. A further tag is inserted in the animal's ear at this stage for ease of identification purposes only.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the operational and cost consequences for farmers and the livestock trade in the north-west of the decision by the Intervention Board to withdraw the Nottingham processing company from the over 30 months scheme. [105297]

Ms Quin [holding answer 19 January 2000]: Sufficient Over-30-months Scheme (OTMS) slaughtering capacity has been contracted from the abattoirs at Oldham, Great Harwood and Ulverston, such that there will be little, if any effect on the farming community in the north-west as a consequence of the non-award of an OTMS slaughtering contract to the Nottingham abattoir.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the financial checks which are made on companies competing for over 30 months scheme contracts. [105293]

Ms Quin [holding answer 19 January 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles), on 24 January 2000, Official Report, column 9W.

Meat and Bonemeal

Mr. John Cryer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the location of each site where meat and bone meal is stored prior to incineration and the tonnage stored at each of these sites. [107933]

Ms Quin: At 31 December 1999 stocks of meat and bone meal produced from the rendering of animals under the Over-30-Month Scheme and Selective Cull Scheme were estimated at 459,712 tonnes. The material is stored at 15 locations in the UK as shown in the table.

Pig Industry

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received regarding EU grants for exceptional occurrences within the pig industry; and what action he has taken. [R] [107472]

Ms Quin: We have received no representations and there are no such EU grants. MAFF Ministers continue to follow closely developments in the pig sector.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with the European Agriculture Commissioner regarding payments to the pig industry to offset the cost of exceptional occurrences resulting from BSE in cattle. [R] [107471]

Ms Quin: My right hon. Friend has many discussions with Mr. Fischler on all manner of topics. The Minister and I last discussed state aid in the pig sector with Mr. Fischler in the margins of the Agriculture Council on Monday 24 January.

Red Tape Review

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will implement the recommendations of the Pooley report. [R] [107473]

Ms Quin: As indicated in the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Dr. Naysmith), 1 February 2000, Official Report, column 570W, we have placed in the Library of the House a copy of the Government's response to the report of the Meat Industry Red Tape Working Group. This indicates that we have accepted most of the recommendations in the report. Some of these can be implemented straight away but others will require discussions in Brussels with the EU Commission and others (including the industry) before they can be fully implemented. Nevertheless, it is our intention that this should be done as speedily as possible. From April most of the recommendations will be for the Food Standards Agency to carry forward.

Farming (Worcestershire)

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 25 January 2000, Official Report, column 188W, if he will list the amounts received by each of the 10 largest recipients of CAP payments made to farms in Worcestershire for the calendar year 1998. [107513]

Ms Quin: The amounts received by the 10 largest recipients of CAP payments in Worcestershire for the calendar year 1998 were:

£295,311.52
£212,553.75
£209,935.30
£164,103.59
£135,969.63
£133,134.44
£125,069.15
£113,926.16
£113,579.34
£112,654.25.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the likely impact of the climate change levy on the horticulture sector; and if he will publish the results. [107236]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 27 January 2000]: It is not possible to say what the likely impact of the levy on the horticulture sector will be. That will depend on a number of factors including future energy consumption and what use the sector makes of electricity generated from 'new' renewable sources of energy or in 'good quality' combined heat and power plants. The use the sector makes of the proposed system of enhanced capital allowances for energy saving investments will also have an impact. The horticultural industry, in common with other industries, will also benefit from the lower overall rates of the levy announced by the Chancellor in his pre-Budget report statement.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of written parliamentary questions to him received a response within (a) two weeks and (b) one month in the last year for which figures are available. [106988]

Mr. Morley: In the 1999 calendar year, 1,117 parliamentary questions were tabled to my right hon. Friend the Minister for written answer. From the date of their initial appearance in the Order Paper, 72 per cent. received a response within two weeks and 15 per cent. received a response within one month.

Cattle Tuberculosis

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the Independent Scientific Group on Cattle Tuberculosis will publish its second report. [109244]

Ms Quin: I am pleased to tell the House that the second report by the Independent Scientific Group on Cattle Tuberculosis is published today. The report sets out progress made so far on the wide-ranging research measures being taken to combat cattle TB as well as plans for work to be undertaken in the future. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Easter Floods (1998)

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress the Environment Agency has made in implementing its action plan in response to the independent report on the Easter 1998 floods. [109243]

Mr. Morley: While there were no further specific actions timed for completion by the end of December 1999, the Environment Agency has nevertheless kept the Ministry informed of progress up to that date.

For flood forecasting, all of the Environment Agency's regions are working on delivering the first phase of their hydrometric monitoring network improvement programmes by April 2000.

The work relating to flood warning is progressing well. The National Flood Warning Centre is established and the necessary relationships with other national bodies are being actively developed.

Flood risk maps have been produced and were disseminated to local planning authorities and emergency planners in September 1999. The Agency is using the maps to identify high-risk properties on a consistent basis to aid targeting of direct warnings and public awareness material. Local authorities are using the maps for both development control and emergency planning purposes. The information in the maps will be made publicly available so that people can make informed decisions about flood risks.

The Agency has further improved liaison arrangements with local authorities and emergency services, at both local and national level to ensure effective response to flooding incidents.

A flood warning public awareness campaign commenced in October. Plans are being developed for revised flood warning codes to be introduced in September 2000, with appropriate publicity.

Visual inspection of all flood defences continues against a deadline of April 2000. The Agency has set up meetings to resolve isolated problems where local authorities have not always been able to identify the location of defences on ordinary watercourses.

The Agency continues its work in implementing the recommendations in the independent report on its management and skills.

I am pleased to note the Agency's continuing progress in implementing the Easter Floods report, contributing to achievement of the Ministerial priority of a seamless and integrated service of flood forecasting, warning and response.

I shall ensure that the House is updated on progress in implementing the final phases of the Action Plan, including the introduction of new flood warning codes in September 2000.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Police Authority

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the official visits made by executive and non-executive members of the Northern Ireland Police Authority outside Northern Ireland in the past three years, indicating in each case (a) who authorised the visit, (b) the cost of the visit to public funds and (c) if non-members' costs were borne by the taxpayer. [103566]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 20 December 1999]: During the three years referred to in the question, the number of executive members of the Police Authority have averaged around 3,300, many of whom will have subsequently retired, resigned or been transferred to other Government Departments. Information on official visits made by executive members outside Northern Ireland is not readily available and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Official visits made by non-executive members of the Police Authority in the past three years are summarised in the table. All visits were authorised by the Police Authority and the associated costs met from public funds.

Location	Number of individual visits	Total cost (£)
England	44	15,647
Scotland	1	540
Republic of Ireland	1	116
Europe	3	4,298
USA	5	20,994
Canada	2	6,300
Australia	2	6,835

Terrorism Legislation

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission's response to the White Paper, "Legislation Against Terrorism". [108530]

Mr. Ingram: A consultation paper "Legislation Against Terrorism" (Cm 4178) was published by the Government in December 1998 and was followed by a period of consultation. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission responded in April 1999. In all, the Government received a total of 80 responses from interested groups, practitioners and members of the public.

The Human Rights Commission's response was considered closely as were all the responses to the White paper and an analysis of the responses was set out in a brief summary compiled by the Home Office, excluding 29 respondees whose representations were to remain confidential. The previous Secretary of State also met Professor Dickson, Chief Commissioner, in July 1999 to discuss their response and particularly their proposed approach to counter-terrorist legislation.

The Government published the Terrorism Bill on 2 December 1999. In preparing this it drew on the advice Lord Lloyd of Berwick gave in his report on the future of Counter-Terrorism Legislation published in December 1996, and took into account the views expressed by those who responded to the consultation paper. My officials and legal advisers have also met with the Human Rights Commission following introduction of the Bill to discuss the new legislation in detail and address any ECHR compatibility issues they have raised.

In parallel with the passage of the Terrorism Bill, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has commissioned a review of the Diplock Court system. This was announced during the Bill's Second Reading on 14 December 1999. The Diplock Review Group has invited comment from legal and human rights bodies and I have written to Northern Ireland political parties for their views. Any responses will be considered by the Group in preparing its report for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Oath of Allegiance

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many letters he has received since 1 May 1997 on (a) constituency matters and (b) other matters of Government policy from each of those Members of the House who have not taken the oath of allegiance. [108406]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 3 February 2000]: I am unable to provide this information on the basis that correspondence, including the number of letters sent, between Members of the House and Government Departments is a confidential matter.

Police Association

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions in each of the past five years he has received written representations from each of the three sections of the Police Association. [108488]

Mr. Ingram: This information is not readily available and could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Disability Rights Commission

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance he has given the Disability Rights Commission on discharging its functions. [109354]

Ms Hodge: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has written to Bert Massie, the Chair of the Disability Rights Commission, to offer broad guidance on how we see the body discharging its functions and priorities and the tasks to which the Government attaches particular importance in its first year of operation. We will look to the Commission to ensure that its first set of strategic priorities, and subsequently, its first corporate plan, reflect the guidance in the letter. A copy of the letter has been placed in the Library.

Pensions Mis-selling

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the time currently taken, in the context of pensions mis-selling, for the Teachers Pensions Agency to complete the reinstatement process once the Agency has been notified; and if he will make a statement. [109223]

Mr. Wicks: The average time taken to complete a re-instatement case is 14 weeks, measured from the time Teachers' Pensions are notified that mis-selling has taken place. Cases which take longer than the average are frequently the result of the personal pensions provider failing to act on the re-instatement quotation within the three month period for which the quotation is guaranteed. Some 25 per cent. of restoration quotations have to be re-calculated for this reason.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps are being taken to reduce the time taken to rectify pensions mis-selling to teachers in England and Wales. [109222]

Mr. Wicks: A number of initiatives have been introduced by Teachers' Pensions to streamline the reinstatement processes. These include improvements to their computer systems; the introduction of a dedicated e-mail address; regular contact between Teachers' Pensions staff and personal pension providers; and monthly productivity targets.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many staff have been allocated by (a) the Teachers Pensions Agency and (b) the Government Actuary's Department solely to rectify the mis-selling of pensions to teachers. [109224]

Mr. Wicks: The administration of the teachers' pension scheme is undertaken under contract by Teachers' Pensions, part of Capita Business Services Ltd. Sixteen staff within Teachers' Pensions work exclusively on the restoration of pension benefits of those teachers who have been mis-sold a personal pension. The Government Actuary's Department does not have any staff dedicated solely to this work. Advice on mis-selling cases is provided by staff who carry out a range of functions on behalf of this Department.

Quality Assurance Agency

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the annual cost of the Quality Assurance Agency Subject Review for Universities. [109207]

Mr. Wicks: The Higher Education Funding Council for England has a statutory duty to make provision for assessing the quality of education provided in institutions for whose activities it provides financial support. It currently contracts with the Quality Assurance Agency to carry out subject reviews on its behalf. In 1998–99 QAA carried out 233 subject reviews in England at a cost of £4.2 million. For 1999–2000 QAA is contracted to carry out 375 subject reviews in England at a cost of £5.6 million.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what is the total number of person hours that the Quality Assurance Agency Subject Review assessors spent away from their own universities and colleges on work for the review in the last 12 months for which figures are available; [109204]

(2) what was the total number of person hours spent by Quality Assurance Agency Subject Review assessors on work for the Review in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [109205]

Mr. Wicks: The information is not held in the form requested.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the (a) names, (b) departments and (c) educational establishments of the assessors employed by the Quality Assurance Agency for its subject review for universities. [109206]

Mr. Wicks: The information is not available in the form requested.

At the end of each cycle of reviews a subject overview report is published which includes the names of all assessors involved in that cycle. Copies of overview reports have been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Education Service (Islington)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish an annual report on the performance, costs and profit of the contractor appointed to run Islington's education service. [108875]

Ms Estelle Morris: Islington Council have signed, and are therefore responsible for, the education services contract with Cambridge Education Associates (CEA at Islington). Their council papers have made known the fact that the cost of the seven year contract is fixed at £86.6 million and that CEA agreed to cap their target related management fee at £600,000 net per annum. CEA are working to clear specifications and if they do not deliver they will not be rewarded. 50 per cent. of their profit is linked directly to standards. All changes in standards will be reflected in the published performance tables.

The London Borough of Islington is overseeing the tight contract monitoring arrangements with the assistance of DfEE officials. It is therefore up to Islington Council to decide whether they wish to publish an annual report regarding the monitoring of the contract.

New Deal

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what arrangements are offered to young people on disability benefits who wish to join the New Deal and who are recovering from drug and alcohol misuse. [108606]

Ms Hodge: Young people on incapacity benefits are not eligible for New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds which is designed for jobseekers actively looking for work. However, we are developing initiatives to ensure that all disabled people who want to work are given the help they need. For example, the New Deal for Disabled People offers personal adviser support in 12 pilot areas to people of all ages on incapacity benefits. The personal adviser offers an individually designed programme to tackle the specific needs of each client, including any who may need to overcome drug or alcohol misuse. We hope to make an early announcement about the next stage of the New Deal for Disabled People taking account of emerging findings from the pilots.

Class Sizes

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is his estimate of the cost of introducing a maximum class size of (a) 30 pupils, (b) 28 pupils and (c) 25 pupils for (i) Key Stage 1, (ii) Key Stage 2, (iii) Key Stage 3 and (iv) Key Stage 4. [108866]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have made available £620 million to reduce Key Stage 1 class sizes to 30 by September 2001.

We have estimated that the cost of reducing class sizes to 25 for all primary school children would be around £3 billion.

We have not made any other estimates of the costs which the hon. Member asks about.

School Meals

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to enforce minimum nutritional standards in school meals. [108442]

Jacqui Smith: The Government believe it is very important that children should be able to have healthy and enjoyable school meals. We have consulted widely on the introduction of minimum nutritional standards for school lunches, and we are currently considering representations on our draft Regulations and guidance. Schools and local education authorities will be under a duty to comply with the Regulations, to be laid this year, which will set out the new standards. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will investigate any complaints that the standards are not being met and could issue a direction to ensure compliance with the statutory duties.

Students (Argyll and Bute)

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will estimate how many students from Argyll and Bute are currently attending universities in (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) Northern Ireland. [108578]

Mr. Wicks: The information is given in the table.

Students[1] from Argyll and Bute local authority area studying in higher education institutions 1998–99

Country of study	Number of students
England	246
Wales	12
Northern Ireland	2

[1] Full-time and part-time students, excluding students on sabbatical or writing up theses.

Homophobic Bullying

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent reports he has received of homophobic bullying in schools; and if he will make a statement. [108313]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 3 February 2000]: In March 1998 we received from Stonewall a copy of the report "Playing it Safe", which they commissioned with the Terrence Higgins Trust. This contains, among other things, evidence and recommendations on homophobic-related bullying. And in October 1998 the noble Lord Tope's unstarred question in the Other Place about bullying in secondary schools focused to a large extent on the problem of homophobic bullying.

We attach a high priority to helping schools prevent and combat bullying in whatever form—be it racial, or as a result of a child's appearance, behaviour or special needs, or related to sexual orientation.

Teachers' Pay (West Sussex)

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the cost of the teachers' pay rise to West Sussex Education Authority. [109059]

Ms Estelle Morris: In his written answer on 1 February 2000, Official Report, column 498W, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment made clear his assessment that the pay settlement would be affordable within the resources available to local authorities in 2000–01. The cost from 1 April 2000 will be 3.3 per cent., with assimilation costs of around 0.1 per cent. West Sussex will receive an increase in its Education Standard Spending Assessment of 6.11 per cent., which takes account of changes in local authority function. Its share of the £50 million special grant to support school budgets will add the equivalent of a further 0.2 per cent. to this. The rescheduling of increased employers' contributions to teachers' pensions will save the authority 0.7 per cent. of the cost of its teachers' pay bill.

Playing Fields

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what data he has collated on the extent of access by schools to sports playing fields since May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [108118]

Jacqui Smith: The Education (School Premises) Regulations 1999 (SPRs) prescribe minimum areas, as well as quality standards, for team game playing fields for which schools must have access. No data have been gathered on the extent of access which schools have to sports playing fields since May 1997, or before.

Data being obtained through Asset Management Plans will eventually provide a comprehensive picture of the number and condition of school playing fields throughout England.

School Sports

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the total cost of sport played in schools in the most recent year for which figures are available; what organisations other than his Department provide funds for sport in schools; and if he will estimate the amount of such other funding in the most recent year for which information is available. [108297]

Jacqui Smith: Schools and Local Education Authorities (LEAs) decide how much to spend on sport in schools. We do not collect centrally information on this support. However there are a number of organisations which support sport in schools nationally, and many others which give support at a local level. Sport England, the Sports Lottery distributor, spent £14.4 million in schools and colleges in 1998–99. The National Sports Governing Bodies also contribute a great deal at national and local level through coaching and talent development schemes and competitions involving schools. We are working closely with DCMS, OFSTED, QCA and national PE and sport bodies to further develop and expand the range and quality of opportunities available to all young people.

Ethnic Minority Achievement Grant

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to develop the Ethnic Minority Achievement Grant. [108517]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 7 February 2000]: As part of the drive to raise the achievement of ethnic minority pupils, we are making available more money than ever before through the Ethnic Minority and Traveller Achievement Grant. For 2000–01, £162.5 million will be available to LEAs to improve the attainment of ethnic minority, Traveller and refugee pupils, an increase of 7 per cent on the amount available for these purposes in 1999–2000. From April 2000, we are phasing in a needs-based formula for allocating the Grant for raising ethnic minority achievement. Increasingly, as we build up for the first time a national picture of achievement levels, we will target the Grant at those who need it most. In further developing the Grant we will seek to embed in local strategies the knowledge we are acquiring about good practice in raising achievement levels.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Departmental Secondments

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many staff were seconded from the private sector to her Department from (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to the latest date for which figures are available, stating in each case the companies from which staff have been seconded. [109069]

Clare Short: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Educatica, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

During the respective periods, the numbers of staff seconded to my Department from the private sector, all from NRI/University of Greenwich, were:

(a) 3

(b) 4

(c) 1.

Child Care

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what child care provision was made available in the financial year 1998–99 for use by (a) departmental staff and (b) employees of executive agencies under the control of her Department; what was the cost to parents of this child care; and how many parents used the facilities. [108859]

Clare Short: We provide holiday playschemes at both our Headquarter sites.

The site in East Kilbride operates under partnership between DFID and the Inland Revenue. The site in London is part of the Whitehall Holiday Playscheme, run by the Cabinet Office at three sites in Central London and open to a large proportion of Government Departments. The figures requested are as follows:

East Kilbride

Cost to parents:

£10 annual registration fee per family

£7.50 per child per day

Parents using the facilities in the financial year 1998–99:

Number—10

London

Cost to parents:

Total cost per child per day £17.03

Of which: £8.51 is paid by the parent and £8.52 by DFID

Parents using the facilities in the financial year 1998–99

Number—16.

Providing access to the holiday playscheme is one of a range of family friendly policies that are available to staff. Other benefits include paid maternity leave at full pay, paternity leave, parental leave, extended career breaks (up to a maximum of five years) and special leave for domestic emergencies. To help staff balance work and family life, they are also able to apply to work part-time or flexible hours, to job-share or to work from home.

The Department for International Development has no executive agencies.

Sudan (Oil Fields)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department has made concerning the use of the oil revenue from the Sudanese oil fields being used for development projects. [108799]

Clare Short: Oil was first exported from Sudan in August 1999 and the Government of Sudan has a 5 per cent. stake. We have pressed for revenues to be used for development projects and for transparency in the oil account. The Government of Sudan has made public assurances that this will happen. We look to them to honour them. But the key issue for Sudan's development is the ongoing civil war. We are encouraging all sides to play a constructive part in current peace talks.

Land Mines Clearance

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent representations she has received concerning the Dervish anti-personnel land mines clearance project. [108617]

Clare Short: In December 1999, we invited proposals for UK based institutions and individuals for consideration under the Humanitarian Mine Action Knowledge Generation and Research Programme. The University of Edinburgh's Department of Mechanical Engineering submitted an application entitled 'Extending Dervish Mine Detonating Vehicle Capability'. All bidders will be assessed later this month.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what research her Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the effectiveness of methods currently in use for anti-personnel land mines clearance. [108619]

Clare Short: (a) My Department is funding, at the request of the United Nations, a study which will examine the effectiveness and suitability of existing capabilities in current mine action programmes. We are also funding a review and revision of international mine clearance standards.

(b) We participate in international fora which aim to improve the effectiveness of international mine action. Projects funded bilaterally by DFID are assessed and monitored for effectiveness and safety of methodology and for community benefit.

Know-how Fund (Estonia)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps she is taking to increase the application of the Know-how Fund to Estonia. [108581]

Clare Short: 1. Our plans for technical assistance to Estonia are set out in the published Baltic States Country Strategy Paper (CSP), which covers Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. A copy of the CSP has been placed in the Library of the House.

2. The strategy focuses on:

i. Strengthening capacity in strategic planning and project design in environment, enabling effective take-up of both domestic and donor funding.

ii. Strengthening capacity in strategic participatory planning for regional and rural development.

iii. Effective public administration, underpinning sound policy development and service delivery to all sections of the population.

3. We are working closely with other donors, notably the EC Phare programme in all three of the above priority areas.

Aid Targets

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made in meeting the target of (a) 75 per cent. of bilateral country programme resources being allocated to low income countries by 2002, (b) reducing under-6 mortality rates to no higher than 70 per 1,000 live births by 2002 and (c) reducing maternal mortality rates to no higher than 240 per 100,000 live births by 2002. [109192]

Clare Short: Substantial progress has been made towards achieving these targets. By 1998–99 our expenditure in low income countries had increased to 71 per cent., and is expected to rise to 75 per cent. in 1999–2000. The average under-5 mortality rate across the top 30 recipients of DFID assistance has fallen to 69 per 1,000 births, and the average maternal mortality rate across the same countries has declined to 316 per 100,000 live births.

Project Targets

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the progress made towards meeting the target of 75 per cent. of projects assessed as likely to fully or largely achieve their objectives by 2002. [109200]

Clare Short: We are well on track towards achieving this target. Of all the projects assessed in 1997 and 1998, over 74 per cent. had fully or largely achieved their objectives. Information is not yet available on results for 1999.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Home Buying

17. Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his proposals to streamline the home buying and selling process. [107323]

Mr. Mullin: On 11 October last year we announced our intention to take forward a package of complementary measures aimed at making the home buying and selling process in England and Wales faster, more transparent and consumer-friendly. The package is based on extensive research and consultation, and requires action by everyone involved in home buying and selling.

Local Councils

18. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has had from local councils which wish to retain the committee system. [107324]

Ms Armstrong: We receive many representations from councils about all aspects of the modernisation agenda.

Rural Transport

19. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to address the concerns of people living in rural areas about the impact of his Department's transport policies. [107325]

Mr. Mullin: My Department's transport policies are tackling the impact of decades of underinvestment and neglect for transport in both rural and urban areas. Most of the proposals in the Integrated Transport White Paper apply to rural areas just as much as other areas of the country. But we recognise that people living in rural areas have particular needs. That is why we have made available an additional £170 million for rural transport measures over the three years to March 2001.

26. Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to improve rural transport. [107332]

Mr. Mullin: Most of the proposals in the Integrated Transport White Paper apply to rural areas just as much as other areas of the country. But we recognise that people living in rural areas have particular needs. That is why we have made available an additional £170 million pounds for rural transport measures over the three years to March 2001.

London Underground

20. Mr. John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on negotiations towards a public private partnership for the London Underground. [107326]

Mr. Hill: Excellent progress has been made. Bids for the two deep-Tube PPP contracts are due back by the end of next month. There has been strong interest in the Sub-surface lines and property PPP competitions as well. Submissions to pre-qualify for those contracts are due back later this month.

Regional Development Agencies

21. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the regional economic strategy prepared by the Eastern regional development agency. [107327]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The East of England Development Agency (EEDA) submitted its strategy for the East of England, "Moving Forward," to Ministers on 26 October. The Government responded to EEDA and the other RDAs on 12 January. Copies of the responses have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the rates of pay offered to the chairmen of regional development agencies. [109434]

Ms Armstrong: I refer to the reply given by the Minister for Trade, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) on 23 July 1998, Official Report, columns 668–69W, on the rates of pay offered to board members of Regional Development Agencies. When appointed in December 1998 the Chairmen were contracted for two days per week with an annual remuneration of £44,000.

I have now agreed that the Chairmen of the RDAs in the East Midlands, West Midlands and North East will be contracted to work on RDA business for three days a week from 1 October 1999 until 31 March 2000. Their rate of pay will be increased pro rata to £66,000. The Chairman of the North West Development Agency will be contracted on these revised terms from 1 November 1999 until 31 March 2000.

Regeneration

22. Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps the Government are taking to regenerate the north-west. [107328]

Ms Beverley Hughes: One of the main steps that the Government have taken is in establishing the North West Development Agency on 1 April 1999. With a total budget of over £176 million for 1999–2000, it has developed and is starting to implement a strategy for regenerating the north-west.

Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps the Government are taking to promote the regeneration of disadvantaged areas in the eastern region. [107310]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government are supporting regeneration of the disadvantaged areas of the east of England through a number of area-based and other initiatives including the Single Regeneration Budget, Land and Property and Rural programmes, and Skills and Competitiveness Development Funds, all managed by the East of England Development Agency; the New Deal for Communities and Sure Start programmes; and European funding via the current Objective 5b programme and the new Objective 2.

West Coast Main Line

23. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he last met representatives of Virgin Trains to discuss the west coast main line service. [107329]

Mr. Hill: The Secretary of State has not met representatives of Virgin Trains to discuss the West Coast Main Line service. The Franchising Director and his staff have regular meetings with Virgin Trains as part of their monitoring of the franchise agreement.

Rail Investment

24. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on future investment plans for the rail system. [107330]

Mr. Hill: We have made it clear that we want to see much higher levels of rail investment. We are confident that the next ten years will see the largest investment in the railways for 100 years.

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to encourage train operating companies to make the necessary long-term investment in their rail services; and if he will make a statement. [107953]

Mr. Hill: We have made it clear that there must be more investment in the railways. Train operators have been told that we are willing to consider longer franchises in return for better services for passengers in terms of greater investment and improved performance, and value for money for the taxpayer. We have asked the Franchising Director, when considering requests for franchise replacements, to give due weight to commitments to new or earlier investment.

Shipping

25. Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Government's plans for the shipping industry. [107331]

Mr. Hill: The Government set out its plans for the shipping industry in its policy paper "Charting a new course". It sets out 33 inter-related actions designed to secure the future of UK shipping.

Parish Councils

27. Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the future of parish councils. [107333]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Parish councils will continue to play a key role in many of our towns and villages.

In our forthcoming rural White Paper, we intend to address further how we see parish councils playing their part in rural governance.

Strategic Rail Authority

28. Mr. Savidge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps are being taken to establish the Strategic Rail Authority; and what its impact will be in Scotland. [107334]

Mr. Hill: The Transport Bill makes provision for the establishment of the Strategic Rail Authority. In Scotland it will administer all passenger rail franchises including the making of franchise payments to the relevant train operating companies. The Authority will also receive directions and guidance for Scottish passenger rail services from the Scottish Ministers together with financial provision from the Scottish Consolidated fund to help meet the costs of these services.

Disadvantaged Communities

29. Mr. Fitzpatrick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what projects his Department has recently evaluated relating to schemes to improve the quality of life for people in disadvantaged communities in east London. [107335]

Ms Armstrong: My Department places great importance on the thorough evaluation of its regeneration programmes and over the past two years we have received independent evaluations of the Stratford and Bethnal Green City Challenge Schemes, as well as an interim evaluation of the South Leytonstone Single Regeneration Budget Scheme. A mid-point review of Housing Action Trusts will be published in the spring, including those in Tower Hamlets and Waltham Forest. In addition, last year, an interim evaluation of the impact made by the East London and Lee Valley Objective 2 European programme on deprived communities was undertaken.

Town Centres

30. Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the support his Department makes available for increasing and improving shopping facilities in existing town centres. [107336]

Mr. Raynsford: Planning policy guidance for town centres and retail developments (PPG6) strongly promotes town centre management and makes particular reference to improving access to and within town centres, improving the pedestrian environment and addressing the needs of people with mobility difficulties. Through our funding of the Association of Town Centre Management and the Civic Trust, we have been assisting local authorities to promote town centre management by preparing and disseminating good practice.

Greenfield Developments

31. Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to deal with extra traffic flows in areas of new greenfield developments. [107337]

Mr. Raynsford: Planning Policy Guidance note 13, a draft of which was issued for consultation in October last year, requires a transport assessment to be submitted with every major development which will include an assessment of traffic flows.

In addition, local authorities are now required to address traffic flows in their local transport plans and set targets for reducing traffic growth, where they consider it appropriate, and the strategies for achieving these targets.

Brownfield Developments

32. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received concerning brownfield housing developments in the north-west. [107338]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Secretary of State has received a number of representations in the course of his statutory planning functions and the review of the Regional Planning Guidance for the north-west.

Homelessness

34. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on actions taken by his Department to tackle homelessness among young people. [107341]

Ms Armstrong: Since coming to office, we have taken a number of positive steps to tackle youth homelessness and ensure better housing outcomes for young people. These include work on the promotion of local homelessness strategies and preventative initiatives; setting up the Youth Homelessness Action Partnership to look at the particular problems young homeless people face; and committing an integrated budget of £145 million until 2002 to tackle all aspects of rough sleeping.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made in implementing the recommendation of the Social Exclusion Unit to allow housing authorities to accept as being vulnerable under the provisions of homelessness legislation 16 and 17 year olds who have no family support. [108520]

Mr. Mullin: Local authorities already have the power to accommodate young people whom they consider to be vulnerable and therefore in priority need, under the provisions of the Housing Act 1996. We recognise that young people who are leaving care may face particular difficulties in making the transition to independent living, as a consequence of institutionalisation and perhaps having limited back up support. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions' revised draft Code of Guidance on the Allocation of Accommodation and Homelessness, due to be published in the Spring, will therefore recommend that local authorities treat young care leavers, and 16–17 year olds with little or no back up support, as being vulnerable under the homelessness legislation.

In the revised Code of Guidance we will be recommending strategies for co-ordinated working between agencies, including the value of exploring joint assessments for those with multiple needs at an early stage. The Guidance will also explicitly refer to the need for this approach when assessing homelessness applications from vulnerable people and when dealing with the needs of young people between the ages of 16–18. The forthcoming Housing Green Paper is likely to include proposals for reform of the homelessness legislation to provide further protection for vulnerable people in priority need.

Kyoto Summit

35. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what follow-up action he has undertaken with developing countries on the proposals adopted at the Kyoto summit. [107343]

Mr. Meacher: Climate change is a global problem which requires a global response. The Government are working with developing countries to promote ways of reducing greenhouse gas emissions without compromising economic growth. This was a key theme during my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's visits to India and China.

Rail Development (Nottingham)

36. Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the Greater Nottingham area rail development strategy. [107344]

Mr. Hill: Funding for the capital cost of heavy rail schemes is now generally a matter for the Shadow Strategic Rail Authority (SSRA). The SSRA is currently in discussion with Nottinghamshire County Council about the Strategy. I understand that the County Council will shortly be submitting a pre-qualification bid for funding to the SSRA under the Rail Passenger Partnership scheme for a new station at Ilkeston. The Strategy was however, also included as part of the proposals for local heavy rail network development within the Greater Nottingham Local Transport Plan, submitted in July 1999. It is open to the authorities to use their block allocations to support rail improvements associated with the Strategy.

Local Authority Spending

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to review the method of calculating the spending needs of local authorities. [107339]

Ms Armstrong: Assessment of the relative spending pressures faced by local authorities is an important step in the distribution of revenue grants from central to local government. The method of distributing grants is being reviewed, and discussions are well underway between central and local government officials on a range of options for improving the system. Decisions about the merits of the various options for reform will not be taken until we have consulted widely this summer.

Road Travel (Risks)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the risk incurred in travelling as (i) a driver of a car, (ii) an adult passenger in a car, (iii) a child passenger in a car, (iv) a driver of a motorcycle, (v) an adult pillion passenger on a motorcycle and (vi) a child pillion passenger on a motorcycle; and if he will make a statement. [107131]

Mr. Hill: The risks incurred travelling are normally compared in terms of kilometres travelled by different users (passenger kilometres). The information requested is shown in the following table.

Adult/child car and TWMV casualty data: GB 1997

Casualty rate per 100 million passenger kilometres

Severity	Adult Driver	Adult Passenger	Child Passenger Car
Fatal	0.3	0.4	0.1
KSI[1]	4.0	4.6	2.0
All	36	40	27
TWMV[2]
Fatal	12	[3]—	[3]—
KSI[1]	145	[3]—	[3]—
All	554	[3]—	[3]—

[1] Killed and seriously injured

[2] Two Wheeled Motor Vehicles; includes mopeds, scooters and motorcycle combinations

[3] Kilometres travelled by pillion passengers are not available

Building Regulations

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to improve energy conservation standards required by the building regulations; and if he will make a statement. [108018]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Amendment proposals are being prepared with the aim of maximising the Building Regulations' contribution towards achieving our commitments under the Kyoto Protocol and our UK domestic target for reducing carbon dioxide emissions, while also meeting requirements for better regulation. I intend that a consultation paper setting out our proposals should be issued shortly.

Abandoned Vehicles

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take measures to enable local authorities to remove more promptly motor vehicles which have been abandoned on (a) public and (b) private land; and if he will make a statement. [108115]

Mr. Mullin: We have no plans to shorten the period of notice a local authority must give before removing from public or private land any vehicle which it considers has been abandoned. The existing regulations are intended to provide owners with safeguards against a local authority prematurely assuming a vehicle is abandoned and having it towed away for scrap. They also ensure that local authorities do not have to go to the unnecessary expense of removing and storing vehicles that may not, in the event, have been abandoned.

We believe that the current legislation provides a good balance between the powers of the police and local authorities to deal with abandoned vehicles and the rights of vehicle owners.

Crowd Control

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers are available to local authorities to impose crowd control and safety measures on the organisers of popular events which are held on private land; and what plans he has to strengthen them. [108114]

Mr. Meacher: The Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 requires the organisers of popular events held on public land to control risks to workers or the public arising from work activities. These provisions are enforced by local authorities. There are no plans to strengthen these powers.

Driver Test Centres

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the driver test centres in the Greater London area. [108171]

Mr. Hill: In the Greater London area, driving theory tests are conducted from six centres:

Croydon, Ilford, Kingston upon Thames, Palmers Green, Southwark and Uxbridge.

Practical tests for learner car drivers are conducted from 30 centres (moped and motorcycle tests are also conducted at those centres shown in italics):

Barking, Barnet, Bexleyheath, Chingford, Greenford (Horsenden Lane and Ruislip Road), Hayes, Hendon, Hither Green, Hornchurch, Ilford, Isleworth, Loughton, Mill Hill, Morden, New Southgate, Pinner, Sidcup, South Norwood, Southall, Southfields, Surbiton, Sutton, Teddington, Wallington (Mint House and Old Town Hall), Wanstead, West Wickham, Winchmore Hill and Wood Green.

Practical tests for learner lorry and bus drivers are conducted from four centres:

Croydon, Enfield, Purfleet and Yeading.

Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 20 December 1999, Official Report, column 338W, what restrictions were placed on contractors carrying out research projects funded by his Department in 1999 in respect of them discussing their findings with journalists (a) before and (b) after publication. [108193]

Mr. Mullin: I refer to the answer that I gave on 1 February 2000, Official Report, column 521W, on Departmental Research Contracts, when a copy of the standard research contract conditions in use by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, was placed in the Library of the House of Commons. Standard condition 13.6 requires that the contractor shall not communicate with representatives of the general or technical press, radio, television or other communications media unless specifically granted permission to do so in writing by the Department. This would apply to disclosure to journalists both before and after publication.

Public-private Partnership

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will lis the public-private partnership schemes currently in progress in Leeds. [108608]

Ms Beverley Hughes: There are currently three public-private partnership schemes in progress in Leeds:

1. Refurbishment and renovation of Swarcliffe Estate—Leeds City Council
2. Provision of replacement buildings for Cardinal Heenan Secondary School
3. Provision of a new primary school and refurbishment of four other primary and two secondary schools.

Zoos

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many zoos in England and Wales are situated next to (a) funfairs and (b) amusement or video arcades. [108629]

Mr. Mullin: Information on the proximity of zoos in England and Wales to funfairs and amusement and video arcades is not held centrally.

Dacorum Borough Council

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effect on Dacorum Borough Council of the changes in negative housing subsidy which he has proposed. [108582]

Mr. Mullin: My Department is currently consulting on the detail of the proposals for changes in the Housing Revenue Account subsidy regime. Consideration of the outcome of that exercise will be required before any decisions are taken. It is too early to say what the financial impact of any changes will be. The financial implications for any authority will depend upon both the results of the consultation exercise and conditions pertaining nearer the time that any changes are made.

Planning Guidance

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when his Department will publish its finalised guidance on land use planning and electro-magnetic fields. [108495]

Mr. Raynsford: My Department issued for consultation the draft of a joint circular with the Department of Health on land use planning and electro-magnetic fields. The guidance will be finalised as soon as practicable after the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones, set up at the instigation of the Government and chaired by Sir William Stewart FRS, FRSE, has reported in the spring.

Telecommunications (Planning)

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to update the Code of Best Practice for Telecommunications Prior Approval Procedures; and what representations his Department has received on the code in the last 12 months. [108494]

Mr. Raynsford: My Department has reconvened the working group responsible for the preparation of the Code to update it to reflect the changes in planning policy and procedures set out in Circular 4/99 'Planning for Telecommunications'. The working group comprises representatives of local government and the main mobile operators.

My Department has not received representations relating specifically to the Code in the last 12 months.

GM Cosmetics

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made by the EU on plans to develop harmonised guidelines for GMO risk assessment for cosmetic products; and if he will make a statement. [108622]

Mr. Meacher: Proposals for the development of such guidelines are still under consideration by the European Commission Scientific Steering Committee.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent advice he has received about the use of antibiotic marker genes in genetically modified plants which provide raw materials for the production of cosmetics and perfumes. [108621]

Mr. Meacher: I have received no additional advice further to that given in my answer of 17 June 1999, Official Report, column 200W.

European Parliament

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what arrangements he has in place to monitor the activities of the European Parliament's Environment Committee in respect of its (a) work on legislative oversight and amendment and (b) reports prepared by the committee, on matters relevant to United Kingdom environment and transport policy. [108692]

Mr. Meacher: The Department receives regular information on the agenda and activities of the European Parliament and its Committees through the UK Representation to the European Union, and through contact between Ministers and Members of the European Parliament. The European Parliament and the European Commission's websites are a further source of information.

Departmental Press Releases

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many press releases his Department has issued in each year since 1995. [108599]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 4 February 2000]: The information is as follows:

	Number of press releases
Department of the Environment
1995	655
1996	579
1997[1]	171
Department of Transport
1995	440
1996	410
1997[1]	96
Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions
1997[2]	586
1998	1,121
1999	1,248

[1] 1 January 1997 to 30 April 1997
[2] 1 May 1997 to 31 December 1997

Landlord Registration

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many local authorities operate landlord registration schemes following applications to his Department for the special control scheme. [109188]

Mr. Mullin: Nine authorities in England, mainly in coastal areas, have had registration schemes for houses in multiple occupation confirmed containing the special control provisions in Part II of the Housing Act 1996. One further scheme has been agreed in principle.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assumption about the number of asylum seekers staying in the United Kingdom is incorporated in the forecast of housing demand up to 2021 used by his Department. [109027]

Mr. Raynsford: Information on net levels of international migration assumed in the latest household projections can be found in Annexe C of the Department's publication "Projections of Households in England to 2021", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. This Annexe summarises the assumptions contained in the 1996-based national population projections which are published in "National Population projections: 1996-based" Office for National Statistics series PP2 No. 21.

Oil Slicks

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans his Department has in place to protect coasts from oil slicks. [107317]

Mr. Hill: My Department's Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA) will shortly be publishing a revised National Contingency Plan for Marine Pollution from Shipping and Offshore Installations. The plan provides a framework for the UK's response to marine pollution from ships and offshore installations. The MCA implements the plan when marine pollution incidents involving ships and offshore installations occur in UK waters. The plan remains under constant review in the light of the experience gained from incidents and exercises.

The MCA also inspects at least one quarter of ships calling at UK ports to ensure that they comply with international safety rules and standards and operates surveillance aircraft to patrol UK waters.

In addition, my Department will shortly begin a consultative process that could lead to the setting up of Marine Environmental High Risk Areas (MEHRAs) to help protect sensitive marine and coastal environments at particular risk from pollution from shipping.

Housing Waiting Lists

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each London borough the number of (a) families on the housing waiting list, (b) families on the transfer list and (c) his estimates of the number of single people who need housing but are not accepted on to waiting lists. [108874]

Mr. Mullin: The latest information on the number of households on the housing registers of London boroughs was included in my reply to my hon. Friend on 1 December 1999, Official Report, columns 205–06W. Information on transfer lists, and estimates of single persons in housing need but not accepted on to housing registers, is not held centrally.

Global Warming

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research his Department is funding into the potential severity of 100 year climatic events due to global warming, and if the Environment Agency will take this into account in commenting on planning applications. [109012]

Mr. Meacher: My Department supports a £7.8 million programme on climate prediction at the Hadley Centre, which is based at the Met Office. Part of this research programme considers how sea level is projected to rise as a result of climate change. Extreme climate events are characterised by their "return period", i.e. the 100-year water level is the water level which occurs once in every 100 years. The Hadley Centre projections have been used by the Proudman Oceanographic Laboratory to calculate how the return period for the current 100-year water level might change by the 2050s at a number of UK ports. The projections are currently very uncertain because of incomplete understanding of the climate system, and do not allow for any changes in storminess which may result from climate change.

The projections indicate that in England and Wales, a current high tide which would be expected to occur once in every 100 years will occur more frequently. This would be exacerbated if storminess were also to increase as a result of climate change.

The Environment Agency considers new research (some of which it is actively involved in) as it emerges and uses it to inform procedures for responding to planning applications.

Air Safety

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to develop the safety management system operated by National Air Traffic Control Ltd; [108525]

(2) what plans he has to maintain safe levels in the volume of air traffic. [108527]

Mr. Mullin: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State for Transport and I had two meetings with the Institute of Professional and Managerial Staff and the Public and Commercial Services Union in December at which we made clear that the Government have the highest regard for the Safety Management System operated by NATS. We have indicated that the system will remain in place, subject only to such changes and improvements as are agreed with the Safety Regulation Group (SRG) of the Civil Aviation Authority.

The new arrangements, proposed in the current Transport Bill, will lead to the separation of SRG as the regulator, from NATS as operator, as recommended by the Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and the Regions. Under these arrangements, SRG will continue to have robust oversight of all NATS operations. This oversight will include the approval of processes and procedures through the NATS Safety Management System to ensure that traffic flows are regulated and managed at safe levels, irrespective of increasing demand, and that staff are rostered in compliance with the Scheme for the Regulation of Air Traffic Controllers' Hours (SRATCOH), so as to deal safely with the resulting volume of traffic.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has had from representatives of the British Association of Air Line Pilots and the Institute of Professional and Managerial Staffs on proposed changes in the status and organisation of air traffic controllers; and if he will make a statement. [107552]

Mr. Mullin: Since September, my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State for Transport and I have had four meetings with the Institute of Professional and Managerial Staffs and the Public and Commercial Services Union. The Deputy Prime Minister and the British Association of Air Line Pilots were present at one of these meetings. We propose to hold a further meeting with the unions shortly. Subjects discussed include the future of National Air Traffic Services Ltd. under the public-private partnership which the Government proposes to establish, and the vital importance of maintaining in full existing safety standards in the air traffic control industry.

Hackney Carriage Zones

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to issue a licence allowing the de-zoning of the existing hackney carriage zones to form a single zone in Herefordshire; and if he will make a statement. [109075]

Mr. Hill: A request from Herefordshire Council to approve its resolution to amalgamate existing hackney carriage zones is being carefully considered and a decision will be made as soon as possible.

Railway Signalling

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) miles of track and (b) railway junctions in Scotland are controlled by (i) colour light signal systems, (ii) radio-electronic token signals and (iii) mechanical semaphore signals. [108652]

Mr. Hill: 1,497 miles of track in Scotland are controlled by coloured lights systems, 400 miles by Radio Electronic Token Block Signalling and 700 miles by mechanical semaphore signalling. An equivalent figure for railway junctions cannot be given as it is dependent on the definition used.

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the track mileage in Scotland which has electronic train protection, broken down by mileage of the system used; and how many (a) miles of track and (b) junctions in Scotland are not covered by electric or electronic train protection. [108653]

Mr. Hill: 2,454 miles of track in Scotland are protected by the Automatic Warning System (AWS). 143 miles of track on the Ayr-Stranraer and Aberdeen-Inverness routes are without AWS, although they will be fitted later this year. The Train Protection Warning System (TPWS) will be fitted to 1,424 signals and 88 buffer stops by 2003. An equivalent figure for railway junctions cannot be given as it is dependent on the definition used.

Post Offices

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his estimate of the number of sub-post offices which receive (a) 50 per cent. rates relief and (b) 100 per cent. rates relief; and what would be the estimated cost of extending rates relief at (i) 50 per cent. and (ii) 100 per cent. to all sub-post offices; and if he will make a statement. [108906]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The number of rural post offices receiving the 50 per cent. mandatory village shop rate relief and the number to which local authorities have granted discretionary relief of up to 100 per cent. are not collected centrally. However for 1998–99, the last year which figures are available, sole village stores and post offices in England received £2,022,332 in mandatory relief and £1,091,833 in "top up" discretionary relief.

We are unable to estimate the cost of extending both mandatory and discretionary rate relief to all sub post offices because information is not held centrally on the number and rate liabilities of those already receiving village shop rate relief and those which are not. This information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Air Services

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has approved the terms of reference for the South East and East of England Regional Air Services Study; and how he will ensure consistency in evaluating the demands for, and constraints on, airports and air service development in the South East and East of England Regional Air Services Study. [109353]

Mr. Mullin: I have now approved the final terms of reference for the South East and East of England Regional Air Services Study, taking account of comments received following the consultation on draft terms of reference. Copies will be placed in the House Libraries. They will be circulated to interested parties, and will be on the DETR website.

A consultation paper, "Appraisal Framework for Airports in the South East and Eastern Regions of England" was published today. This paper is about the development of an appraisal framework to be applied to the alternative ways of dealing with future demand for airport capacity in the South East and East of England. Putting a framework in place will mean that schemes to meet or restrain that demand can be compared on a consistent basis.

The consultation paper has been circulated widely. Comments have been invited from transport groups, airport consultative committees, local authorities, environmental organisations and other interested parties and will be considered carefully before the Appraisal Framework is finalised.

Solar Power

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research his Department has carried out into the contribution that the use of solar power in domestic dwellings can make to reducing energy consumption; and if he will make a statement. [108020]

Mrs. Liddell: I have been asked to reply.

The Department of Trade and Industry (DTI) has funded a considerable amount of research into the exploitation of solar energy in the UK. This research can be divided into three technology sectors: Passive Solar Design—the direct use of solar heat gain and daytime light in buildings to display conventional energy demand—Solar Thermal Hot Water Heating—to displace energy from other conventional heating sources—and Photovoltaics—which produce electricity from the action of daylight on photovoltaic cells.

To date most of the DTI funded PV research has focused on issues which are common to all applications of PV in buildings, and to research into aspects of PV integration into larger non-domestic buildings. The potential contribution that PV can make to UK conventional electricity demand has been estimated in "New and Renewable Energy Prospects for the 21st Century. Supporting Analysis. March 1999. ETSU R-122". This gave a theoretical estimate of around 270 TerraWatt hours a year (TWh/yr) if PV were installed on all available walls and roofs for the entire building stock. More realistically, if PV were to be installed on all south-facing roofs and facades this would yield an annual output of around 70 TWh, or a little over 22 per cent. of current electricity consumption, which stands at around 324 TWh/yr. Obviously, if we are looking only at the roofs of domestic properties, the theoretical potential would be proportionately less. Installing 2 kW systems on 50,000 homes would cost around £500 million at current prices, but would generate less than one half of one tenth of 1 per cent. of current UK electricity demand.

In the short to medium term, up to 2010, the installed cost for PV on dwellings is expected to remain a major barrier to faster deployment of the technology. However, costs are expected to continue to reduce, and a market for domestic PV should develop accordingly, so that in the longer term PV has the potential to make a significant contribution to reducing energy consumption and carbon emissions.

The DTI funded a demonstration project for a domestic PV roof in Oxford in the mid to late 90s. The 4 kW system cost in the region of £25,000, and showed that, over the year, output from the system could match demand from an energy-efficient home, with surplus electricity generated by PV during the day, particularly during the summer months, being exported to the grid, and being balanced by imports during the night and winter months.

The DTI is contributing £1 million towards a field trial looking at the implementation of PV on clusters of domestic dwellings. It is hoped this will result in total investment of £2 million and the installation of PV systems on two to three hundred dwellings. Other ongoing work within the DTI Solar Programme is investigating the development of PV systems for domestic roofing.

DEFENCE

Medical Records

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his policy is on keeping medical records of personnel working in sensitive defence research establishments. [108469]

Dr. Moonie: [holding answer 7 February 2000]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Sir John Chisholm to Mr. Tam Dalyell, dated 8 February 2000:

I have been asked to reply to your question about policy on keeping medical records of personnel working in sensitive defence research establishments in view of my responsibilities as Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) which comprises many of the previously separate Ministry of Defence research establishments.

The medical records of personnel fall into two types:

(a) Records of a clinical nature which are required to be held under conditions of medical confidentiality. Where there has been any occupational health intervention of anything more than a trivial nature, such a record should exist and will be held within the occupational health department under the control of suitable medical staff for the duration of a person's employment. Material maintained in the record will include items such as the results of medical examinations, results of health surveillance and clinical correspondence from other medical practitioners.

(b) Records not requiring storage under conditions of medical confidentiality which are retained on an individual's personal file. These will include items such as sickness certificates, any medical advice from a doctor to the employer (which should not include medical-in-confidence material) and records of sickness absence.

All records are maintained for the duration of an individual's employment by DERA. In the case of individuals taking up further Civil Service employment, it is our policy to forward records to the new department or unit along with all other personal records. Otherwise, the clinical records are associated with the personal file (in a suitably sealed package) and forwarded to the Defence Storage and Distribution Centre at Llangennech.

I hope this information is helpful.

Smart Procurement

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the accountability to the taxpayer provided by Smart Procurement; and if he will make a statement. [108742]

Dr. Moonie: My Department's accountability to Parliament and the taxpayer has not been affected by Smart Procurement. By applying Smart Procurement principles to the way we conduct business, the taxpayer should see increased value for money from every pound spent on defence equipment. It enables us to equip, train and support the armed forces as cost-effectively as possible.

Gurkhas

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Government next intend to review with the Indian and Nepalese Governments the salaries and pensions payable to Gurkhas serving in the British Army; and what is the Government's policy on salaries and pensions payable to Gurkhas serving in the British Army. [108794]

Mr. Spellar: Under the terms of the Tri-Partite Agreement (TPA) between India, Nepal and the UK, rates of pay and pensions are linked to the Indian Army pay code. Major reviews of pay and pensions are carried out by Indian Government Pay Commissions which report every 10 years. The next Pay Commission will report in 2006. Interim changes continue to be implemented as they are notified to us by India.

British Gurkha pay is calculated in line with Indian Army rates although in 1997 a Universal Addition was introduced to take account of the cost of living outside Nepal; this is reviewed annually. These two elements combine to give salaries for British Gurkhas that are in line with comparable British servicemen.

The recent examination of Gurkha pensions and gratuities has substantially increased Gurkha pensions to allow for a welfare related cash uplift that will double the pension payments for all Gurkha pensioners with effect from 1 April 2000. There are no plans for any further reviews of this nature. Pensions will continue to be paid immediately after 15 years service and index linked in accordance with cost of living in Nepal. These increases remain within the context of the TPA.

Anti-ballistic Missile Treaty

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department permits the use of MoD land by the United States for activities contrary to the terms of the anti-ballistic missile treaty. [108896]

Mr. Spellar: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 30 November 1999, Official Report, column 83W.

Departmental Secondments

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many staff were seconded from the private sector to his Department from (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to the latest date for which figures are available, stating in each case the companies from which staff have been seconded. [109074]

Dr. Moonie: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the civil service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Eduction, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

The information requested on personnel on secondment from the private sector to my Department, excluding Trading Fund Agencies, is as follows:

RAF Menwith Hill

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what authority the US Government sought from his Department before commencing the construction of an anti-ballistic missile system at RAF Menwith Hill. [108893]

Mr. Spellar: RAF Menwith Hill is the site for the European Relay Ground Station of the US Space Based Infra Red System (SBIRS). SBIRS is designed to detect and provide information on the launch of ballistic missiles. As Her Majesty's Government retain legal ownership and control of all sites made available to the United States Visiting Forces in the UK, it was necessary for the US to seek permission to construct the SBIRS European Relay Ground Station at RAF Menwith Hill. Permission was granted in March 1997.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations his Department has received from the French Government in respect of anti-ballistic missile developments at RAF Menwith Hill. [108897]

Mr. Spellar: None.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the anti-ballistic missile defence system being constructed at RAF Menwith Hill will provide protection from attack for the United Kingdom. [108895]

Mr. Spellar: RAF Menwith Hill is the site for the European Relay Ground Station of the US Space Based Infra Red System (SBIRS). SBIRS is designed to detect and provide information on the launch of ballistic missiles, but offers no physical protection. It will upgrade the detection and warning capabilities that currently contribute to the defence and security of the UK and NATO.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for the financial year 1998–99 the number and total value of contracts let by his Department with external consultants and advisers that have (a) been put out to competitive tender, (b) not been put out to competitive tender and (c) been let on a non-commercial basis, stating in each case the names of the individuals or organisations that have carried out the work. [109065]

Dr. Moonie: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Garvie Island, Sutherland

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what supervisory arrangements are operated to monitor the use by foreign military forces of Garvie Island, Sutherland, as a target. [108992]

Mr. Spellar: Any use of ranges at Garvie Island is governed by UK regulations and is directly supervised by UK military personnel.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has approved the use of Garvie Island in Sutherland for shelling by US warships; and if he will make a statement. [108991]

Mr. Spellar: I have not approved Garvie Island in Sutherland for any use by US warships.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if depleted uranium-based ammunition is authorised for use at Garvie Island, Sutherland, by (a) UK forces and (b) overseas forces; and if he will make a statement. [108993]

Mr. Spellar: Depleted uranium is not authorised for use at Garvie Island either by UK or overseas forces.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence under what arrangements exercises by non-UK forces are conducted involving the (a) shelling and (b) bombing of Garvie Island, Sutherland; and if he will make a statement. [108990]

Mr. Spellar: The range at Garvie Island is open to use by members of NATO. All exercises are conducted under UK regulations and are under the direct control of UK military personnel. Garvie Island is used only by aircraft. There is no shelling of the island.

Army Foundation College

Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made on the PPP project for the Army Foundation College at Harrogate. [109357]

Mr. Spellar: I am pleased to be able to say that a contract has been let to Defence Training Services Ltd., a joint venture between Jarvis Projects Ltd. and Halifax Bank, to provide and run a modern residential Army Foundation College at Harrogate, with the associated accommodation and infrastructure support services, for a period of 30 years. The military element of the training at the college will continue to be delivered by uniformed personnel. This investment of private finance and expertise will create a flagship college where young people will have a unique opportunity to gain qualifications combining vocational education with military leadership skills.

Royal Navy Links

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent progress has been made on strengthening links between the Royal Navy and the French Navy. [109358]

Mr. Spellar: I am pleased to announce that HMS Victorious will shortly conduct a port visit to France. She will arrive in Brest on 11 February. This is the second visit of its kind, the first having taken place at Gibraltar in November 1998. The visit has been made possible as a result of the reduced operational tempo of our SSBN fleet, as implemented in the Strategic Defence Review.

Helicopter Landing Platform

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which vessel his Department plans to be used as a landing platform for helicopters over the next 10 years during the times when HMS Ocean is in refit. [108803]

Mr. Spellar: On current plans HMS Ocean's first full refit will take place in about seven years' time. It is anticipated that the new Landing Platform Docks, HMS Albion and HMS Bulwark, currently being built, will cover the period of refit, along with an Invincible Class aircraft carrier in the Landing Platform Helicopter role.

Iraq

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the military actions carried out by Iraqi forces against Kurds and Sh'ia Muslims between 18 November and 15 December 1999 which required operational sorties by UK forces. [108434]

Mr. Hoon: It is not for us to account for the actions of the Iraqi military over a specific period of time. It is clear, however, that Saddam's internal security organisations continue to persecute all opponents of the regime on the ground. Coalition patrols of the no fly zones prevent Saddam Hussein from using his air force to repress the Iraqi people in the north and south of Iraq. Previously he has made extensive use of helicopter gun ships to repress the Kurdish population in the north, as well as both fixed wing aircraft and helicopter gun ships to repress Sh'ia Muslims in the south. Given the extensive history of brutality by Saddam Hussein's regime, there is no reason to believe that he would not resume these tactics were we to cease patrols. Coalition patrols of the no fly zones remain an essential humanitarian task in support of UN Security Council Resolution 688; without our continued presence in the air, he would be free to use his air force to return to an all out assault.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Millennium Dome

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement about the change of Chief Executive at the Millennium Dome. [109501]

Mr. Chris Smith: Jennie Page has done a sterling job seeing the Millennium Dome through from its inception to opening, on time and on budget, on 31 December. The scale of this achievement should not be underestimated. However, it is the view of the NMEC Board, supported by the Shareholder on behalf of the Government, that a different approach and different skills are now needed to manage the project successfully during its year of operation. Jennie Page has resigned as Chief Executive of NMEC. The NMEC Board have appointed Pierre-Yves Gerbeau to succeed her. He took up his post yesterday. A copy of the Press Notice has been placed in the Libraries.

Lottery Funding

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money from National Lottery funding has been directed to projects in parliamentary constituencies in the London Borough of Wandsworth; and for what projects this funding has been used. [109052]

Kate Hoey: I have placed a table showing National Lottery awards directed to projects based in parliamentary constituencies in the London Borough of Wandsworth (correct to 7 February 2000) in the Libraries of the House. This information is taken from the National Lottery Awards database which uses information supplied by the Lottery distributing bodies.

Nandrolone

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement about the UK Athletics report into the drug nandrolone. [107655]

Kate Hoey: UK Sport's review into the anabolic steroid nandrolone which I initiated in August last year, reported on 18 January after an intensive period of expert study and discussion lasting three months.

UK Sport has accepted the conclusions of the Review Committee and has already consulted the International Olympic Committee and the International Amateur Athletic Federation—both of whom co-operated with the review and who have received the report favourably. National governing bodies are also being consulted. Comments on the report have been invited by the end of February.

The report has also generated substantial interest among members of the public, media, legal and scientific communities. I have placed a copy in the House Libraries.

Sports Facilities

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has held with local education authorities on the increased provision of facilities for sporting groups. [105544]

Kate Hoey: My right hon. Friend and I are in regular contact with ministerial colleagues in the Department for Education and Employment, and through them, local education authorities, on a wide range of issues of mutual interest, including the important issue of improving the provision of sports facilities in schools.

I have also discussed this with local authorities in my travels around the country and have met with the Local Government Association.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent discussions he has had with the Department for Education and Employment on increasing the number of playing fields and extending sporting facilities at schools. [105102]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 17 January 2000]: My right hon. Friend and I are in regular contact with ministerial colleagues in the Department for Education and Employment on a wide range of issues of mutual interest, including the important issues of playing fields and improving the provision of sports facilities in schools. I have also discussed this with local authorities in my travels around the country and have met with the Local Government Association and the National Playing Fields Association.

Oath of Allegiance

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many letters he has received since 1 May 1997 on (a) constituency matters and (b) other matters of Government policy from each of those Members of the House who have not taken the Oath of Allegiance. [108403]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 3 February 2000]: The information requested is not held centrally.

Lottery Funds

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money the National Lottery has donated to the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement. [108716]

Kate Hoey: The National Lottery has not donated any money to the National Health Service. The New Opportunities Fund has a remit to support initiatives connected with health, education and the environment, all funding allocated to health programmes, such as for the establishment of Healthy Living Centres or for cancer prevention, detection, treatment and care is quite separate from and additional to any money spent by the National Health Service in these areas.

Digital Television

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many relay stations will be digitalised when the phasing out of the analogue system is completed. [108719]

Mr. Chris Smith: At least 30. The current digital terrestrial television (DTT) transmission plan comprises a network of 51 main transmitter sites and 30 relay transmitters. The BBC and Independent Television Commission, with their transmission providers, are now considering how to develop DTT coverage further, in consultation with the digital broadcasters, Government and representatives of manufacturers and consumers.

Concessionary TV Licences

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the application of the concessionary TV licence scheme to sheltered housing units where the residents include non-pensioners who have been placed there by the local authority to meet urgent housing needs. [106833]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 25 January 2000]: I recognise that this practice is increasing and gives rise to apparent anomalies in the application of the concessionary television licence scheme to sheltered housing units, which depends on the particular circumstances of the case. The Government asked the independent review panel on the future funding of the BBC to consider the structure of the scheme and whether a suitable alternative structure might be available. The Government are considering the Davies report's recommendations in the light of responses to the public consultation. We intend to announce our conclusions shortly.

BBC World

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if he will make an assessment of the benefits to the United Kingdom from BBC World; [108649]

(2) what discussions he has had with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in respect of funding for BBC World. [108648]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 7 February 2000]: I have had no such discussions with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. BBC World is a commercial venture and we have no plans to assess its impact overseas, though I would expect that, in its own way, BBC World makes a positive contribution to the standing of the United Kingdom.

Millennium Commission

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how many applications for lottery funding, and to what value, have been received by the Millennium Commission in each year since its establishment; and what is the number and value of grants made or announced in each year; [108773]

(2) what arrangements are in place for the continued funding after 31 December of ongoing projects supported by the Millennium Commission; and if he will make a statement. [108771]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 7 February 2000]: This is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I will write to the hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 8 December 1999, Official Report, column 537W, what restrictions were placed on contractors carrying out research projects funded by his Department in 1999 in respect of them discussing their findings with journalists (a) before and (b) after publication. [108204]

Mr. Chris Smith: All research contracts contain standard terms and conditions which place restrictions on contractors requiring permission from the Department before any discussions of their findings with journalists, either before or after publication.

School Playing Fields

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will encourage the (a) Football Association, (b) Football League, (c) television networks and (d) Football Trust to provide funds for schools without sports playing fields to obtain access to such fields for team sports. [108284]

Kate Hoey: The FA Premier League and the Nationwide Football League have signed the Central Council of Physical Recreation's Voluntary Code on Broadcasting, under which governing bodies commit themselves to investing at least 5 per cent. of broadcasting revenues in the grass roots development of their sports. The Premier League re-affirmed its commitment to the principles of the Code in January 1999 following the publication of the Football Task Force's report Investing in the Community. My officials are in discussion with the Football Trust and the sport's governing bodies about the distribution and use of that investment, a proportion of which may be allocated to the provision of playing areas for school team sports.

HEALTH

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will give a substantive answer to the question from the right hon. Member for Birkenhead on the birth weight of babies, tabled on 12 January (ref. 105430). [109122]

Yvette Cooper: I shall let my right hon. Friend have a reply to his earlier question as soon as possible.

Dental Services

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists have been (a) struck off and (b) reprimanded for professional negligence in each year since 1995. [106719]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 24 January 2000]: Under the Dentists Act 1984, it is the General Dental Council (GDC) that has statutory functions in relation to both the professional conduct and the fitness to practise of dentists in the United Kingdom. The proceedings of the Professional Conduct Committee of the GDC are made public by the Council. The number of dentists found guilty of serious professional misconduct in the last five years is given in the table.

Waiting Lists

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what percentage of patients on waiting lists, and how many patients this represented, were waiting over one year in (a) 1979, (b) 1989, (c) 1995 and (d) the latest date for which figures are available; [107062]

(2) in which year since 1970 there was the smallest percentage of patients on waiting lists who were waiting over one year for hospital treatment; and how many patients this represented. [107106]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is shown in the table. The March 1996 data are presented since this is the year with the smallest percentage of patients waiting over 12 months for inpatient treatment:

Date	Total waiting	Over 12 month waiters	Percentage over 12 months
September 1979	695,726	197,532	28.4
September 1989	929,056	218,116	23.5
September 1995	1,040,142	27,938	2.7
September 1996	1,061,558	14,993	1.4
September 1999	1,084,529	50,916	4.7

Notes:
Ordinary cases only collected in 1979 (day cases were not included). All other years represent ordinary and day cases combined.
March 1996 figures were total waiting: 1,048,029; over 12 month waiters: 4,576; percentage over 12 months 4.7.

Chiropody

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on NHS chiropody services in Gloucestershire. [107560]

Mr. Hutton: As part of a package of savings to ensure Gloucestershire Health Authority meets its financial duties, Gloucestershire Health Authority introduced changes to the provision of chiropody on 1 November 1999.

The changes to chiropody services have been reached in agreement with local National Health Service trusts and primary care groups to ensure that patients are affected as little as possible by the need to make financial savings.

All the measures taken have been aimed at ensuring chiropody services continue to be provided to all individuals with an identified medical and chiropodial need for the service.

Gloucestershire Health Authority are continually monitoring the impact of the changes in chiropody and are reviewing the situation early this year and again at the end of April 2000.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when charities will be notified of the outcome of their section 64 applications for projects beginning in the financial year 2000–01. [109046]

Mr. Hutton: Section 64 applications are still being considered for the financial year 2000–01. The Department hopes to be able to notify decisions before April 2000.

Disease Statistics

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the incidence of (a) serious kidney disease, (b) prostate cancer and (c) cervical cancer (i) in the last 12 months for which figures are available and (ii) five years ago. [108524]

Yvette Cooper: The category of "serious kidney disease" is not used in the statistics collected. One definition would be those with end stage renal failure, who are receiving renal replacement therapy (dialysis and transplant). The last published national survey of renal units showed the number of such patients treated in England and Wales in 1995 was 473 per million population. The 1999 report of the United Kingdom Renal Registry shows that the most comparable figure for 1998 was 528 per million population. The latest available incidence figures (1996) for prostate and cervical cancer together with data for 1991 for comparison are shown in the table.

England and Wales	1991	[1]1996
Incidence of prostrate cancer (ICD9 185)
Number of newly diagnosed cases	14,256	18,900
Rates per 100,000 population[2]	49.7	63.5
Incidence of cervical cancer (ICD 9 180)
Number of newly diagnosed cases	3,592	2,600
Rate per 100,000 population[2]	12.8	8.9

Child Runaways

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what progress has been made by his Department in developing a joint strategy with the Home Department to provide services for children who run away from home; [108521]

(2) if he will make it his policy to introduce central monitoring of the number of children running away from local authority care; and if he will make a statement; [108522]

(3) what progress has been made in identifying care placements which have a high rate of children running away; and if he will make a statement. [108523]

Mr. Hutton: We are taking forward a comprehensive range of measures to prevent children reaching the point where they feel the need to run away from home. These include the Government's Supporting Families programme and the Quality Protects programme to transform social services for children in need and their families. These initiatives will help to reduce the pressures felt by families which can lead to conflict and the breakdown of relationships. Schools have also been asked to pay greater attention to the home circumstances of a child and to liaise with other agencies where a child appears to have problems or difficulties. The proposed youth support service for 13–19 year olds will also have a significant role in identifying and assisting children in difficulty at home or at school.

It is essential that a holistic multi-agency approach to runaways is taken locally and the Department's Children's Services Planning Guidance advises social services departments to plan services for runaways on a collaborative basis with other agencies. Current provision includes refuges, drop-in centres, advocacy for young children, emergency foster care placements and night-stop accommodation.

Children's Services Planning Guidance also stresses the need for local authorities to monitor incidence and patterns of running away to assist the planning of services and to identify both families and institutions from which children run away repeatedly. From this April we will require local authorities in England to record absences of more than 24 hours from agreed placements for a sample of one third of their looked after children. These data will provide the first national estimate of the incidence of running away.

Bed Availability

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the bed availability statistics for the year to 31 March 1999 in England. [109058]

Ms Stuart: The information will be published shortly.

Departmental Secondments

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff were seconded from the private sector to his Department from (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to the latest date for which figures are available, stating in each case the companies from which staff have been seconded. [109073]

Ms Stuart: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

Central records are held on the following secondments from the private sector which commenced in the years shown:

Year	Number	Companies seconded from
May 1997-April 1998	6	Private Finance Panel Executive (2) Tarmac plc Nabarro Nathanson Pinsent Curtis Rawlings Ophthalmic Opticians
May 1998-April 1999	6	Hempsons PriceWaterhouseCoopers Ward Hadaway Beachcroft Stanleys Dickinson Dees Lloyds Bank
May 1999 to date	6	Addleshaw Booth and Company Berwin Leighton Taylor Woodrow Deloitte and Touche Herbert Smith British Airways

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

World Trade Organisation

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what organisations he has consulted regarding Her Majesty's Government's policy in relation to the Seattle round of negotiations of the World Trade Organisation; and if he will list separately the Scottish organisations in the consultation process. [107467]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 2 February 2000]: We have consulted a large number of organisations across the UK, including the Scotch Whisky Association. We do not have a separate list of Scottish organisations since many Scottish interests are also represented by UK-wide organisations.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a list of those countries excluded from guarantees from the Export Credits Guarantee Department for unproductive expenditure, showing for each (a) the number and (b) the value of credits given for (i) defence and (ii) other unproductive exports in each of the past five years. [108479]

Mr. Caborn: ECGD has supported no defence related business for any of the affected countries in the last five years.

While it is not possible to apply the criteria for productive expenditure retrospectively on a definitive basis, from information readily available, all business supported by ECGD on these markets in the past five years would have met the criteria against which future export credit business with these countries will be assessed.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the investigations carried out into allegations of corruption and maladministration in the use of Export Credits Guarantee Department funds. [108798]

Mr. Caborn: In the last five years ECGD has reported five such cases to HM Treasury. In only one of these cases was it felt necessary to refer the case to the relevant external investigatory body. My hon. Friend will appreciate that it is not possible for me to provide details of individual cases for legal reasons.

Coal

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the percentage was of UK-mined coal burned by individual power stations in Britain in 1999. [109019]

Mrs. Liddell: In the 12 months to November 1999 major power producers' net purchases of coal amounted to 40.1 million tonnes. Of this, 32.8 million tonnes (82 per cent.) was of UK purchased coal and 7.3 million tonnes (18 per cent.) was of imported coal. The total quantity of coal consumed by major power producers over this 12 month period was 39.2 million tonnes. Data for individual coal-fired power stations are not available.

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the accessible coal reserves in each of the collieries in Yorkshire; what is their current rate of depletion; and what is his estimate of the life of each colliery at current rates of depletion. [109116]

Mrs. Liddell: As part of its Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation, the Department of Trade and Industry commissioned International Mining Consultants Limited (IMCL) to provide a report on the prospects for coal production in England, Scotland and Wales in the period to 2020. That report was substantially undertaken in May 1998 and published by The Stationery Office in March 1999. Since that time the world price of coal has fallen and this is likely in general terms to have reduced the levels of economically workable reserves and to have accelerated the date at which economic reserves of some collieries are likely to exhaust.

A summary of the assessment of reserves for each of the collieries in Yorkshire as at early 1998 was shown as follows:

	Proven (Mt)	Probable (Mt)
Ricall[1]	4.664	14.793
Stillingfleet[2]	2.315	20.102
Wistow	3.085	11.173
Kellingley	3.698	11.509
Maltby	4.086	15.222
Prince of Wales	2.258	2.953
Rossington	—	12.714
Hatfield	0.305	1.639

[1] Ricall/Whitemoor combine
[2] Stillingfleet/North Selby combine

Various scenarios were considered in the report. The summary of projected operating performance prepared by IMCL, on the scenario of current mines to exhaustion at company output levels full profit/loss cost basis, for each of the collieries in Yorkshire in 1998 was shown as follows:

	1998 output '000t	Projected exhaustion date
Ricall[1]	1,730	2009
Stillingfleet[2]	3,700	2009
Wistow	2,600	2009

Electricity Interconnector

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when negotiations will begin with EDF on a replacement electricity supply contract through the interconnector; if he will seek a reciprocal arrangement; and when the new contract is required to be in place. [109018]

Mrs. Liddell: The Interconnector Agreement between the National Grid Company and EDF expires on 31 March 2001 and it is a matter for the parties to the Agreement when negotiations on a successor Agreement take place. As an essential facility, access to the interconnector should be granted to third parties on reasonable and non-discriminatory terms, and any new Agreement will be subject to the normal application of EU competition law.

Pakistan

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list (a) the total number of contracts and their value relating to arms exports to Pakistan for each of the last five years, (b) the value of ECGD support and (c) what payments were made under the ECGD scheme. [108880]

Mr. Caborn: ECGD has not supported defence related equipment to Pakistan in any of the last five years.

Postal Services

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which EU document promotes the lowering of the monopoly limit on postal services of member states; what measures restrict national choice; and what consultation he has had with postal users in the United Kingdom concerning the policies of Her Majesty's Government in these matters. [108722]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Postal Services Directive (97/67/EC) sets the agreement between the European Union member states and the European Commission on common rules for the development of the internal market of community postal services and the improvement of quality of service. The Directive established the principle that postal services may be reserved by member states only to the extent necessary to ensure the maintenance of the universal service. The initial upper limit to the reserved area was set at five times the public tariff for an item for correspondence in the first weight step of first class post provided that it weighs less than 350 grams. The United Kingdom's reserved area is within this limit. The Directive also provided for further steps to be taken towards the completion of the internal market of postal services and tasked the European Commission to come forward with proposals for gradual and controlled liberalisation. It is expected that these proposals will issue shortly.

In the United Kingdom, extensive consultation has taken place, in relation to the reserved area and other postal matters, during the review which led to the White Paper on Post Office Reform which was published in July 1999. A Bill has now been laid in with the intention of consolidating the reforms outlined in the White Paper.

The Government are of the view that greater competition is essential for postal reform. Liberalisation promotes competition and greater choice and keener pricing for consumers. It also encourages greater innovation, productivity and growth of businesses. The Postal Service Commission (which takes up its duties on 1 April 2000) will have a duty to promote the interest of consumers of postal services, having regard to the need for effective competition wherever possible and appropriate.

As set out in the White Paper, the Postal Services Commission will be expected to report on the scope for liberalisation within one year of appointment. We shall be asking the Postal Services Commission to provide its advice on the scope for reductions in the monopoly at the earliest opportunity. We shall also be encouraging them to be thorough and to take account of the views of all interested parties.

Match Funding

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 17 January 2000, Official Report, columns 258–59W, on match funding, (a) what structural funds grants were received in the United Kingdom for (i) 1999 and (ii) preceding years, (b) what was the total of associated matched funding for that sum, and (c) if he will initiate a scheme to record the sources of matched funding for each grant received in 2000. [108966]

Mr. Caborn: As explained in my previous answer of 17 January 2000, Official Report, columns 258–59W, there are no specific annual allocations to structural funds programmes and grants for individual years therefore cannot be identified. However the total value of grants to the UK's structural funds programmes which ended in 1999 amounted to approximately £5.5 billion.

The previous answer also explained that the level of match funding varied from programme to programme, and depended on the nature of the various projects. That information was not recorded centrally.

It would require disproportionate effort to record and collate the precise source of match funding for each of the many thousands of projects which receive structural funds assistance.

Kerosene and Gas Oil

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much (a) kerosene and (b) gas oil was used industrially in the last year for which figures are available. [108711]

Mrs. Liddell: The latest published data show that during 1998 the amounts of kerosene and gas oil used by industry were 841 and 2,894 thousand tonnes respectively, the latter figure including some eight thousand tonnes of gas oil used by industry for on-site generation of electricity during the year. The figure for gas oil does not include any amount of gas diesel oil used as a fuel for round transport, i.e. DERV fuel. Information on the amount of DERV fuel used by industry is not available. Preliminary figures for 1999 suggest that industrial kerosene use has increased by approximately 15 per cent. while industrial gas oil use has decreased by approximately 10 per cent.

Parental Leave

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the total cost of statutory paid parental leave in the United Kingdom set at the level of the minimum wage. [109045]

Mr. Alan Johnson: It is not possible to provide an estimate based on the information given in the question. The cost of any paid parental leave scheme to the Exchequer and employers will depend upon the assumptions made about take up, the length of leave taken as well as the level of support provided.

WALES

Departmental Consultation

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the public consultation exercises on policy matters carried out by his Department and its agencies in each of the last five years; who was consulted and by what means; how responses were analysed; how and in what form the results were transmitted to those responsible for the consultation; how the results of the consultation were published; and what analysis has been carried out of the extent and nature of policy changes resulting from the consultation. [106294]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Government want to hear what people have to say about suggested new proposals and policies, and this is an important aspect of the modernising government initiative. However, for the Welsh Office up until 30 June 1999, the information requested is not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

For the Wales Office from 1 July 1999, a joint consultation with DETR titled "Improving Rights of Way in England and Wales" has been carried out. The actual consultation was carried out by the Assembly, on my behalf, and they wrote to me summarising the responses, and copied them to the relevant Whitehall department, to ensure that the responses were fed into the outcome. The results have not yet been published, and it is too soon for any analysis of the extent and nature of policy changes arising from the consultation to have been conducted.

A further consultation, again in conjunction with DETR, into "High Hedges: the Problems and Possible solutions in England and Wales" has also been carried out in Wales by the Assembly on my behalf. The consultation period has just concluded, and responses are now being analysed.

I have also asked the Assembly to carry out a consultation on "The Physical Punishment of Children". The Assembly will be issuing this consultation shortly. A similar consultation has been issued for England by the Department of Health.

Farming

Mr. Walter: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the Minister of Agriculture regarding the state of farming in Wales. [105570]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 18 January 2000]: I speak regularly with my colleagues in Whitehall, and we discuss a wide range of issues. I am acutely aware of the long-term problems facing Welsh agriculture and the current difficulties. Our priority must be to work towards a stable, sustainable and prosperous future for Welsh farming. Support for this objective is a matter for the Assembly and they are pursuing it through their Food Strategy and Rural Development Plan.

Post Offices

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals are being considered by his Department to help sustain and develop the viability of rural and urban sub-post offices. [105855]

Mr. Hanson: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to him by the Minister for Competitiveness, my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Mr. Johnson) on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 520W, as these matters relate to my hon. Friend's responsibilities within the Department of Trade and Industry.

Cubie Report

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Minister of the Welsh Assembly concerning the Cubie report. [105927]

Mr. Hanson [holding answer 24 January 2000]: I recently met the National Assembly for Wales Secretary for Training and Education Tom Middlehurst, when we discussed the Cubie report. The Cubie report is a report to the Scottish Executive on student finance, an area of responsibility that has not been devolved to the National Assembly for Wales. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has announced that he has set aside resources for a major new package of extra measures to widen access to higher education and tackle student hardship in England and Wales. Mr. Middlehurst will be announcing in due course increased help for students at higher education institutions in Wales through the Assembly's HE Student Access funds.

Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 6 December 2000, Official Report, column 370W, what restrictions were placed on contractors carrying out research projects funded by his Department in 1999 in respect of them discussing their findings with journalists (a) before and (b) after publication. [108200]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The standard contract for Research Services which is used by my Department provides that researchers shall obtain the approval of the Client before making any communication to the press or others on the Project, its contents, or the results.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales in what ways he has publicised the working families tax credit in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [107423]

Mr. Hanson: My right hon. Friend and I take every opportunity to publicise the Working Families Tax Credit which demonstrates this Government's strong commitment to improving the lot of working families and to eradicating child poverty.

In a statement on 7 September 1999, my right hon. Friend said

> "The Working Families Tax Credit represents a major step forward in making work worthwhile, and in helping those workers who were most disadvantaged by the previous system. This is especially good news for Wales, which has suffered from amongst the lowest wage levels in the UK".

A copy of the press release is available from the Library of the House.

Rail Transport

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent representations he has made to the Secretary of State for the Environment concerning improved rail transport in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [107420]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have regular contact with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to discuss a range of issues. In particular I have discussed with him and with the Minister for Transport how we can ensure that Welsh interests are properly reflected on the face of the Transport Bill.

Alyn and Deeside

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will discuss with the First Secretary the situation of dairy farmers in Alyn and Deeside. [106702]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the First Secretary regularly and we discuss a wide range of issues, including various aspects of the agriculture industry, and we are aware of the problems currently facing dairy producers. The Assembly is supporting the farming industry, in particular through their Food Strategy and Rural Development Plan.

CABINET OFFICE

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many questions to her Department tabled for written answer on a named day during Session 1998–99 were answered (a) on or before a named day, (b) within one week of a named day, (c) within one month of a named day, (d) within three months of a named day and (e) after three months of a named day. [106483]

Mr. Stringer: The information is not held in the form requested. In the Session 1998–99, 154 named day questions were tabled to the Cabinet Office of which 68 per cent. received a substantive answer on the day specified.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many questions to her Department tabled for ordinary written answer during Session 1998–99 were answered (a) within two weeks of tabling, (b) within one month of tabling, (c) within three months of tabling and (d) after three months of tabling. [106488]

Mr. Stringer: The information is not held in the form requested. In the Session 1998–99, 291 ordinary written questions were tabled to the Cabinet Office of which 83 per cent. received a substantive reply within five working days.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many questions to her Department were tabled for written answer during Session 1998–99; and how many of these she replied to (a) by means of a letter placed in the Library rather than by substantive answer in the Official Report, (b) by stating that a substantive answer could not be given due to information not being held centrally and (c) by stating that a substantive answer could not be given due to disproportionate cost. [106484]

Mr. Stringer: In the Session 1998–99, 676 questions for written answer were tabled to the Cabinet Office of which 12 were replied to by means of a letter placed in the Libraries of the House. Five questions received an answer in part in so far as information was available, and 13 were replied to by stating that the information requested was not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will estimate the impact of increasing the minimum wage (a) in line with average earnings, (b) to £4 per hour and (c) to £4.20 per hour on the cost of salaries of the Civil Service (i) in total and (ii) for each nation of the United Kingdom in the next financial year. [108654]

Mr. Stringer: This information is not held centrally. The effect of an increase in the National Minimum Wage would need to be calculated against an individual's precise working hours and contractual terms. This is therefore a matter for individual Departments.

Departmental Expenditure Limit

Mr. Patrick Hall: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proposals she has to change the 1999–2000 Departmental Expenditure Limit of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and Health Service Commissioners; and for what reasons. [109356]

Mr. Stringer: The total Departmental Expenditure Limited for the Office of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and Health Service Commissioners on Class XVIII, Vote 4 will be reduced by £570,000, falling from £14,971,000 to £14,401,000.

The Office of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and Health Service Commissioners is currently meeting the cost of complaints in respect of services which, following devolution, now fall within the responsibility of the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly. The cost of these services will in future be moved to a repayment basis. The proposed reduction in the Departmental Expenditure Limit will allow for this. Of the reduction £300,000 will be transferred to the Welsh Assembly Ombudsman and Welsh Health Service Commissioner and £270,000 will be transferred to the Scottish Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and Scottish Health Service Commissioner.

These changes will not add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proposals she has to change the 1999–2000 Departmental Expenditure Limit or running costs limit for the Cabinet Office. [109355]

Mr. Stringer: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates:

> The Departmental Expenditure Limit for Cabinet Office will be decreased by £4,163,000 from £318,701,000 and the running costs limit will be decreased by £156,000 from £115,018,000 to £114,862,000.
> This is mainly to take account of the following changes:
>
> Transfer payments in
> A transfer towards the project review of Better Government for Older People from Department of Social Security (Class XII, Vote 3) (£20,000).
> Transfer payments out
> A transfer in respect of staff transferring from Security Facilities Division to Police Scientific Development Branch to the Home Office (Class XVIII, Vote 3) (£25,000). A transfer payment to the Privy Council Office (Class XVIII, Vote 3) (£89,000) and to the Countryside Agency (Class III, Vote 1) (£64,000) to provide for accommodation costs. Provision for ownership of St. Christopher House has transferred from the Property Advisers to the Civil Estate to the Ministry of Defence (Class VI, Vote 1) (£1,075,000). Provision for ownership of 83 Piccadilly has been transferred to Department for Education and Employment (Class I, Vote 1) (£32,000).
> Civil Superannuation
> The scheme for the central funding of early departures as announced in the White Paper: The Civil Service: Continuity and Change (Cm 2627) ended on 31 March 1997. The amount of central funding required has decreased by £2,900,000.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Fraud

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps his Department is taking to reduce benefit fraud; and if he will make a statement. [108576]

Mr. Rooker: We set out our strategy for combating fraud and reducing error in "Safeguarding Social Security", published on 23 March 1999. We are putting this strategy into practice with strong and sensible safeguards to ensure the right money goes to the right people. Among the new initiatives that carry this forward are the following:

> New more robust powers for fraud inspectors in The Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Bill published on 1 December. These provisions give greater clarity and allow all benefit fraud investigations to proceed on the basis of common powers.
> All payments will move to automated credit transfer (ACT) from 2003 as a modern, more secure and efficient method of paying benefits. This will virtually eliminate "instrument of payment" fraud and enhance security over the life of a claim. This is expected to yield fraud savings in the region of £140 million—£240 million.
> A regional radio campaign, costing some £500,000, with supporting adverts in local newspapers, to advertise the Benefit Fraud Hotline. This has led to thousands of extra calls to the Hotline. Later this year the public will be able to contact the Hotline via the internet.

Pensioners' Incomes

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update his estimates based on the Family Resources Survey 1997–98 of (a) median pensioner incomes, excluding means-tested benefits, by age, sex and marital status, consistent with his answer of 18 January 1999, Official Report, column 372W, on pensions, and (b) the size of each group. [108493]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the tables.

Pensioner units median gross income excluding means-tested benefits, by age, 1997–98

£ per week

	Age
	60–64	65–69	70–74	75–79	80+
Single male pensioners	n/a	125	107	104	106
Single female pensioner	130	106	101	88	90
Pensioner couples	n/a	254	202	197	187

Notes:

1. All amounts are in £ per week at July 1997 prices. They are rounded to the nearest £1, although estimates are not necessarily accurate to this level.
2. Estimates are for pensioner units. A pensioner unit is defined as a single (non-cohabiting) person over State Pension Age (65 years or above for men and 60 years or above for women), or a couple (married or cohabiting) where the man, defined as the head, is over State Pension Age. Estimates for pensioner couples are broken down by the age of the man.
3. Estimates marked "n/a" are not applicable. Single men and couples are only defined as pensioner units if the man is aged 65 years or above.
4. Means-tested benefits are defined as Income Support, Family Credit, Council Tax Benefit and Housing Benefit.
5. Levels of means-tested benefit may be particularly affected by mis-reporting by survey respondents, as receipt of State Retirement Pension and receipt of Income Support are often confused in the FRS.
6. All estimates, and in particular those for single male pensioners, should be treated with caution since they are based on small sample sizes.
7. Figures are for GB only.

Number of pensioner units by age and marital status 1997–98

	Age
	60–64	65–69	70–74	75–79	80+
Single male pensioners	n/a	250,000	210,000	220,000	260,000
Single female pensioner	380,000	540,000	640,000	700,000	1,010,000
Pensioner couples	n/a	1,020,000	780,000	490,000	360,000

Notes:

1. Figures are for GB only and rounded to the nearest 10,000 pensioner units.
2. Estimates are for pensioner units. A pensioner unit is defined as a single (non-cohabiting) person over State Pension Age (65 years or above for men and 60 years or above for women), or a couple (married or cohabiting) where the man, defined as the head, is over State Pension Age. Estimates for pensioner couples are broken down by the age of the man.
3. Estimates marked "n/a" are not applicable. Single men and couples are only defined as pensioner units if the man is aged 65 years or above.
4. Estimates are not controlled to independent population estimates by the age bands used in this analysis and therefore may be affected by variation by age in survey response rates.
5. All estimates, and in particular those for single male pensioners, should be treated with caution since they are based on small sample sizes.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide separate analyses for pensioners aged 80 years or above as part of the core analyses contained in the Pensioners Income Series. [108432]

Mr. Rooker: The age groupings used in the Pensioners' Incomes Series will be reviewed before the publication of the 1998–99 edition, as part of the publication's ongoing development.

Incapacity Benefit

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost to (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Scotland of restoring eligibility for incapacity benefit to its status before 1999. [106579]

Mr. Bayley [holding answer 25 January 2000]: Information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Our welfare reforms are estimated to affect benefit expenditure for disabled people in Great Britain from 6 April 2001 as shown in the following table. The Incapacity Benefit charges apply only to new claims and no existing recipient will be adversely affected at the point of change.

Our reforms are intended to modernise the welfare system and to encourage work for those who can, while providing security for those who cannot. The reforms are not focused on making savings in benefit expenditure; spending on benefits for sick and disabled people will continue to rise.

Financial effects of welfare reform measures in Great Britain from April 2001

Measure	£ million
Incapacity Benefit contribution changes	-20
Incapacity Benefit occupational and personal pension changes	-30
Replacement of Severe Disabled Allowance by Incapacity Benefit for under 20–25-year-olds	0
Severe Disablement Allowance abolition for new cases	-10
Extension of Disability Allowance mobility component to 3 and 4-year-olds	+15
Disability Income Guarantee	+60

Notes:

1. Estimate for the United Kingdom is unavailable.
2. Estimates are available for Great Britain. It is expected that the effects will be proportionate for each measure in Scotland.
3. All above figures are in April 1998 prices from April 2001.
4. From 6 April 2001 the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999 amends the National Insurance contributions that have to be met to qualify for Incapacity Benefit and provides for some account of occupational and personal pension income in excess of £85 a week to be taken. Both measures apply to new Incapacity Benefit claims only.
5. The Disability Income Guarantee is included in the above table as it was part of the welfare reforms published in the command paper "A New Contract for Welfare: Support for Disabled People".

Minimum Wage

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the impact on benefit payments in the next financial year of a single minimum wage for all age groups of (a) £4.00 per hour, (b) £4.20 per hour and (c) £4.50 per hour. [108674]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Estimated savings in 2000–01 on benefit payments of a national minimum wage of £4.00, £4.20 and £4.50

£ million

	£4.00	£4.20	£4.50
Income Support/JSA (IB)	-30	-50	-70
Housing Benefit	-50	-100	-140
Council Tax Benefit	-10	-20	-30
Total	-90	-170	-240

Notes:

1. Estimates based on 1996–97 Family Resources Survey data, uprated to 2000–01 prices and benefit rates.
2. Estimates rounded to the nearest £5 million. Totals may not sum due to rounding.
3. Estimates assume no secondary effects on employment or wages.

Benefit Administration

Mr. Best: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the initiatives local government authorities have taken to improve the administration of benefits. [107342]

Angela Eagle: Local and central government have a common aim in transforming the delivery of Housing Benefit/Council Tax Benefit (HB/CTB) so that all local authorities can provide their communities with a faster, more accurate service which is more secure against fraud and error, provides value for money and takes account of the views and needs of clients.

Many local authorities are providing an excellent benefits service and are committed to modernising the way in which they provide it for local people. We are delighted that Leeds City Council was one of the five councils awarded Beacon status under the Modern Service Delivery theme along with the London Boroughs of Camden and Harrow, Exeter City Council and New Forest District Council. Beacon councils have a key role in disseminating best practice so that others can benefit from their experience.

New Best Value performance indicators will target key areas of benefit administration from April 2000. All local authorities will be required to set and meet challenging targets against indicators and demonstrate that they are achieving continuous improvements in the standards of service they provide.

There are many other initiatives underway between local and central government, including the pilot ONE service where Leeds City Council is a key player. Their involvement has been key to the delivery of the ONE service in Leeds, not only because of their responsibility for delivering housing benefit and council tax benefit, but also because of their expertise in providing a wide range of local services and information.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Departmental Secondments

Mr. Willis: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many staff were seconded from the private sector to his Department from (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to the latest date for which figures are available, stating in each case the companies from which staff have been seconded. [109072]

Mr. Lock: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

Records in this Department are only available for the periods April 1997 to March 1998 and April 1998 to March 1999. During 1997–98, we had one individual seconded from ICL to LCD Headquarters for less than three months and in 1998–99 a lawyer from Clifford Chance was seconded to the Law Commission for more than three months.

Public Trust Office

Ms Oona King: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how his Department will take forward reform of the Public Trust Office following the Quinquennial Review of its executive agency status, published on 18 November 1999. [109502]

Jane Kennedy: When he published the Quinquennial Review of the Public Trust Office, my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor indicated that he would explore the Review's recommendations in a programme of reform and would make a further announcement on the way forward in February 2000. It remains his view that radical reforms are needed but he is also determined to ensure, in an area where we are trying to protect the interests of some of the most vulnerable in society, that we consider very carefully the full implications of any changes we make. Several organisations and professional groups commenting on the Quinquennial Review have asked for an extension of the timetable in order to put forward their views. In order to ensure that all have sufficient time to give their views, the Lord Chancellor now intends to allow comments to be submitted up until 3 March. The Lord Chancellor will consider these and make an announcement on the way forward for the Public Trust Office by this Easter.

TREASURY

Bertram Fleurose

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place a copy of the transcript of the hearings of the appeals against the judgments of the Securities and

Futures Authority's disciplinary tribunal in the case of Bertram Fleurose in the Library, together with a set of the papers available to the appeals tribunal. [109117]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I will arrange for transcripts of the hearings to be placed in the Library as soon as possible. However, the papers available to the tribunal are not being supplied as they contain commercially sensitive information and documents subject to legal professional privilege.

Government Spending

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it his policy that the Comprehensive Spending Review to be announced this year will set Government spending plans up to and including 2004–05; and if he will make a statement. [108903]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Pre-Budget Report (Box 2.1, page 15, "Stability and steady growth for Britain", Cm 4479).

The Spending Review will set plans for Departmental Expenditure Limits up to and including the financial year 2003–04.

Budget Statement

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will present his Budget Statement for 2000; and if he will make a statement. [108977]

Dawn Primarolo: The Chancellor announced to the House on 3 February 2000, Official Report, column 1187, that he will deliver his Budget Statement on 21 March.

Partnerships UK

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made with Government plans to establish Partnerships UK; and if he will make a statement. [109298]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Partnerships UK will be a new public-private partnership which will make available to the public sector the key commercial skills to forge more and better partnerships with the private sector. The business plan for Partnerships UK is under development. The next step is to start putting arrangements in place to launch Partnerships UK. Parliamentary approval to this new service will be sought in an Estimate for HM Treasury, Class XVI, Vote 1. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £3.6 million in 1999–2000 will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

Cash Machines

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the possible effect of the introduction of surcharges for cash machine withdrawals on financial exclusion. [108436]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) on 2 February 2000, Official Report, column 634W.

UK Economic Cycle

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what specific steps he is taking more closely to align the United Kingdom's economic cycle with that of the countries in the euro group of the EU. [108869]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 7 February 2000]: The Government's policy on membership of the single currency remains as set out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in October 1997.

The Government have introduced a programme of economic reforms, which by building a platform for greater stability are in the UK's national economic interest.

The Government have said they will recommend joining a successful single currency only if it is in our national economic interest to do so, and if the economic benefits to the UK, from joining, are clear and unambiguous.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Council Appointment

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what controls, other than the provisions of the relevant treaties, there are on the activities of the High Representative and Secretary General of the European Council; for how long the present appointment has been made; and if it is renewable. [105130]

Mr. Vaz: The role of the Secretary General of the Council and High Representative for the Common Foreign and Security Policy is to assist the Presidency. The Presidency represents the Union in matters coming within the common foreign and security policy, and is responsible for the implementation of decisions taken under the common foreign and security policy. The High Representative has been appointed for five years. There has been no discussion of whether or not this period is renewable.

Departmental Fees

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the fees his Department, its agencies and associated public bodies collect; how much has been raised or it is anticipated will be raised from each of these fees from 1989–90 to 2004–05; and which of these fees count as negative expenditure. [106000]

Mr. Hain: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) are responsible for accounting for receipts from Visa Issuing, Passport Issuing Overseas and Other Consular Activities fees. Visa Issuing became negative public expenditure in 1997–98, Passport issuing became negative public expenditure in 1998–99 and Other Consular Activities are classed as Consolidated Funds Extra Receipts (CFERs).

Actual receipts from each of the categories, for the 10 year period from 1989–90 to 1998–99 and estimated receipts for 1999–2000 are, in pounds million, as follows.

Fees

	Visa	Passport	Consular
1989–90	—	4.7	1.6
1990–91	31.0	4.3	1.6
1991–92	26.6	4.8	1.7
1992–93	31.2	5.1	2.6
1993–94	30.5	5.9	3.0
1994–95	32.3	6.1	3.5
1995–96	42.1	6.0	4.5
1996–97	57.0	6.0	4.6
1997–98	63.5	6.0	5.1
1998–99	67.5	10.7	4.6
1999–2000	69.0	14.6	4.6

Departmental Press Releases

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Press releases his Department issued in each year from 1995 to 1999. [106120]

Mr. Robin Cook: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office issues a daily bulletin of Ministerial engagements and announcements. We do not keep records of the number of additional press releases issued each year.

Departmental Consultation

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the public consultation exercises on policy matters carried out by his Department and its agencies in each of the last five years; who was consulted and by what means; how responses were analysed; how and in what form the results were transmitted to those responsible for the consultation; how the results of the consultation were published; and what analysis has been carried out of the extent and nature of policy changes resulting from the consultation. [106300]

Mr. Robin Cook: The Foreign Office welcomes ideas from outside Whitehall. Ministers and officials consult widely on policy matters. Detailed information of the kind asked for is, however, not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Russia

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information the United Kingdom Embassy in Moscow has on the visits made to Russia by (a) presidents of other EU countries, (b) heads of Government of other EU countries and (c) other ministers of EU countries since 1 May 1997. [107628]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 31 January 2000]: The United Kingdom Embassy in Moscow does not keep records of all visits to Russia by EU partners. However, the information readily available in the FCO (which is not necessarily comprehensive) shows that the following visits took place:

Date	Visitor	EU Country
(a) Visits made by presidents of other EU countries
1 September 1997	President Herzog	Germany
25–27 September 1997	President Chirac	France
(b) Visits made by heads of government of other EU countries
4 January 1997	Chancellor Kohl	Germany
28–29 September 1997	Prime Minister Prodi	Italy
29–30 October 1997	Chancellor Klima	Austria
30 October to 1 November 1997	Prime Minister Jospin	France
30 November 1997	Chancellor Kohl	Germany
10 November 1998	Prime Minister Lipponen	Finland
16–17 November 1998	Chancellor Schroeder	Germany
1 June 1999	Prime Minister Bondevik	Norway
29 July 1999	Prime Minister Lipponen	Finland
(c) Visits made by other ministers of EU countries
7–9 September 1997	Foreign Minister Derycke	Belgium
8–9 September 1997	Foreign Minister Vedrine	France
21–24 September 1997	Defence Minister Von Sudow	Sweden
30 October 1997	Interior Minister Napolitano	Italy
30 October to 1 November 1997	Foreign Minister Vedrine	France
17 November 1997	Foreign Minister Petersen	Denmark
17 September 1998	Foreign Minister Schussel	Austria
17 September 1998	Foreign Minister Kinkel	Germany
10 February 1999	Foreign Minister Halonen	Finland
May 1999	Foreign Minister Papandreou	Greece
30 November to 1 December 1999	Foreign Minister Papandreou	Greece
20 January 2000	Foreign Minister Dini	Italy

The rest of this information is not held centrally and to provide a complete answer would incur disproportionate costs.

Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 20 December 1999, Official Report, column 315W, on departmental research contracts, how many research contracts, other than science or technology contracts, have been let by his Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract, and in each case whether the contract included (a) departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the standard research contract currently in use by his Department. [107103]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 1 February 2000]: We have not let any research contracts since May 1997. There is no standard FCO research contract.

EU Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his oral statement of 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 671, on the EU Intergovernmental Conference, what the source of his information was on the allegiances of the six members of the European Parliament. [108279]

Mr. Vaz: An article in The Independent entitled "Now MEPs round on Hague" (6 January 2000), confirmed by Conservative MEP, Daniel Hannan, in The Daily Telegraph (11 January 2000).

Anti-ballistic Missiles

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of compliance with the Anti-ballistic Missile Treaty by the parties concerned. [108415]

Mr. Vaz: We continue to value the Anti-ballistic Missile Treaty, and wish to see it preserved.

But it is not for the Government to comment on the question of compliance with treaties to which it is not a party.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government have received from (a) Russia and (b) other EU states in respect of the Anti-ballistic Missile defence system being constructed at RAF Menwith Hill. [108894]

Mr. Vaz: None.

EU Enlargement

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations the Government have made on the Commission's proposal in "Adapting the Institutions to make a Success of Enlargement", for the establishment of a European Public Prosecutor to investigate fraud across the Union; and if he will make a statement; [108499]

(2) what representations the Government have made on the Commission's proposal in "Adapting the Institutions to make a Success of Enlargement", that some members of the European Parliament should be elected on Europe-wide lists; and if he will make a statement; [108497]

(3) what representations the Government have made on the Commission's proposal in "Adapting the Institutions to make a Success of Enlargement", for the partial redrafting of (a) harmonisation of legislation on certain forms of taxation (articles 93 and 95 EC) and (b) measures in the social security field (first indent of Article 137(3) EC). [108500]

Mr. Vaz: We are in regular contact with the Commission about the IGC, and have taken careful note of its Opinion. However, the IGC is a matter for the member states.

The Government will set out its position on all major IGC issues in a White Paper to be published very shortly.

Feira European Council

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he will make to the Portuguese Presidency in advance of its report on security and defence policy to be presented at the Feira European Council; and if he will make a statement. [108498]

Mr. Vaz: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary visited Lisbon on 6–7 January 2000. British Ministers remain in close touch with their Portuguese counterparts. UK and Portugal are working towards an effective European security and defence policy which strengthens both NATO and the European Union.

Visas (Subcontinent)

Audrey Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what data he collates relating to visitor visa applications in the Indian subcontinent in addition to information on numbers allowed and refused. [108689]

Mr. Vaz: Full details of all information collected centrally on non-settlement visa applications can be found in the Global Entry Clearance Statistics, copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library for the years 1994–98. Statistics for 1999 are currently being compiled and will be placed in the Library in due course. Statistics collected in respect of applications in the Indian subcontinent do not differ from those collected elsewhere.

Audrey Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for visitor visas have been (a) allowed and (b) refused, in each of the last two years, in (i) Islamabad, (ii) Karachi, (iii) New Delhi, (iv) Bombay and (v) Nigeria. [108688]

Mr. Vaz: The following are the figures for non-settlement visa applications in the countries requested.

	1999[1]		1998
	Issued	Refused	Issued	Refused
Islamabad	26,249	8,675	26,737	5,615
Karachi	21,763	3,682	22,270	3,116
New Delhi	53,890	10,547	50,538	7,742
Bombay	63,023	5,431	55,957	4,528
Lagos	37,454	8,138	29,480	8,351
Abuja	13,133	1,883	9,562	1,421

[1] Provisional

The Global Entry Clearance Statistics for 1999 will be placed in the House of Commons Library in due course. The figures for 1994–98 are already available in the Library.

Audrey Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will instruct immigration posts in Pakistan to allow applicants for visas to be accompanied at their interviews by a relative or friend. [108690]

Mr. Vaz: We recognise that it may be helpful in some cases for visa applicants to be accompanied at interview by a friend or relative. For this reason entry clearance posts have discretion to allow this. But in other cases the presence of a second person at an interview may make it more difficult for entry clearance officers to judge the applicant's intentions, which they are required to do under the Immigration Rules. I therefore believe that the current policy of allowing posts discretion to decide should be retained.

Regional and Minority Languages

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards the ratification of the Council of Europe Charter on Regional and Minority Languages. [108435]

Mr. Vaz: We hope to sign the Charter very soon with a view to ratification later this year, subject to the completion of the required Parliamentary procedures.

Freedom Party (Austria)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the response of (a) the UK and (b) the President of the European Commission to the possibility of the Freedom Party attaining Government office in Austria. [108641]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 4 February 2000]: The UK has made very clear our deep concern and distaste at the inclusion of Haider's far-right party in the Austrian Government. We welcome the fact that the new government has committed itself to abiding by the common obligations and values of EU membership, but we will be judging it by its future actions. We also support the Commission statement on this issue. The measures which Britain agreed on 31 January with the 13 other member states are now a force to limit bilateral contact with Austria.

Vishna Hindu Parishad

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received that the Vishna Hindu Parishad attacks on Christian groups are part of an orchestrated campaign of intimidation. [108709]

Mr. Hain: We share concerns in the UK over attacks on Christians in India and have relayed those concerns to the Indian authorities. We have been assured that the incidents in question are isolated, and that they have been investigated and action taken against the perpetrators.

Saudi Arabia

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received concerning the arrest and detention of Christians in Saudi Arabia; and if he will make a statement. [108889]

Mr. Hain: On 7 January, 15 Filipinos were arrested at a Christian service in Riyadh. According to the Philippine Embassy in Riyadh, 11 have been released without charge. The others are expected to be released soon.

East Timor

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's estimate of the total expenditure of the United Nations in East Timor since its staff returned there in late 1999; of this expenditure, how much is (a) on UN staff costs and (b) distributed to the people of East Timor. [108887]

Mr. Hain: The Secretary-General reported to the UN General Assembly on 29 November that he expected the cost of civilian staffing for the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor to be US$53,632,100 and the cost of military staff to be $54,412,800 for the period 1 December 1999 to 31 March 2000. He will report again to the General Assembly in March with revised estimates, including on disbursements for staffing costs to date.

The UN Inter-Agency-Coordinated Appeal for East Timor, launched on 27 October 1999, set out requirements of US$199 million for urgent humanitarian needs. This was subsequently revised to $126 million, with the remaining $57 million of spending plans assumed into those for longer term reconstruction and development spending. Of this $126 million, $40 million was expected to have been disbursed by the end of 1999.

A United Nations/World Bank Donor meeting held in Tokyo on 17 December 1999 also set out requirements of $300 million over three years for reconstruction and medium to long-term development and $28.3 million for the governance and public administration of East Timor. Voluntary contributions for these requirements will be channelled through Trust Funds established by the World Bank and United Nations respectively.

Indonesia

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the recent representations which he has received on the issue of arm sales to Indonesia; and if he will make a statement. [108886]

Mr. Battle: To date I have received many representations from MPs, NGOs and members of the public on this subject. To publish them would entail disproportionate cost and permission from the authors of the correspondence.

Chagos Islands

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what actions are being taken by his Department to ensure that the Chagos Islands can be re-occupied by the Ilois people. [108873]

Mr. Battle: The immigration law affecting the British Indian Ocean Territory is the subject of High Court proceedings. While these are underway the matter is sub judice and I cannot comment further.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received from the different forces in Sri Lanka concerning a possible peace process; and if he will make a statement. [108884]

Mr. Hain: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 416W.

Bond Scheme

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received on the proposed financial bond scheme for visitors to the UK from India, Pakistan and Bangladesh; and what reports he has received on reactions to the proposal in those countries. [108876]

Mr. Vaz: Ministers and officials in India and Bangladesh raised this issue with me during my recent visit to these countries. We have taken note of their concerns and will pass these on to colleagues in the Home Office, who are conducting a consultation exercise on the proposed scheme.

Chechnya

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list his Department's ministerial meetings that were held with representatives of the people of Chechnya in the last 12 months. [108885]

Mr. Vaz: I refer my hon. Friend to the response given to an earlier question of 17 January 2000, Official Report, column 327W.

No meetings have been held in the last 12 months between FCO Ministers and Chechen representatives.

Pakistan

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings British officials have held with human rights groups in Pakistan in the past 12 months. [108888]

Mr. Hain: The Political and Development Sections of our High Commission in Islamabad are in regular contact with a wide-range of human rights groups. These include the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, Shirkat Gah (women's rights), SPARC (rights of the child) and the Progressive Women's Association. A senior FCO official visited Pakistan in May 1999 and had comprehensive talks on human rights issues with NGOs and the Pakistani authorities.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Standards

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he plans to raise the performance of those prisons that are identified as performing to a poor standard. [109168]

Mr. Boateng: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Ms Kelly) on 31 January 2000, Official Report, column 426W.

Passport Applications

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reason the UK Passport Agency ended the service available at main post offices for processing urgent applications for passports. [108587]

Mrs. Roche: The Passport Agency's partnership arrangement with Post Office Counters Limited, entered into in January 1996, provided a facility for applications marked as urgent to be processed within a minimum of four working days. The service proved very difficult to operate and the urgency of the applications was not always clear. When the Agency re-tendered the partnership arrangements late in 1999, the specification was for a guaranteed 10 day service for customers applying via a partner. The Agency believes this is the best way to meet its customers needs. Final negotiations are currently taking place with Post Office Counters Limited on the new arrangements, but the Agency considered it sensible to implement the standard 10 day turnaround now.

The Agency is planning to introduce a "Fast Track" five day service via the Post Office from December 2000.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what length of time in future the UK Passport Agency will take to process standard passport applications received via the Post Office's special service whereby applications are checked for common errors and forwarded by secure post.
